

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

COSTELLO et al. v. SCOTT et al. (No. 1,723.)

(Supreme Court of Nevada. Jan. 2, 1908.)

1. JURY—RIGHT TO JURY TRIAL—EQUITY CASE.

In an equity case, a party cannot demand a jury as a matter of right; the calling of a jury being within the discretion of the judge.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 31, Jury, §§ 35-65.]

2. SAME—LEGAL AND EQUITABLE ISSUES.

Where a suit to establish a partnership and for an accounting was treated by all the parties as an equitable proceeding throughout, and a jury was called to determine certain questions of fact, but no jury was ever demanded to try certain legal issues raised by defendant's answer, their right to a jury trial of such issues was waived, and the court was authorized to disregard the jury's conclusions on the facts, and to file his own findings and base a decree thereon.

3. MINES AND MINERALS—MINING PARTNERSHIPS—CREATION.

In a suit for an accounting of an alleged mining partnership and to establish plaintiffs' interest in certain mining claims discovered by defendant S., evidence held to sustain a finding that a partnership for the location and operation of mines existed between plaintiffs and defendant S., covering the locality in controversy, at the time the claims in question were discovered, and that plaintiffs were entitled to an interest therein.

4. SAME—GRUB-STAKE CONTRACT.

A "grub-stake" contract, by which one agrees to furnish supplies for a prospector and share in any mining claims he may discover, does not constitute a partnership, unless the agreement extends beyond the mere furnishing of supplies in consideration of a participation in the discoveries.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Mines and Minerals, § 222.]

5. SAME—CONTRACT—MODIFICATION.

Plaintiffs and defendant S. having formed a partnership for the location and operation of mining claims, S. on May 4, 1906, wrote plaintiffs that he had arrived in F. and secured a two-thirds lease on certain property; that he would need $50 to carry on the lease, giving plaintiffs one-third or one-half thereof. Plaintiffs in reply on the 10th complained of their inability to raise money, but promised to send the same not later than the following Tuesday, and called for a description of the camp and lease. On May 19th plaintiffs wrote another letter, inclosing the $50, and again called for a full description of the lease and the claims S. had located between G. and F. Held, that such correspondence did not constitute a termination of the prior partnership between the parties, and a new contract to operate the leased ground, but contemplated a continuance of the prior relations between plaintiffs and S.

6. APPEAL—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE—PREJUDICE.

Defendant S. was not prejudiced by the admission of a letter in evidence in an equity suit, where its exclusion would not have changed the rights of the parties.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 4185, 4186.]

7. SAME.

Where the question of partnership in issue was a matter of legal construction to be placed on prior correspondence between the parties, which, as found by the court, established a partnership, the admission of other subsequent letters, which was erroneous, because they contained self-serving declarations, was not prejudicial to defendants.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 4161-4177.]

8. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—NOTICE—EVIDENCE.

Plaintiffs and defendant S. having entered into a prospecting partnership, S., while living with defendant F., located a number of claims, some in the names of plaintiff C., and S. and F., of which F. had knowledge, and later conveyed to F. surface town site rights in land covering a number of claims in controversy. F. testified that he first learned that plaintiff C. was interested with S. when he (F.) first went to G. Held, that such facts were insufficient to charge F. with notice of the existence of a partnership between plaintiffs and S.

9. APPEAL—FINDING OF FACT—CONCLUSIVENESS.

A finding of fact in an equity suit, supported by the evidence, is conclusive on the Supreme Court.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 3970-3978.]

10. MINES AND MINERALS—MINING PARTNERSHIP—CONTRACTS—PERFORMANCE.

Where S., while a member of a prospecting partnership, located certain mining claims, and with others transferred town site surface rights to F., in consideration of his performance of the location work necessary to hold the claims, and to survey and plat the same, neither plaintiffs nor S. were entitled to complain that F. subsequently made arrangements that such work should be done by another.

11. SAME—AUTHORITY.

Where a partnership for the location of mining claims, etc., was practically without funds, a member of the firm was authorized in good faith to convey certain town site surface rights embracing such claims, in consideration of the grantee's performance of the location work, etc., necessary to hold the claims.

12. PARTNERSHIP—ACCOUNTING—JUDGMENT.

A receiver in proceedings for an accounting of the assets of a firm in which plaintiffs were entitled to a half interest with defendant S. became possessed of $1,816 belonging to the firm, and the final decree adjudged to plaintiffs against S. the sum of $2,180.60, which sum included the $1,816. Held, that such judgment was erroneous, as in effect a double judgment for plaintiffs for one-half of the $1,816.

13. NEW TRIAL—ERRORS—CORRECTION—REMITTITUR.

Where a judgment for plaintiffs in a suit for an accounting of a partnership was excessive through mere oversight of the trial judge, and on an application for a new trial plaintiffs confessed the error, and offered to remit the excess, the court had power to deny the motion on plaintiffs' filing a remission.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 37, New Trial, §§ 324-329.]

14. APPEAL—REVIEW—DISPOSITION OF CAUSE.

Where a judgment was excessive through misadventure of the trial judge, the Supreme Court, in the event of a denial of a new trial without requiring remission of the excess, on its attention being called to the error, would modify the judgment, and affirm the order denying the motion for a new trial, as ordered by Comp. Laws, § 3434.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 4462-4476.]

15. MINES AND MINERALS—MINING PARTNERSHIPS—ACCOUNTING—DECREE.

Defendant S., while a partner of plaintiffs, located, with his two codefendants, certain valuable mining claims, which defendants transferred to a corporation. Plaintiffs then sued for an accounting, to which the corporation was not a party, and a decree was entered giving plaintiffs an undivided half of an undivided third of the claims in question; the decree also reciting that plaintiffs were entitled to an undivided one-half of any and all further moneys or other consideration received or to be received by S., or contracted to be paid to him, accruing or arising out of any interest, property right, claim, or demand of S. to such mining claims, etc. Held, that such decree did not attempt to adjudicate plaintiffs' rights to stock in the corporation nor any of its rights, and was therefore not objectionable as being a double judgment, in giving plaintiff one-half of S.'s third in the claims deeded to the corporation, and also one-half of all stock issued by the corporation to S. in consideration of the transfer.

16. JUDGMENT—CONCLUSIVENESS—PARTIES.

Where a corporation to which certain mining claims had been transferred was not a party to a suit for an accounting between plaintiffs and the corporation's grantors, the corporation was not bound by a decree establishing plaintiffs' rights as against such grantors.

17. APPEAL—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE—PREJUDICE.

Where, in a suit for an accounting between partners and others concerning certain mining claims transferred to a corporation, the question whether a deed by one of the partners of his interests in the claims to the corporation conveyed the title so as to cut out plaintiffs' equities was not involved nor attempted to be determined, the admission of such deed was not prejudicial to defendants.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 4154, 4185.]

Appeal from District Court, Churchill County.

Suit by Thomas J. Costello and another against Murry Scott and others. From a decree in favor of complainants, defendants appeal. Affirmed as to all the defendants except N. R. Fitzpatrick, and reversed and new trial granted on certain of the issues between plaintiff and defendant Fitzpatrick.

Thos. S. Ford, for appellants. McIntosh & Cooke, for respondents.

NORCROSS, J. This is an appeal from the judgment and an order denying defendants' motion for a new trial. The action was brought by respondents, alleging a copartnership for mining purposes between themselves and defendant Murry Scott. They prayed for a decree dissolving the alleged copartnership, for the appointment of a receiver, for an accounting, and for other appropriate relief incidental to the dissolution of the copartnership. The nature and character of the copartnership between respondents and defendant and appellant Scott is alleged in the complaint as follows: "That on or about the 8th day of December, 1905, the plaintiffs and defendant made and entered into a contract and agreement in and by which it was then and there mutually stipulated, contracted, and agreed by and between said plaintiffs and defendant that they would engage together as copartners in the business of prospecting for, discovering, locating, leasing, acquiring, and working mines and mineral claims in the counties of Nye and Churchill in the state of Nevada, and in such other counties and places in said state as might be subsequently agreed on; that said defendant should give his time and attention to said business, and should furnish his work, labor, and services necessary for the purposes of said business, and that the plaintiffs should from time to time advance and pay the expense of said business, exclusive of defendant's said labor, and until said business should become self-sustaining; that any and all property so discovered, located, or in any manner acquired by said defendant should be held and owned by said plaintiffs and defendant in common, each (that is to say, plaintiffs) having, holding, and owning an undivided one-half part, share, and interest therein, and the defendant having, holding, and owning the remaining undivided one-half part, share, and interest therein; that the proceeds of any and all sales, options for sales, working bonds, or leases arising from, or in any manner or wise accruing out of, said business and property so acquired should be divided, as aforesaid, between plaintiffs and defendant, share and share alike; that plaintiffs and defendant should have, hold, and own, as aforesaid, respectively, an undivided one-half interest of, in, and to any and all mines and mining claims located or otherwise or in any manner acquired in pursuance of said agreement or subject thereto, and should have, hold, and own an undivided one-half interest, as aforesaid, of, in, and to all profits, proceeds of sales, or other consideration arising from said business."

The answer of defendant Scott denies that he ever entered into any contract of copartnership with the plaintiffs Costello and Newhall, and denies that he had ever entered into any agreement or business relations whatever with the plaintiff Newhall. He further alleges that he and the plaintiff Costello did enter into "a (so called) grub-stake agreement," which was confined exclusively to the Goldyke district, in Nye county. The nature of this agreement is set forth in defendant Scott's answer to be as follows: "By the terms of said agreement, the plaintiff Costello was to furnish money to this defendant, and with said moneys defendant was to purchase necessities to support him, and materials for working said mines, and the said contract was fully performed and carried out by this defendant; but the amount of moneys furnished by said Costello was wholly inadequate and insufficient for the purposes designated. The said defendant was to locate and acquire title to mines, and as far as he could, and his time permitted, was to do preliminary work thereon, required by the laws of Nevada to be performed within 90 days after location; and after being so located, and the title acquired, the said Costello and defendant were to be equal owners therein, and each was to own an undivided half thereof. The said understanding or contract had no other terms, and the said conditions, so described, constituted the whole thereof, and there was no agreement as to how long said contract should last, and no time was fixed when it should terminate; but it was mutually understood by and between the parties that said contract might be dissolved at the will of either party, when it appeared to him that the same became unprofitable, or for other reasons he desired to terminate the same, and the said agreement between Costello and Scott was dissolved and terminated prior to the time that the said business association or partnership of Mays, Savage, and Scott was formed." It is alleged in the pleadings and shown by the proofs that on or about the 23d day of May, 1906, the defendant Scott, who was then at the town of Fairview, in Churchill county, joined defendants Mays and Savage in a prospecting expedition. These three parties, two days later, discovered the mines of Wonder, about 20 miles from Fairview, which proved to be of great value.

The main contention, upon the merits in this case, is plaintiffs' claim to an equal interest with Scott in the fruits of his discovery at Wonder, by reason of the alleged partnership. The case came on for trial in Churchill county before the court, with the aid of a jury. Special issues were submitted to the jury, which, in the main, were answered in favor of the contention of defendant Scott. To the question, "Was the partnership or grub-stake agreement confined, or intended to be confined, to the Goldyke district, in Nye county?" the jury answered "Yes." Upon the question as to whether there was a partnership agreement, as contended for by plaintiffs, the answer of the jury was in the negative. Also, in reference to the contention of plaintiffs that they had, shortly before the Wonder trip, sent him $50, upon which he was subsisting at the time of the said discovery, the jury answered in the negative. These may be regarded as the principal special issues submitted to the jury, and are sufficient to notice for the purposes of this opinion.

After the jury had returned its verdict upon the special issues submitted, respective counsel entered into a stipulation "that any and all further hearings, arguments, and proceedings to be had before the court in said cause may be had, heard, and taken before the court at Reno, in Washoe county, Nevada; * * * that an order may be made by the court for a change of venue in said cause for any and all purposes of said cause." The stipulation also contained another provision governing "any further accounting in said cause." Upon this stipulation the court entered an order transferring the cause to Washoe county, where the case was finally argued and submitted. Upon the 3d day of January, 1907, the court rendered its decision, in which it rejected the conclusions reached by the jury upon the special issues, and found in favor of plaintiffs' contentions, and entered a decree accordingly. Defendants' counsel filed exceptions to the findings of the court, and in due time moved for a new trial upon the grounds of errors of law occurring during the trial, insufficiency of the evidence to justify the decision of the Court, and that the decision, findings, and judgment of the court are not supported by the evidence, but are contrary thereto. The motion for a new trial was heard by the successor in office of the judge who tried the case, and the motion denied. The case comes to this court in a transcript of nearly 1,400 pages, and the questions presented are ably and elaborately discussed by counsel in 350 pages of brief.

1. The first question, in logical order, is whether the court had power to set aside the verdict of the jury upon the questions of fact submitted to it, and substitute contrary findings of its own. In a purely equity case, it is well settled in this state that a party cannot demand a jury as a matter of right. The calling of a jury in such a case is a matter of discretion with the judge. "In such a case, when there are contested questions of fact, the chancellor may, and oftentimes should, call a jury to assist him in arriving at a just conclusion; but the verdict is merely advisory, and only to satisfy his conscience. If he is not satisfied with it, he can and should disregard it. If it is satisfactory, he can and should adopt it, and file his findings and decree accordingly." Duffy v. Moran, 12 Nev. 97; Lake v. Tolla, 8 Nev. 290; Van Vleet v. Olin, 4 Nev. 95, 97 Am. Dec. 513. It is contended, however, in this case that the answer of defendant Scott raised a legal issue upon the question of the existence of the partnership, and that the finding of the jury upon this issue was controlling upon the court. Conceding that the answer did raise certain legal issues, it may be admitted that, if a jury had been called to try these issues, the court would not have power to disregard the verdict of the jury upon such issues, and make findings contrary thereto. But this is not the situation presented in this case. The jury was not called to determine the legal issues. The case was treated by all parties as an equitable proceeding throughout, and the right of the court to pass upon the legal, as well as the equitable, issues does not appear to have been questioned until after the jury brought in its verdict, and, so far as the record shows, not until after the trial judge had rendered his decision. The minutes of the court, included in the transcript, show that, after the argument upon and the disposal of the motion to discharge the receiver, the court set the case down for trial upon a day certain, "by the court with the aid of a jury." Counsel for both sides were present when this order was made, and they are deemed to have consented to it. Haley v. Bank, 21 Nev. 127, 26 Pac. 64, 12 L. R. A. 815. The stipulation which respective counsel entered into immediately following the verdict of the jury upon the special issues, shows, we think, that the trial was regarded as being by the court, with the jury simply in an advisory capacity. In the opinion rendered by the trial judge the following statement is made: "A trial was had before the court, a jury being called to assist the court in determining the questions of fact involved." It is manifest from this that the court understood the case to have been conducted as a purely equitable proceeding—a matter that there could hardly have been any opportunity for him to have been mistaken upon.

Counsel cites Van Vleet v. Olin, 4 Nev. 97, 97 Am. Dec. 513, and quotes, in support of his contention, the following: "The court below treated the case all through as an ordinary action at law. When an action is so tried and treated by court and counsel, the law must be correctly submitted to the jury." The case cited was an equity case, which the court and counsel treated, so far as the trial was concerned, as an action at law. Applying the reasoning in that case to the present case, and it can with equal force be said that where an action presents both legal and equitable issues, but is treated by court and counsel as a purely equitable case, and a jury is impaneled simply in an advisory capacity, the court has the same right to disregard the findings of the jury upon the legal issues as it has to disregard those bearing upon the equitable issues.

Counsel cites many cases in his brief supporting the contention that, where legal issues are involved in an action, the party raising the legal issue has the right to have such issue tried by jury. In his reply brief counsel directs our attention to two decisions of the Supreme Court of California, cited in his opening brief, which he argues are entitled to the greatest respect, presumably because of the similarity of our Code and practice with that of California. The cases are Newman v. Duane, 89 Cal. 597, 27 Pac. 66, and Donahue v. Muster, 88 Cal. 121, 25 Pac. 1096, 22 Am. St. Rep. 283, and in both these cases a jury was demanded to try the legal issues, which demand was denied by the court, and exception taken. In this case a jury was never demanded to try the legal issues, and, therefore, the cases cited are not in point. Whatever right defendants may have had in this case to a trial by jury of any issues raised by answer, such right was waived by failure to demand a jury trial thereof, and by consenting that the case be tried by the court with the aid of a jury, as in a purely equitable case. The court had the right to disregard the conclusions of the jury upon the facts. Upon appeal the main questions presented are whether the findings of the court are supported by the evidence. Harris v. Lloyd, 11 Mont. 390; 28 Pac. 736, 28 Am. St. Rep. 475; Stockman v. Irrigation Co., 64 Cal. 57, 28 Pac. 116; Hayne on New Trial and Appeal, § 234.

2. The principal questions upon the merits involve a determination of the contractual relations, if any, existing between the plaintiffs and defendant Scott at the time of the discovery of the Wonder mines. This relationship must be determined, in the main, by correspondence had between the parties during the month of December, 1905, and following. On December 8, 1905, defendant Scott wrote to plaintiff Costello as follows: "No doubt you will be somewhat surprised when you open this letter to see it is from me. * * * Well, Tom, if you feel like staking me here, I think I can get some very valuable ground here. * * * If you desire to stake me, you will have half interest in all the claims I locate. If you can spare the money, I think it will be a great investment for both of us. * * * If you desire to stake me, do not say anything to any one about it, and we will come out all O. K. in the spring. This camp will be a hummer before many months. If I could have only seen you when you was here, I know everything would have been all O. K. * * *"

To this letter the plaintiffs, on December 14th, replied as follows: "Your letter received, and will say in answer that we have practically exhausted our own means, but we are in correspondence with several parties from whom we expect some help. If they come through, we will at once come to your assistance. We could have done business in the summer and fall easily, but at that time you were tied up with other parties, and I am glad to see you have gotten some very nice properties for them, and we have no doubt but what you will be able to find other good properties in the future. Now, when you answer this, let us know what you need. Then, if things come right with us, we will be able to advise you at once." On December 24th defendant replied as follows: "Everything is looking fine here. They have made a new strike at the Goldyke that is very good, they say. I have been prospecting the hills since you was here, and have made some very important finds. I have my eyes on some claims that I think will be very good property. Some fellows have the ground located, but I know they will not do any work, and I will get the property. * * * I have panned some of the rock, and it pans very good. I have four claims here. They are side claims of the Idahoes, the claims that we made the strike on. They are very good property, and I am willing to hand you over half if you can handle them; but in the meantime I would like to do some work on them, so I can show them up to the best advantage. I think we can make some money here if we form a partnership. I will get the properties if you can dispose of them, and some very good ones at that. In regard to what I will need to keep me going, about all I will need at present will be grub. I have plenty of tools to do all the work that I will do. You know about what it will cost. I think this will be a chance for both of us to make some money. I think this new find of mine will be another Goldyke. It has the earmarks of being a fine property. Well, Thomas, let me hear from you at once, so I will know what to do. I will close. Yours, as ever." To this letter plaintiffs replied, December 30th, as follows: "Your very welcome letter received several days ago, and we assure you we appreciate your position, but you can rest assured we are doing all in our power to help you, but will tell you right now money is a darn scarce article here in Tonopah. But we have written to several different parties, and we have every reason to believe that at least two of them will come through. * * * Money will be rather close with us for perhaps the next sixty days, or until such time as we get returns from our correspondents. Now, here is what we would like to have you do. Of course, you understand, we are willing to go in partnership with you, and you also understand, old man, we will have to depend on the outside for money to carry on operations until such time as we get a company floated. So we would like for you to send us a diagram of the best thing you have; tell us about the veins—their width and values and formation; also whether it is a sinking or tunneling proposition. Now, it is our candid opinion that although it will take a little while to get things started right, of this you may feel sure, if you go into this partnership with us, we will all make money. So you go ahead, and get ahold of the best propositions you can, and get them in such a way that Bemis and Turpin will not be able to complicate matters with us. We will float them, as people are beginning to get a little excited over the Goldyke country. You keep us posted from time to time, and we will do our share by keeping you supplied with money to the best of our ability. Please find inclosed $40. Do the best you can with this amount, as you know we will do better as conditions admit, etc. Your friends." On January 5, 1906, defendant replied as follows: "Your welcome letter was received this morning. * * * I have four claims joining the Idahoes, and I have been doing the assessment work. * * * I will send you the papers in my next letter, and you can put them on record. I only have my name on the location papers, but you can put your name on when you record them. As soon as the snow goes away, so I can see the ground, I will begin to rassel the hills. * * * I am satisfied we will make some money here this year. As soon as the snow goes, I will locate all the leges on these claims, and write you all the particulars. I received your check and it will come in handy at present. Well Tom, I will do my best out here, and I think we will not be very long doing some business." On January 21st the plaintiffs wrote defendant as follows: "What is the matter, old man; we have not heard from you for quite a while. We have several people on string, and would like to know what you have that we can offer them; so we think it advisable for you to let us know at your earliest convenience, as we are extremely anxious to keep in touch with these clients. Send diagrams, extent of veins, formation, and how far from Goldyke, and direction, and a general opinion as to their value, and whether they are sinking or tunneling propositions, water, etc. Mining conditions are looking up quite favorably, and it is quite certain we will do a considerable business during the coming summer. By the way, we wrote you on the 30th of December, inclosing a check for $40. Please let us know if you have received same, as we have not heard from you since that time. * * * On February 2d defendant replied as follows: "I cannot see why you did not get my last letter. * * * I will send some location papers, * * * and you can put them on record. * * * I think we will be able to sell them this summer. * * * I located them because they were so close in to the Idahoes, and I am sure we will get some money for them. I will have plenty of good ground before very long. I have been digging for water here, and I will have plenty of water in a few days." On the same date, February 2d, plaintiff wrote defendant as follows: "We only received your letter of January 5th yesterday. * * * Please address in future Costello & Newhall, Box 886, Tonopah. * * * We are glad to hear the good reports from that section, and agree with you that there are good chances for us to make some money out there during the coming season." On February 7th plaintiff Newhall wrote defendant as follows: "Your favor of February 2d, with location notices received last night, and I filed the notices for record this morning. Mr. Costello is at Crow Springs, and will not be in until the night of the 13th. We expect to collect some money between this and the 15th, and will send you some just as soon as we can receive it." On February 26th plaintiffs again wrote to defendant as follows: "We have been trying for the past three weeks to get rid of some stock in order to raise some money. * * * By the way, when you answer, please let us know what kind of showing there is on the four claims we have had recorded, and what you think they are worth, as it is possible we might get some one interested. We understand from the papers that there are quite a number of good strikes being made around Goldyke, and hope the reports are true. You will find inclosed money order for $25. We promised to help you out by the 15th, but it was impossible to do so." Answering the foregoing letter on March 14th, defendant after acknowledging its receipt, and writing at some length describing properties located and the general outlook of the camp, continued as follows: "Burns north of us has some very fine rock and he is going to lease his ground and I am going to take a lease and I think we will surely make some money out of the lease he has rock that you can see all kinds of gold in if Burns ground proves good this camp will be all O. K. I will take the lease when he lets them because if any of the leases proves good we will be able to sell our lease for some money. We had an awful snow storm last night. I will write you again in a few days and let you know all about the claims I will have and the lease. * * *" On March 21st defendant again wrote relative to some claims which he had relocated, and which were in dispute, and requesting the opinion of plaintiff Costello as to the legality of the location. Closing, he says: "This camp will surely come to the front, and we will be in the swim." This letter was answered March 27th, giving defendant the advice asked for, and inclosing a money order for $25. The letter concludes: "Try and keep us well informed how matters are progressing." On April 5th defendant wrote plaintiffs as follows: "Your letter received and will say in reply that I was very glad to hear from you. I am glad also to know that I have the claims. I would like to see you come out here. I think these claims would be a good stock proposition one of the best in this district, something that will stand a show to make a mine. We have that Gold Dyke ledge sure. Now is the time to do something for this camp is coming to the front sure this summer. I think it would be a good idea to stake this property if you are in a position to do so. We are still having snow here but I think that we will have some nice weather soon. Every thing is looking good out this way. I have your check Well Tom I would like to see you out this way as soon as you can do so. * * *" A few days after writing the letter last above mentioned, the defendant Scott went to Tonopah to see plaintiffs personally. The evidence is conflicting as to the conversation had between them. The court accepted as true the version given by plaintiffs, and as the trial court is the exclusive judge of the credibility of the witnesses, its action in this respect is binding on this court. The plaintiffs testified to the effect that, at this conversation in Tonopah, the Burns lease was discussed, and that it was agreed between them that the lease should be taken, but that it was not contemplated that the parties should work the same to any considerable extent. It was to be taken principally for the purpose of getting it in shape, and transferring it to others at a profit. At this conversation, also, the project of prospecting the south end of the Fairview Range was discussed. At that time Costello drew a diagram of that section of the country, and stated to the defendant that he had seen some very rich float that was reported to have come from that country, and that he would like to have the same prospected, and that it was agreed between them that the first matter to be taken care of was the obtaining and putting in shape of the lease, and that thereafter some prospecting should be done in the south end of the Fairview Range. Upon this trip plaintiffs gave defendant $25 on account of his expenses. Scott returned to Goldyke, and on April 18th wrote to plaintiff Costello as follows: "I arrived home. I am not going to take the Lease. Burns would not do as he agreed to and I think we had better not have anything to do with him. I know he has a great mine but he will not do the right thing by a Lease and I will not take one. He promised me before I went to Tonopah that he would give me 9 months and transferrable but he has changed his mind and only wants to give me 6 months and not transferrable and I do not want the Lease on those terms because that would not give us a chance. I am going out prospecting and will be away about three weeks out about 15 or 20 miles from here. I saw some rock from this place yesterday and it was great rock. I will do some work on some of our claims here when I come back if I do not find anything on this trip. The camp is looking good. We will make some money this year I am sure. They are making some good strikes on the Gold Dyke extension." Defendant next writes, on April 30th, from a place called Snow Point, to Costello as follows: "I am out prospecting between Atwood & Fairview. This is a very good country to prospect in. I am about 18 miles from Fairview. I have been here two days. Two fellows here has some very fine rock and I have some claims joining them and I think I will stay here for some time. I will be in Atwood in about two weeks. This is a fine looking camp and I think it will be a good one. * * * On May 4th the defendant wrote to plaintiff Costello from Fairview. This letter was lost, but its substance was testified to by Costello as follows: "That he [Scott] had arrived in Fairview; that the country looked very good; he had done a little prospecting while going in; that he had secured a lease—a two-thirds lease—on a piece of property close in to the big strike; that he would need fifty dollars to carry on the lease; that he would get the two-thirds of the lease, giving me one-third, or one-half in the lease." On May 10th plaintiffs replied to this letter as follows: "Your very welcome letter reached us yesterday. We will have to beg you to wait until between now and Tuesday, during which time we will be able to raise the money you asked for. We are caught short owing to the trouble in California. * * * You can rest assured we will have money up there, leaving here not later than next Tuesday. Please write us a good description of that camp and the lease you have taken hold of. This letter will be handed you by Mr. J. W. Langley or his business partner, Mr. Trimble. It will do no harm to let them see what we have, and there is a possibility that at a later date they may be of assistance to us."

The foregoing is all the correspondence which is admitted by both parties to have been written and received before the Wonder discovery. Plaintiffs testified that on May 19th they wrote to defendant, inclosing $50 in currency, asked for, a copy of which letter was admitted in evidence. Defendant Scott denied he had ever received the letter or the $50. The court found that the letter and money had been received by Scott, and that Scott was subsisting thereon at the time of the Wonder discovery. On May 23d Scott, together with defendants Mays and Savage, left Fairview on a prospecting expedition, and two days later discovered and located the Wonder mines, 20 miles north of Fairview. After the discovery of the Wonder mines there was no further correspondence upon the part of Scott with the plaintiffs. Plaintiffs wrote three letters to Scott after the Wonder discovery was known, which were admitted in evidence over defendant's objection, and will hereafter be considered. It is the contention of the defendant Scott that the correspondence had between himself and plaintiff during the month of December, 1905, shows but a grub-stake agreement, applicable only to the Fairplay district; that plaintiffs failed to keep their part of the contract to supply defendant with necessities, and that the agreement was terminated about the time Scott left Goldyke, in April; that if the agreement was not so terminated, then it was terminated by the new contract entered into at Fairview in respect to the lease. "Grub-stake" contracts have sometimes been called prospecting partnerships, and are said to partake of the character of 'qualified partnerships.' Yet, unless the agreement goes beyond the mere furnishing of supplies in consideration of a participation in the discoveries, the word 'partnership' is improperly used and is misleading. It is simply a common venture, wherein one, called the 'outfitter,' supplies the 'grub,' and the other, called the 'prospector,' performs the labor, and all discoveries inure to the benefit of the parties in the proportion fixed by the agreement. The prospector has the right to insist on the outfitter performing his part of the agreement as a condition precedent to participation in such discoveries. Should he fail to do so, the prospector may discover and locate for his own advantage, free from any obligation to the outfitter. * * * Is it essential to a right in property under a grub-stake contract that such property be acquired by means of the grub-stake furnished, and pursuant to such contract? * * * The 'grub-stake' contract, properly speaking, applies to the search for and location of mines on the public domain. * * * We frequently encounter cases where the object of the venture is not only to search for and discover mines, but also to work and develop them, and conduct a general mining business. This is something more than a 'grub-stake' contract. Such an agreement constitutes a partnership." Lindley on Mines (2d Ed.) vol. 2, § 858, p. 1565 et seq.

We think a fair interpretation of the letters which passed between plaintiffs and defendant Scott warrants the construction placed upon them by the trial court, that they show that the parties in question engaged in a partnership in present for mining purposes. If the letter of December 8th contained the only proposition upon the part of defendant, and the proposition therein contained had been accepted without modification, it would have constituted simply a grub-stake agreement. The answer to this first letter informs defendant that plaintiffs have practically exhausted their means, but that they are in correspondence with several parties, and if they "come through," they will at once come to his assistance. The letter concludes: "Now, when you answer this, let us know what you need. Then, if things come right with us, we will be able to advise you at once." To this letter defendant makes a proposition of what he proposes to do. He informs plaintiffs that he has already been prospecting the hills, and has "made some very important finds." He also knows of some valuable locations that are shortly to expire, and he will "get them." He has four claims already located, which he is willing to turn over a half interest in if plaintiffs "can handle them," but in the meantime he proposes to do some work upon them, to show them up to a better advantage. The glet of the proposition made by defendant is embodied in the two sentences contained in this letter: "I think we can make some money here if we form a partnership. I will get the properties if you can dispose of them, and some very good ones at that." He states in this letter that about all he will need will be grub, as he has plenty of tools. He requests a reply to this letter, so he "will know what to do." In the letter of December 30th plaintiffs accept the proposition, which both parties style a "partnership," and which constitutes a partnership in law. Plaintiffs, however, explain in their letter that they have to "depend on the outside for money to carry on operations until such time as we get a company floated." They say to defendant in this letter: "You go ahead, and get hold of the best propositions you can. * * * We will float them." "You keep us posted from time to time, and we will do our share by keeping you supplied with money to the best of our ability." The contract is clear from these two letters. Defendant, who is a practical miner and prospector, is to get hold of good properties, some of which he already has and others he has in view. These properties the plaintiffs, who are stockbrokers, and in the business of selling and promoting mining properties, are to dispose of. The parties are to have an equal interest in all mining property acquired by defendant and the proceeds of any sales effected by plaintiffs, or an equal interest in any stock companies organized to handle such properties. The subsequent correspondence shows that defendant was satisfied with the proposition that plaintiffs, "to the best of their ability," were to keep him supplied with money. No definite time was fixed for this partnership to last, but the court properly held that it was the intention of the parties that it was to continue at least into the summer of 1906, for that was the time, frequently referred to, when they would "surely make money" out of their venture.

It is very earnestly contended by counsel for appellant that the contract entered into between Scott and the plaintiffs had reference only to the Fairplay district, in which Goldyke and Atwood are situated. Although the earlier correspondence between the parties refers only to this district, there is no specific declaration that their operations are to be confined to that district. It is common knowledge that where parties enter into grub-stake agreements, or general partnerships for mining purposes, they care very little about the place where the mines are found. The main thing which the parties to this partnership wanted was mining properties of sufficient promise and value to enable them to be handled so that money could be made out of them. That the parties did not intend to confine their operations exclusively to the Fairplay district is shown by their conversation in Tonopah, when plaintiff Costello pointed out the advisability of prospecting the south end of the Fairview Range; by the letter of defendant of April 18th, when he notified plaintiffs that he was going on a prospecting trip 15 or 20 miles from Atwood, and would be gone about three weeks; by the fact that defendant testified that the grub purchased for this prospecting trip should have been paid for by plaintiffs; by defendant's letter, written April 30th from Snow Point, in which he says: "I am out prospecting between Atwood and Fairview. * * * I will be in Atwood in about two weeks"; by defendant's letter from Fairview of May 4th, relative to the lease at that place, and plaintiffs' reply thereto of May 10th.

3. It is contended by counsel that defendant's letter of May 4th, informing plaintiffs that he could receive a two-thirds interest in a lease at Fairview, and plaintiffs' letters of May 10th and 19th, respectively, in reply thereto, created an entirely new contract between the parties, and terminated whatever contractual relations previously existed between them. Plaintiffs' letter of May 10th is very brief, and there is nothing in it that would indicate a thought upon the part of plaintiffs that their previous relations were to be terminated by the taking of the lease. The letter is written as though plaintiffs understood that the lease had already been taken. They say: "Please write us a good description of the camp and the lease you have taken hold of." This is the only direct reference to the lease in the entire letter. It is not likely that parties would sever old relations and form new ones without a more extended discussion of the matter. The letter of May 10th contains but 14 lines, and treats the lease proposition as though it was an ordinary business matter between them. In the letter of May 19th plaintiffs say: "We finally made the rifle, and you will find the fifty dollars asked for inclosed herewith. * * * Please give us a full description of the lease you have taken hold of and your opinion of the camp in general. And by the way, you had better give us a description of the claims between Goldyke and Fairview." Defendant Scott denies that this letter of May 19th was ever sent or received. His counsel in his brief on appeal says: "Assuming that the letter of May 19th was written and sent, what is the result? Plaintiffs are bound by the last meeting of the minds of the parties. A specific, defined, and unambiguous agreement was entered into between the three, not intended or contemplated by the original contract, and it is the only one existing after May 19th, and must control this case. Offer and acceptance made by letter create a mutual obligation, and form a valid contract." If this letter was neither written nor received, then the contract in regard to the lease could never have been effected, for the necessary money was not forthcoming. If the letter was written, whether received or not, it shows that plaintiffs had no idea of terminating the relations previously existing between plaintiffs and Scott, for in that letter they ask for a description of the claims located by defendant between Goldyke and Fairview. There is certainly no act shown, upon the part of plaintiffs, prior to the Wonder discovery, indicating any desire upon their part to dissolve the partnership. The evidence shows that they had been doing their best to carry out their part of the agreement, even though they had not met with any marked success in the disposal of mining property. They had contributed money to Scott "to the best of their ability," and apparently to Scott's satisfaction, for he is not shown to have complained to plaintiffs that they were not doing enough, or were not complying with their part of the agreement. The evidence in this case shows that, up to the time of the Wonder discovery, the parties had reposed mutual confidence in each other. Scott knew that money was not easy with the plaintiffs. They frankly explained to him their financial situation in the very beginning of the transactions, and Scott was satisfied. Scott knew, as did every one, that the San Francisco disaster made money tight in this state for some time thereafter, and this situation is referred to in plaintiffs' letter of May 10th. In all the correspondence between the parties from December, 1905, to May, 1906, inclusive, there is not a line or a word indicating a severance of the contractual relations which they had entered into. After Scott made the Wonder discovery, he ceased all communications with plaintiffs. When one party to a partnership for mining purposes makes a discovery which would be of great value to the partnership, courts will not look with favor upon any contention upon the part of such discoverer that the partnership relations had previously been severed, unless such severance is clearly established. In this case the contentions of defendant Scott, based upon the correspondence alone, and independent of the other corroborative testimony in the case, fails to have any convincing force.

4. The contention of appellant that the evidence does not support the finding of the court that plaintiffs' letter of May 19th, together with the $50 alleged to be inclosed therein, was received, in the view we take of this case, is immaterial. The trial court in its decision analyzes the evidence upon this question of fact, and we could not, under well-established rules, disturb such finding unless it was clearly against the evidence. But, conceding for the purpose of the argument that it was unsupported by the evidence, it would not be prejudicial to defendant, for plaintiffs' right to recover in this case is based upon the contract entered into by the parties in December, 1905, and this letter of May 19th, whether received or not, could not alter the terms of that contract, or affect the rights of the parties arising thereunder.

5. The court admitted in evidence, over defendant's objection, three letters written by plaintiffs to Scott, of dates June 23, July 15, and July 16, 1906. It is claimed the evidence shows these letters were never received; that they contained self-serving declarations supporting plaintiffs' contention of the existence of the partnership. The court found as a fact that these letters were received. Conceding, without deciding, that the court erred in their admission, the error, if any, was harmless, for the letters only tended to support plaintiffs' contention of partnership. The question of partnership was a matter of legal construction to be placed upon prior correspondence. We have already construed this correspondence to establish a partnership. The letters in question could add nothing to the proof of the existing contract.

6. Plaintiffs allege in their complaint: "That subsequent to the 25th day of April, 1906, as plaintiffs are informed and believe, and so aver the fact to be, the said defendant, together with the said L. A. Savage and William Mays, became the owners of the possessory title of the Wonder townsite in the said mining district, county of Churchill, and state of Nevada, by virtue of a discovery of mineral and the location thereof as quartz claims, the number and a more particular description of which plaintiffs are unable to give; that as plaintiffs are informed and believe, and so aver the fact to be, for the purpose of cheating and defrauding plaintiffs of their share and interest of, in, and to defendant's one-third interest in the said townsite location and claims, the defendant transferred and released, without a valuable or any consideration, his said undivided one-third interest therein to said codefendant, N. R. Fitzpatrick, who then and there took the same, with full knowledge of defendant's said fraud, and of the plaintiffs' rights and equities in and to the same, and subject thereto." Plaintiffs pray for a judgment and decree "vacating, annulling, and setting aside the release or conveyance made by defendant to said codefendant N. R. Fitzpatrick as to the plaintiffs' undivided one-half of the premises affected thereby." Defendant Scott's separate answer contains the following allegation and denial: "Defendant admits that the said firm of Mays, Savage & Scott became the owners of possessory title of the Wonder townsite. He avers that the mining claims on which said townsite exists were located by the firm; that no mineral has been discovered thereon up to present date. The surface of said located claims was segregated from the mineral, and it was agreed by said firm that the surface should be occupied for townsite purposes. An agreement was entered into by which certain parties should promote the sale of town lots on said townsite, but the said agreement reserved all of said claims except the surface to the locators. The defendant Murry Scott transferred to said Fitzpatrick his interest in said surface in consideration that said Fitzpatrick would, among other things, promote the building of a townsite, and thereby enhance the value of defendant's mining property, and in further consideration of indebtedness existing on the part of defendant to said Fitzpatrick, for as much as the said Fitzpatrick had given defendant shoes, food, and other necessities, by which he was enabled to sustain life, during a portion of the said time that the said Costello had agreed to furnish him with food and necessities, and which he had neglected to do. Defendant denies that the said transfer was fraudulent or without any consideration, and avers that at the time the same was made the property had nothing but a prospective and speculative value, and it was not known that any town would ever exist thereon." The separate answer of Fitzpatrick, Mays, and Savage contains the following allegations and denial: "Defendants deny that said Murry Scott transferred to defendant Fitzpatrick his interest in the said surface claims comprising the townsite group without consideration. Deny that said transfer was made for the purpose of cheating and defrauding the plaintiff. Avers that the said transfer was made for a valuable consideration. That prior to the formation of said partnership of May, Savage, and Scott, the said Scott was without the necessities of life, and the said Fitzpatrick furnished and delivered the same to Scott, and he was under financial obligation to him for so doing, and the properties of defendants was without any real present value, but its value was speculative, and was no more than sufficient to compensate the said Fitzpatrick for money advanced by him. Defendants further aver that a large portion of said townsite group for the proceeds of the sale of which an accounting is asked for was separately located by defendant N. R. Fitzpatrick, and he was and is the owner thereof by virtue of acquiring the same in his own name under the mining laws of the United States." The court found that the transfer by defendant Scott to his codefendant Fitzpatrick of all the rights of Scott to the surface of claims of which he was a locator was fraudulent, and such transfer, in so far as it affected a sixth interest in the townsite, was set aside, and plaintiffs decreed to be the owners thereof, and judgment given against Fitzpatrick for one-half of the proceeds derived by him from a sale of lots in said townsite of Wonder.

Appellants contend the evidence is insufficient to support the finding that the transfer was fraudulent. Discussing the question of the evidence requisite to establish fraud, this court, in the case of Gruber v. Baker, 20 Nev. 476, 23 Pac. 865, 9 L. R. A. 302, said: "A party alleging fraud must clearly and distinctly prove the fraud as alleged. If the fraud is not proved as alleged, relief cannot be had, although the party against whom relief is sought may not have been perfectly clear in his dealings, for fraud will not be carried by way of relief one tittle beyond the manner in which it is proven. The rules of evidence are the same in equity as at law, and when certain facts as proved amount to a fraud is a question for the court. But the court is not justified in finding such facts upon any less or different kind of proof than would be required to satisfy a jury, for the law in no case will presume fraud. The presumption is always in favor of innocence, and not of guilt. In no doubtful matters should the court lean to the conclusion that a fraud has been committed, nor should it be assumed on doubtful evidence. The facts sufficient to establish a fraud should be clear and convincing. Circumstances of mere suspicion will not warrant the court in coming to the conclusion that a fraud has been committed. We do not wish to be understood as holding that, in order to establish fraud, it requires direct or positive proof; for in matters that regard the conduct of men the certainty of mathematical demonstration cannot be expected or required, and much of human knowledge on all subjects may be inferred from facts that are established. Care should be taken, however, not to draw conclusions hastily from premises that will not warrant it; but, if the facts established afford a sufficient and reasonable ground for drawing the inferences of fraud, the conclusion to which the proof tends must, in the absence of contradiction, be adopted. The motives with which an act is done may be, and often is, ascertained and determined by circumstances connected with the transaction. Various facts and circumstances evince sometimes, with unerring certainty, the hidden purposes of the mind; therefore, fraud may be shown by circumstances. But when the evidence, whether it be direct or circumstantial, is so strong as to produce conviction in the mind of the judge of the truth of the charge, it will be sufficient. This we take to be the extent of the rule that fraud must be proved. But this does not authorize the finding of fraud on less than a preponderance of the evidence, taken as a whole, for it is difficult to see how any disputed question of fact can be found except by the greater weight of evidence. The difference in the weight may be slight, but, unless it preponderates on the side of the plaintiff, the matter in dispute cannot be said to be proved; and this rule is adhered to more strictly in actions of this character than in any other class of civil cases, for it is said that, while the law abhors fraud, it is also unwilling to impute it on slight and trivial evidence, and thereby cast an unjust reproach upon the character of parties. What amount or weight of evidence is sufficient proof of a fraud is not a matter of legal definition. The proof, however, must be satisfactory. It should be so strong and cogent as to satisfy the mind and conscience of a common man, and so to convince him that he would venture to act upon that conviction in matters of the highest concern and importance to his own interest.

It need not possess such a degree of force as to be irresistible, but there must be evidence of tangible facts, from which a legitimate inference of fraud may be drawn. As an allegation of fraud is against the presumption of honesty, it requires stronger proof than if no such presumption existed."

The trial court based its finding that Fitzpatrick had notice of the partnership relations existing between plaintiffs and the defendant Scott upon the following, as shown by the opinion of the court: "It further appears from the evidence in this case that Fitzpatrick lived with Scott in Goldyke district, Nye county, Nevada, at the time that Costello & Newhall were furnishing Scott money, and at the time they were engaged with him in the mining business at Goldyke. It further appears from the evidence that Fitzpatrick was living with Scott at Goldyke from the 16th or 17th of March, 1906, up to the time that the defendant Scott left Goldyke for the Fairview country. It also appears from his evidence that he learned of the relations existing between defendant Scott and Costello at the time he first went to Goldyke, about the 16th or 17th of March; that during the time he was at Goldyke, claims were located in the name of Scott, Fitzpatrick, and Costello." The fact that Fitzpatrick was living with Scott at Goldyke, and the fact that a number of mining claims were located in the names of Costello, Scott, and Fitzpatrick, of which he had knowledge, would not of themselves be sufficient to establish notice to him of the existence of partnership relations. It is a common occurrence for prospectors in locating claims to include the names of other parties, with whom they may have no contractual relations. The mere fact that Fitzpatrick was living with Scott certainly would not afford him any notice of his relations with Costello. There is no intimation in the evidence that Fitzpatrick ever saw any of the correspondence between plaintiffs and Scott, or that he was informed of their contents or effect prior to the Wonder deal. Scott, in one of his early letters to Costello, requested the latter to say nothing about their agreement. It could hardly be presumed, in the absence of evidence, that Scott told Fitzpatrick of their relations simply because they were living together. But the court says: "It appears from his (Fitzpatrick's) evidence that he learned of the relations existing between Scott and Costello at the time he first went to Goldyke." The record shows that Fitzpatrick was asked the question, "When did you first learn that Costello was interested with Scott?" The answer was, "When I first went to Goldyke." This question and answer appears to be all there is in the record upon which the court attributed to Fitzpatrick knowledge of the relations existing between plaintiffs and Scott; at least it is all that counsel has directed our attention to in their brief. The witness may have had one idea in mind and counsel another when the question was asked. Costello was "interested" with Scott in the locations at Goldyke. This Fitzpatrick knew, and this he may have had in mind when he answered the question, as the question and answer are entirely consistent with this view. Fitzpatrick may have known that Costello was "interested" with Scott in the locations, but may never have suspected the existence of partnership relations. No attempt was made by further questions to ascertain to what extent the witness had knowledge of the relations existing between plaintiffs and Scott. He denied in his answer the existence of such partnership. The burden of proof was on plaintiffs to establish notice, or such a state of facts as would put a person upon inquiry. Both Scott and Fitzpatrick testified that the consideration for the transfer of the townsite interests was partially money owed by Scott to Fitzpatrick, supplies, etc., furnished, and partially an agreement upon the part of Fitzpatrick to do the location work for Scott on the Wonder claims. The court reviews the evidence upon the question of the alleged indebtedness existing between Scott and Fitzpatrick, and the matter of supplies alleged to have been furnished, and concludes that no such indebtedness existed, nor were any such supplies furnished. There is evidence to support this finding, and it is conclusive upon this court. Both Scott and Fitzpatrick testified that part of the consideration was that Fitzpatrick was to do the location work upon the claims. Scott says further that he (Fitzpatrick) was to promote the townsite, and that he considered such promotion would enhance the value of the mining properties. The testimony shows that after Scott transferred his interest in the townsite to Fitzpatrick, that Mays, Savage, and Fitzpatrick entered into an agreement with Kleeman & Co. for the latter to promote the townsite upon a percentage; the latter company, in further consideration therefor, to do all the location work, to hold the claims, survey and plat the same. This the company did. Counsel for respondents contend that this shows that Fitzpatrick did none of this work. But if he agreed to do the work as part consideration for the transfer, and subsequently he made such arrangements that the work was done by some one else, neither Scott nor plaintiffs would be in position to complain, if the transaction was otherwise regular. Scott and the plaintiffs were relieved of paying their proportion of the expense of this work, which was estimated to be over $700. The agreement between Scott and Fitzpatrick was made in the latter part of May, and the contract with Kleeman & Co. entered into on June 1st following. At this time the value of the townsite was more or less problematical. We are unable to see wherein the evidence in the case discloses any bad motive upon the part of either Scott or Fitzpatrick in the transfer of the former's interest in the surface rights of the claims in question for townsite purposes. If Scott was defrauding plaintiffs, he was working the same injury upon himself. There is nothing in the evidence indicating that Scott was to derive any advantage from the townsite, secret or otherwise, other than being relieved from the expense of doing his part of the location work upon the claims, surveying, etc. It may be that Scott at the time did not appreciate the value of the townsite, and transferred it for less than it subsequently proved to be worth. However, it is not reasonable that he would seek to injure plaintiffs, when to do so he would inflict equal injury upon himself. If there was anything to indicate he retained any secret interest in the townsite, and only plaintiffs were the sufferers, the situation would be quite different; but there is no such showing. As a member of the partnership of Costello, Newhall & Scott, he could make arrangements to do the location work upon the claims he had located, and if he acted in good faith, his copartners could not be heard to complain. Scott had but little means at this time, and he knew money was hard for plaintiffs to get hold of, and if he arranged to secure work to be done, necessary to acquire title to the mining claims, upon a basis that was as fair to plaintiffs as it was to himself, plaintiffs are hardly in position to complain, unless it violated the conditions of the partnership. In the agreement between Scott and Fitzpatrick nothing but the interest in the surface was transferred; all mining rights were reserved. The partnership for general mining purposes entered into between plaintiffs and defendant Scott did not contemplate the promotion and sale of townsites, and this may be taken as some evidence that Scott did not contemplate defrauding his partners when he made the transfer. While the transfer by Scott to Fitzpatrick of his interest in the surface rights of the Wonder claims for townsite purposes is not clear in all particulars, yet, taking into consideration all of the facts and circumstances as disclosed by the record, we think the showing is insufficient to establish actual fraud in the transaction. The fact that the transfer was verbal does not, of itself, give plaintiffs a right to have it set aside; it being in reference to a matter concerning which Scott had power to bind the partnership.

7. It appears from the evidence that on August 2, 1906, the receiver came into possession of the sum of $1,816, moneys in bank belonging to the partnership of Costello, Newhall & Scott, and involved in the suit. The final decree of the court, among other things, adjudges and decrees to plaintiffs judgment against Scott for the sum of $2,180.60, which latter sum is in fact inclusive of the said sum of $1,816 in bank. The effect of this was to give plaintiffs a double judgment for one-half of $1,816. It is manifest that this double judgment was an oversight upon the part of the trial judge. Upon the hearing of the motion for a new trial plaintiffs' counsel admitted the error in the judgment, and offered to remit the same. The court denied the motion for a new trial on condition that counsel for plaintiffs file a remission of this excess judgment, and they accordingly filed the same. Appellant contends that the court had no power to make such order; that its only course in the premises was to grant a new trial. We think the trial court adopted the appropriate procedure in the premises. It is not reasonable that parties should be put to the delay and expense of a new trial in order to correct an error in the amount of the judgment which both parties to the controversy admit is an error. Even if the trial court had denied the motion for a new trial without exacting this condition, this court would, upon its attention being called to the error, modify the judgment accordingly, and affirm the order denying the motion for a new trial. Comp. Laws, § 3434.

8. The record shows that just prior to the beginning of the trial of this cause the Hidden Treasure Mining Company, a corporation, petitioned to intervene, setting up in its petition that it was the owner of certain mining claims in the Wonder mining district, named the "Hidden Treasure," "Hidden Treasure No. 1," "Hidden Treasure No. 2," and "Skiddo Fraction"; said claims having been located by defendants, Scott, Mays, and Savage on or about May 26, 1906; that on or about the ——— day of July, 1906, said defendants by deed conveyed said claims to said corporation, which ever since had been the owner thereof; that the plaintiffs claimed an interest in said claims by reason of the alleged partnership with defendant Scott. Because of the lateness of the application, the necessity of a continuance, and the fact that the decree in this case could not be binding on the corporation unless it was a party, the permission to intervene was denied. Although there has been some argument in the briefs thereon, the order of the court denying the prayer for intervention is not before us. Upon the trial the court, over defendants' objection, admitted in evidence the deed in question to the Hidden Treasure Mining Corporation. This deed is dated the 28th day of July, 1906, acknowledged on the 5th day of October, and recorded on the 22d day of October following, and covers the mining claims mentioned in the petition. The decree gave to plaintiffs an undivided one-half of an undivided one-third of the claims in question. The decree also contains the following general provision: "It is further ordered and said plaintiffs are hereby adjudged and decreed to be entitled to take and receive and have delivered to them an undivided one-half part, share, and interest of, in, and to any and all other or further moneys or other consideration received or to be received by said defendants Scott, or contracted to be paid to him, or accruing to or in any wise arising out of any interest, property, right, title, estate, claim, or demand of the said defendant Scott in any and all mining claims, premises, and property acquired by him between December 30, 1905, and August 2, 1906, and plaintiffs are entitled to and are hereby given judgment against the said defendant Scott for the same." It is claimed that this, in effect, is a double judgment in favor of plaintiffs, as it decrees to them not only one-half of Scott's third interest in the claims deeded to the Hidden Treasure Mining Corporation, but also gives them one-half of all the stock issued by said corporation to Scott in consideration of the transfer of the claims. Plaintiffs, of course, are not entitled to an interest both in the stock and in the claims, and we think the trial court never intended to award them both such interests. No specific reference is made in the decree to stock in this corporation or any other. We do not understand from the decree that the court attempted to adjudicate the rights of the Hidden Treasure Mining Corporation, as contended by counsel for appellant, and it is manifest it could not do so. Besides, the court in its decision upon the motion to intervene distinctly stated that if the corporation was not allowed to intervene, no decree it would make would be binding upon the petitioner. Respondents in this case, with full knowledge of the transfer to the Hidden Treasure Corporation, have proceeded upon the theory that that transfer is void in so far as it affects their right to a half of the interest which Scott had to the locations. They have, in effect, elected to claim an interest in the ground itself, and not in the proceeds which Scott obtained therefor, and we think the decree should be so construed. The decree being so construed, it cannot operate to give respondents a double judgment. Whether or not the deed by Scott of his interests in the claims transferred to the Hidden Treasure Corporation conveyed the title, so as to cut out the equities of plaintiffs, is not involved in, was not attempted to be determined in, and could not be determined in, this action in the absence of the corporation as a party. In this view of the case, the admission of the deed in evidence, even if erroneous, could not be prejudicial to defendants.

The record contains numerous other assignments of error, but the view we have taken upon the main questions makes it unnecessary, we think, to determine them.

As against all the appellants, excepting N. R. Fitzpatrick, the decree and judgment is affirmed, subject to the modification in accordance with the remission filed by respondents in the lower court, and also subject to the construction of the decree placed thereon by this court, and as to them the order denying the motion for a new trial is affirmed. In so far as the judgment and decree is against the appellant N. R. Fitzpatrick, it is reversed, and a new trial is granted upon the issues between respondents and said appellant Fitzpatrick, excepting as to the issue involving partnership relations between respondent and defendant Scott. It is further ordered that the cause be remanded for further proceedings, in accordance with the judgment and decree of the trial court and of this court. Appellant N. R. Fitzpatrick is entitled to his costs upon appeal.

1. MECHANICS' LIENS—ENFORCEMENT—BURDEN OF PROOF.

In a suit to enforce a mechanic's lien under Sess. Laws 1899, p. 201, c. 118, requiring the filing of a lien statement within the time prescribed, plaintiff has the burden of proving that he filed the lien statement within the statutory time.

2. APPEAL—FINDINGS—CONCLUSIVENESS.

An appellate court will not disturb the findings of the trial court or the verdict of a jury merely because the evidence is in conflict; and, where there is sufficient legal evidence on which the verdict or finding can rest, it will not be set aside.

3. MECHANICS' LIENS—ENFORCEMENT—FILING LIEN STATEMENT—EVIDENCE.

4. APPEAL—PLEADING—STRIKING OUT PLEADINGS—OBJECTIONS BELOW.

Appeal from District Court, Pueblo County; N. Walter Dixon, Judge.

Action by T. H. Foley against W. H. Coon and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

H. P. Vories, for appellant. L. A. Crane, for appellee Levvie.

CAMPBELL, J. Defendant Coon, a builder, made a contract with defendant Levvie to put a second story on a previously existing one-story building standing on lots owned by the latter, and plaintiff Foley furnished Coon, the principal contractor, with materials that went into the work of construction. Foley brought this action against the builder and the owner to recover against the former the value of the materials, and to make the amount of his recovery a lien upon the property of the latter. Judgment went for plaintiff against the builder, from which the latter has not appealed. The court denied the lien against the owner. Plaintiff appeals.

The only point for determination concerns the rightfulness of the judgment disallowing the lien; and the only question that plaintiff is in position to raise on this appeal is the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the finding as to the time when the building was completed. The lien is sought to be enforced under the mechanics' lien act of 1899. Sess. Laws, 1899, p. 261, c. 118. Section 9 of the act requires liens of subcontractors and materialmen to be filed for record after the last labor is performed or last material furnished for which the lien is claimed, and at any time before the expiration of two months next after the completion of the building, or structure; while liens of principal contractors must be filed within three months next after such completion. Plaintiff filed three complaints. In the original and first amended complaints, and in his lien statement, he describes himself as a subcontractor, and rests his right to a lien upon the contract which he made with Coon, the principal contractor, which, under the statute, makes plaintiff a subcontractor. In the second amended complaint, besides the facts constituting plaintiff's cause of action as a subcontractor, one based on plaintiff's contract with Coon alone, were allegations appropriate to a cause of action by a principal contractor, one based on plaintiff's contract with Coon and Levvie jointly. The object of the latter averments was to make a case within that clause of section 9, which gives to a principal contractor three months next after the completion of the building or structure in which to file his lien statement. The court, on defendant's motion, struck from the second amended complaint such new averments, and plaintiff made no objection, and took no exception, to this ruling.

The principal question of fact to which the evidence was directed was upon the controverted issue of the time of the completion of the addition to the building. The burden was on plaintiff to prove that he filed his lien statement within the prescribed statutory period. Stidger v. McPhee, 15 Colo. App. 252, 62 Pac. 332. A number of witnesses for plaintiff testified, in effect, that the addition was not completed until about the 4th of December, 1902, while a number of witnesses for defendant fixed such time about the 20th of the previous October. The lien statement was filed January 4, 1903. The trial court found upon this disputed testimony that the building was completed October 20th, and, as this was more than two months before the lien statement was filed, the lien was disallowed. The established rule in this jurisdiction, and this case does not come within any of its recognized exceptions, is that an appellate court will not disturb the findings of the trial court, or the verdict of a jury, merely because the evidence is in conflict. If there is sufficient legal evidence upon which the verdict or finding can rest, it will not be set aside. Were it necessary to review the evidence in detail, it might not be difficult to show that some of the pronounced apparent differences between the witnesses for the respective parties could, at least in part, be reconciled, or explained, without in the least weakening the court's finding. We cannot disturb the judgment based on the finding.

Equally untenable, both on its merits and because it is not properly saved, is another contention that plaintiff is to be regarded as a principal contractor. The closing part of section 1 of the lien act makes it the duty of the owner of property in certain cases to file the contract, or memorandum thereof, between him and the principal contractor, containing certain matters, with the county recorder of the county, and, in case of a failure to do so, labor done and materials furnished by all persons before such contract or memorandum is filed shall be deemed to have been done at the personal instance of the owner. In other words, the owner is thereby made a principal contractor. A principal contractor, as has already been said, is by section 9 allowed three months next after the completion of the building in which to file his statement. If, therefore, plaintiff is a principal contractor, his lien statement was filed within three months after October 26th, the time when the defendant claims the building was completed. There is no such issue in this case. Plaintiff, in his lien statement, declared himself a subcontractor, and did so in the first two complaints. In the second amended complaint, the allegations whereby plaintiff claimed a lien as a principal contractor were, on motion of defendant Levvie, stricken out by the court, on the ground that a cause of action different from that contained in the original complaint was thereby pleaded. Plaintiff did not object to the ruling of the court striking out this cause of action from the second amended complaint, and cannot raise any such objection here.

Perceiving no prejudicial error in the record, the judgment is affirmed.

Affirmed.

BURCHER et al. v. PEOPLE.

(Supreme Court of Colorado. Dec. 2, 1907.)

1. STATUTES—TITLE — SUFFICIENCY — DETERMINATION.

Whether the subject-matter of a statute is expressed in its title within Const. art. 5, § 21, must be determined by the contents of the statute, without regard to the source of the power of which the statute is an expression.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 44, Statutes, §§ 136-139.]

2. SAME—REGULATION OF EMPLOYMENT.

The title of Sess. Laws 1903, p. 309, c. 138, entitled "An act to prescribe and regulate the hours of employment for women and children in mills, factories, manufacturing establishments, shops, stores and any other occupation which may be deemed unhealthful or dangerous," is not broad enough to cover a provision prohibiting the employment of women for more than eight hours a day in a mill, factory, manufacturing establishment, shop, or store; the title relating to occupations injurious to health, and the provision treating of occupations which may not be unhealthful.

3. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—LEGISLATIVE POWER—DELEGATION.

Under Const. art. 5, § 25a, requiring the Legislature to provide for an eight-hour day for persons employed in mining, etc., "or other branch of industry or labor" that it may consider injurious to health, and under the police power the Legislature alone must regulate the hours of labor, and cannot delegate it to either of the co-ordinate departments of the government.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 10, Constitutional Law, §§ 89-102.]

4. MASTER AND SERVANT — REGULATIONS — HOURS OF SERVICE.

Under Const. art. 5, § 25a, requiring the Legislature to provide for an eight-hour day for persons employed in mines and other enumerated employments, "or other branch of industry or labor" that the Legislature may consider injurious to health, the Legislature, in attempting to regulate any of the unnamed branches of industry or labor, must first declare that the same is injurious to health, and a mere general prohibition of employment in a harmless occupation beyond specified hours is not the equivalent of a declaration of the Legislature that such occupation is injurious.

5. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—RIGHT TO CONTRACT FOR LABOR.

The right reserved by the Constitution to each citizen to contract for his labor is subject to no restraint except where the public safety, health, peace, morals, or general welfare demands it, and then only where the Legislature in the exercise of its police power selects a proper subject for its exercise and prescribes reasonable regulations.

6. MASTER AND SERVANT — REGULATIONS — HOURS OF LABOR.

Sess. Laws 1903, p. 310, c. 138, which prohibits the employment of women for more than eight hours a day in any mill, factory, manufacturing establishment, or store, and which fails to declare that the laundry business is injurious to the health of employes therein, is invalid when applied to that business, under Const. art. 5, § 25a, requiring the Legislature to fix an eight-hour day in branches of industry considered injurious to health.

En Banc. Error to District Court, City and County of Denver; John F. Mullins, Judge.

Frank Burcher and others were convicted of violating the "women and children labor act," and they bring error. Reversed.

Fred W. Parks, for plaintiffs in error. Wm. H. Dickson, Atty. Gen., and Samuel Huston Thompson, Asst. Atty. Gen. (W. F. Hynes, of counsel), for the People.

CAMPBELL, J. Defendants were tried and convicted under an information charging them with violating the provisions of section 3 of the so-called "Women and Children Labor Act" of 1903. Sess. Laws 1903, p. 310, c. 138; 3 Mills' Ann. St. Rev. Supp. p. 757. It reads: "No woman of sixteen years of age or more shall be required to work or labor for a greater number than eight hours in the twenty-four hour day, in any mill, factory, manufacturing establishment, shop, or store for any person, agent, firm, company, copartnership or corporation, where such labor, work or occupation, by its nature, requires the woman to stand or be upon her feet, in order to satisfactorily perform her labors, work or duty in such occupation or employment." The title of the act is: "An act to prescribe and regulate the hours of employment for women and children in mills, factories, manufacturing establishments, shops, stores, and any other occupation which may be deemed unhealthful or dangerous, and to repeal all acts and parts of acts in conflict herewith." After defendants' motion to quash the information was overruled, they waived a jury, and submitted the case to the court upon an agreed statement of facts, and the court found them guilty of a misdemeanor, and sentenced them to pay a fine. The salient facts are that defendants were engaged in operating a steam laundry in the city of Denver, in which they had a number of machines, and employed a large number of men and women; that the building in which the business was carried on consisted of a ground floor and basement, well lighted by windows from side and rear, well ventilated and heated, connected with which were good sewerage and drainage, and no escaping gases or other unhealthy conditions surrounded the work, and the water and soap used were pure; that Belle Johnson, a woman over the age of 16 years, was employed in this laundry by them, and her work consisted in operating a shirt body ironer, which necessitated her to stand upon her feet; that under the contract of employment she was required to, and did, thus work more than 8 hours a day, to wit, about 55 hours a week, and averaging about 9 hours per day in the 24-hour day. On this review, as below, the facts being agreed upon, the only disputed question reserved and argued is one of law, whether foregoing section 3 is valid. Defendants challenge its validity upon a number of grounds, only two of which we shall consider, as our decision on them makes the section void, and compels us to reverse the judgment with instructions to discharge the defendants from custody.

The two grounds may thus be stated: (1) The subject-matter of the section is not clearly, or at all, expressed in the title of the act, as section 21 of article 5 of our Constitution requires. (2) The General Assembly has not in this act, or elsewhere, declared or considered the laundry business an occupation, or labor therein, injurious or dangerous to health, life, or limb, which is an essential condition precedent to the validity of an enactment of this character, whether it is based upon the eight-hour amendment to the Constitution adopted in 1902, and now known as section 25a of article 5 of the Constitution, or upon the general unwritten police power that resides in the legislative branch of our state government. As the Attorney General in his brief and oral argument gave, as the authority of the General Assembly to enact this statute, the so-called eight-hour constitutional amendment, we here insert the same: "The General Assembly shall provide by law, and shall prescribe suitable penalties for the violation thereof, for a period of employment not to exceed eight (8) hours within any twenty-four (24) hours (except in cases of emergency where life or property is in imminent danger), for persons employed in underground mines or other underground workings, blast furnaces, smelters; and any ore reduction works or other branch of industry or labor that the General Assembly may consider injurious or dangerous to health, life or limb." Laws 1901, p. 109, c. 48.

As affecting the first assignment, it makes no difference whether authority for this act is the foregoing constitutional amendment or the unwritten police power if, in essential character, they differ. Whether the subject-matter of section 3 is clearly expressed in the title must be determined by their own contents, and without regard to the source of the power of which the act itself is an expression. This title has to do with a regulation of the hours of employment for women and children in certain enumerated, and other indefinite and unnamed, occupations, which occupations in and of themselves may be deemed unhealthful or dangerous. This the Attorney General concedes, but contends that the words of the amendment, "or other branch of industry or labor," make it competent for the General Assembly to regulate the hours of employment, not only where the occupation or branch of industry itself is injurious or dangerous, but also where the "labor" is of that character; that is to say, even though the particular occupation or place of work is perfectly safe and healthful, yet, if the labor therein or thereat is injurious or unhealthful, the General Assembly may nevertheless limit the number of hours persons shall be employed in that labor. And the Attorney General says that it is under the authority conferred by section 25a of article 5 thus to regulate hours of employment where "labor," as contradistinguished from "branch of industry," is dangerous or unhealthful, that section 3 was enacted. If such be the authority for this section, and if such interpretation thereof be correct (and concerning this and the applicability of the amendment to this statute and this case we express no opinion), it is certainly just as true that in this title there is not a word about regulating employment where labor as such is injurious or unhealthful, but only where the occupation or branch of industry is of that character. It seems, therefore, necessarily to follow that the subject-matter of section 3 which treats of occupations which, for aught that is said therein to the contrary, are entirely safe and healthful, or which refer only to labor that might inferentially be deemed injurious or unhealthful, is not clearly, or at all, expressed in the title, which purports to regulate hours of employment only in dangerous or injurious occupations. In re Breene, 14 Colo. 401, 24 Pac. 3. We hold that the body of section 3 is not clearly expressed in the title.

The second assignment we think is well laid, and here again, as to this objection, we also observe that it matters not whether the source of the power of this legislation is to be found in the express command contained in the constitutional amendment, or is inherent in the police power of the state. The question as to whether the General Assembly by this amendment is given any greater power in making regulations concerning the unenumerated branches of "industry or labor" than that body theretofore and always has possessed as a part of its general legislative power, and certain other questions argued by counsel, we find it unnecessary to determine upon this review. And upon all questions not included in the two assignments determined, and as to the enforceability, meaning, scope, and applicability of this constitutional amendment, we withhold expression of opinion until a cause involving them is before us. If the power to enact such legislation as this reposes in the amendment, or is inherently a part of the general legislative power belonging to the General Assembly, it is entirely clear that the power itself must be exercised, in the first instance, by that lawmaking body. With the ultimate authority of the courts, as was held in Re Morgan, 26 Colo. 415, 58 Pac. 1071, 17 L. R. A. 52, 77 Am. St. Rep. 269, to determine as to the validity of the exercise of the police power, both as to the subject selected and reasonableness of the regulation, we are not now concerned. But it is unquestionably true, and cannot be, and is not, controverted, that the legislative branch of government alone has the authority, and is charged with the duty, of enacting such regulations, and cannot relinquish or delegate it to either of the other great co-ordinate departments of government. That this is the correct doctrine is declared by all the cases, and by every author and jurist who has spoken on the subject. The amendment recognizes this doctrine when, after specifying particular occupations in which the period of employment is prescribed, it adds, "or other branch of industry or labor that the General Assembly may consider injurious or dangerous to health, life or limb." Here we have, as to unnamed branches of industry and labor, the express limitation that regulations concerning hours of employment in them must be restricted to those which the General Assembly may consider injurious or dangerous to health, life, or limb. We look in vain to find that the General Assembly in section 3, or in any part of this, or any other, act, has considered or declared the laundry business, or even labor therein of any kind, either injurious or dangerous. The mere general prohibition of employment in harmless occupations beyond, or in excess of, specified hours, is not the equivalent of a solemn finding and declaration of the General Assembly that such occupations are injurious or dangerous. The amendment contemplates that not until after the General Assembly has considered and enacted that they are of that character can regulations of employment therein, and prohibition of labor beyond a certain time, be made effective, or violations thereof punished as a crime or misdemeanor.

In marked contrast with this act is the act of the Fifteenth General Assembly, found in Sess. Laws 1905, p. 284, c. 119. In that act the General Assembly was evidently intending to carry out the mandate of the constitutional amendment that is here invoked. That title is: "An act to declare certain employments injurious and dangerous to health, life and limb; regulating the hours of employment in underground mines and other underground workings, in smelters and ore reduction works, in stamp mills, in chlorination and cyanide mills, and employment about or attending blast furnaces, and providing a penalty for the violation thereof." The occupations named in section 1 of the act of 1905, which include all of those expressly enumerated in the constitutional amendment, and several others assumed by the General Assembly to be of similar character and hence within the language of the amendment "any other branch of industry or labor," are by the General Assembly expressly "declared dangerous and injurious to health, life and limb," and this declaration is immediately followed by a provision that the period of employment for all persons employed in such occupations shall be eight hours per day. Here we find that the General Assembly conceived that its duty under this amendment was, first, to declare certain occupations to be dangerous or injurious, and then to make the desired regulations concerning the hours of employment. This method was entirely ignored in the act which we are considering. Reading the act of 1903 in its entirety, it is plain that our General Assembly did not purport to say, and did not intend to declare, what occupations were, in its judgment, dangerous or injurious, and therefore occupations of such a character as to justify regulations of hours or labor therein, for in section 2 it said: "All paper mills, cotton mills and factories where wearing apparel for men and women is made, ore reduction mills or smelters, factories, shops of all kinds and stores may be held to be unhealthful and dangerous occupations within the meaning of this act at the discretion of the court." It must be borne in mind, as the Attorney General must concede, that under our Constitution the right of contracting for one's labor is reserved and guaranteed to every citizen. It is subject to no restraint, except where the public safety, health, peace, morals, or general welfare demands it, and then only where the legislative department of the state government, in the exercise of its police power, selects a proper subject for its exercise and prescribes reasonable and appropriate regulations. In the absence, therefore, of a legitimate exercise by the General Assembly of this power by a declaration to the contrary, the defendants might lawfully by contract require a woman to work more than eight hours per day in their laundry. Yet here is an attempted relinquishment by the lawmaking body of that very power of legislation, and a futile effort to confer upon the courts the authority to make such laws, by saying, in their discretion, and in the first instance, and with no previous declaration on the subject by the General Assembly, what occupations are unhealthful and dangerous. This is a palpable evasion of duty, coupled with an abortive attempt to give to the courts legislative power to make crimes and misdemeanors out of acts which are not in violation of any valid legislative enactment. It is manifest, therefore, that, as to section 3, at least one essential condition precedent to the validity of enactments of this kind is lacking, namely, the considering or finding by the General Assembly that the occupation in question is of a character concerning which only can it, in any event, adopt such regulations as are assumed to be contained in this act. If this, however, were not so, this judgment must be reversed; for, if the courts have the power which section 2 ineffectually tries to give them, the laundry business must be considered healthful, for counsel themselves, in their stipulation of facts, on which the record shows the cause was decided, are in accord that such occupation is healthful. Upon the two grounds discussed, we hold section 3 to be unconstitutional and void.

The judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to quash the information and discharge the defendants from custody.

Reversed. All the Justices concurring, except STEELE, C. J., who dissents.

En Banc. Appeal from District Court, Fremont County; M. S. Bailey, Judge.

Action by William A. Stump against Effie A. Jenks. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Geo. F. Dunklee and O. E. Jackson, for appellant. Waldo & Dawson, for appellee.

CASWELL, J. The appellee (as plaintiff below) brought a replevin suit in the district court of Fremont county to recover the possession of three cows from appellant (defendant below); complaint, in the usual form, alleging ownership, that he was entitled to the possession of property wrongfully taken, demand for possession, and unlawful detention by defendant. The defendant for answer alleges, upon information and belief, that the plaintiff was not in possession of the cows described in complaint at the time alleged, but the same were abandoned, neglected, and cruelly treated, and ranging upon a barren range dividing the counties of Fremont and Teller; and the defendant further justifies under sections 111, 112, Mills' Ann. St., alleging that at the time she took said cattle she was empowered as officer and agent of the Colorado Humane Society to maintain such animals until the expense of food, care, and shelter were fully paid, that her seizure of said cattle at the time same were taken was made solely for the purpose of providing them with proper food, shelter, and care, and to prevent suffering and death of same from hunger, thirst, and neglect; and she further alleges that at the time of the seizure she did not know, and had no means of knowing, who were the owners of the cattle. Plaintiff by his replication denies that the cattle were without food, shelter, and care, or that they were suffering greatly or otherwise from any cause, and denies that the defendant found them in an abandoned, neglected, and cruelly treated condition, and alleges that the cattle were on the range in the usual condition of range cattle, and that at that time and at all times during the winter he had provided and was providing food and shelter for all of his cattle on the range needing such food and shelter, and had men continually employed to gather all cattle which were in a suffering condition and provide for their wants, and plaintiff further submits to the court the validity of the law under which defendant justified. At the trial the plaintiff objected to the introduction of any testimony in support of the allegation of justification in defendant's answer, because the statute relied upon is in conflict with section 25, art. 2, Const. Colo., and the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, in that it authorizes the taking of property without due process of law, and further claims the statute to be in conflict with section 25 of article 5 of the Constitution of Colorado. The statutes which are discussed in connection with this case are as follows: Section 111, Mills' Ann. St.: "Any officer or agent of the State Humane Society may lawfully take charge of any animal found abandoned, neglected or cruelly treated, and shall thereupon give notice thereof to the owner, if known, and may care and provide for such animal until the owner shall take charge of the same, and the expense of such care and provision shall be a charge against the owner of such animal, and collectible from such owner by said Humane Society in an action therefor." Section 112: "When said Humane Society shall provide neglected and abandoned animals with proper food, shelter and care, it may detain such animals until the expense of such food, shelter and care is paid, and shall have a lien upon such animals therefor." Section 114: "Any person or corporation entitled to a lien under any of the provisions of this act, may enforce the same by selling the animals and other personal property upon which such lien is given, at public auction, upon giving written notice to the owner, if he be known, of the time and place of such sale at least five days previous thereto, and by posting three notices of the time and place of such sale in three public places within the county, at least five days previous thereto; and if the owner be not known, then such notice shall be posted at least ten days previous to such sale." Counsel on both sides have been diligent in presenting authorities. While we allude to some of them, we think the questions presented have been practically settled by former decisions of this court. In the exercise of the police power of the state the Legislature may undoubtedly enact proper laws for the prevention of cruelty to animals. It may further designate agents or officers who may be charged with the execution of such laws. It is unnecessary in this case to determine whether the statute as it now stands is obnoxious to clause 23, § 25, art. 5, Const. Colo.

The important question presented and chiefly relied upon in the argument is whether the law as it stands contravenes section 25, art. 2, Const. Colo., and the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, in that it deprives plaintiff of his property and the possession thereof without due process of law. This phrase has been frequently discussed in this court, and many other courts have defined it in various ways. In Davidson v. New Orleans, 96 U. S. 97-104 (24 L. Ed. 616), the court says: "There is wisdom, we think, in the ascertaining of the intent and application of such an important phrase (due process of law) in the federal Constitution by the gradual process of judicial inclusion and exclusion, as the cases presented for decision shall require, with the reasoning upon which such decisions may be founded." And further in the same case, at page 107 of 96 U. S. (24 L. Ed. 616), Mr. Justice Bradley says: "If a state, by its laws, should authorize private property to be taken for public use without compensation (except to prevent its falling into the hands of an enemy, or to prevent the spread of a conflagration, or in virtue of some other imminent necessity where the property itself is the cause of the public detriment), I think it would be depriving a man of his property without due process of law. * * * In judging what is due process of law, respect must be had to the cause and object of the taking; * * * and, if found to be suitable or admissible in the special case, it will be adjudged to be due process of law; but, if found to be arbitrary, oppressive, and unjust, it may be declared to be not 'due process of law.'" In Re Lowrie, 8 Colo. 513, 9 Pac. 498 (54 Am. Rep. 558), the court says: "It is pretty generally stated by those learned in the law that 'due process of law' and 'law of the land,' although verbally different, express the same thought and that the meaning is the same in every case." Cooley's Const. Lim. 352-353; Story's Const. § 1943. In the same case the court further says, quoting from Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 4 Wheat. (U. S.) 518, 4 L. Ed. 629: "By the law of the land is most clearly intended the general law, a law which hears before it condemns; which proceeds upon inquiry and renders judgment only after trial. The meaning is that every citizen shall hold his life, his liberty, property, and immunities under the protection of the general rules which govern society." To the same effect is Wadsworth v. U. P. R. R. Co., 18 Colo. 614, 33 Pac. 515, 23 L. R. A. 812, 36 Am. St. Rep. 309; in re Dolph, 17 Colo. 35, 28 Pac. 470. "Due process of law includes law in its regular course of administration through courts of justice." In Brown v. City of Denver, 7 Colo. 311, 3 Pac. 459, this court, in discussing "due process of law" and its application, says: "The doctrine of the authorities is that whenever it is sought to deprive a person of his property, or to create a charge against it, preliminary to, or which may be made the basis of, taking it, the owner must have notice of the proceeding, and be afforded an opportunity to be heard as to the correctness of the assessment or charge. It matters not what the character of the proceeding may be, by virtue of which his property is to be taken, whether administrative, judicial, summary, or otherwise. At some stage of it, and before the property is taken or the charge becomes absolute against either the owner or his property, an opportunity for the correction of wrongs and errors which may have been committed must be given. Otherwise the constitutional guarantees above cited are infringed." The court in the same case further says: "A valid assessment cannot be made under an invalid law or ordinance, and its constitutionality is to be tested, not by what has been done under it, but by what it authorizes to be done by virtue of its provisions." Stewart v. Palmer, 74 N. Y. 183, 30 Am. Rep. 289; Thomas v. Gain, 35 Mich. 155, 24 Am. Rep. 535; Davidson v. New Orleans, 96 U. S. 97, 24 L. Ed. 616; San Mateo v. S. P. R. R., 8 Sawy. 238, 13 Fed. 722. In the latter case this court had under consideration the validity of a statute authorizing the construction of sidewalks; but it was held in that case, as in other cases, that an assessment of that character could be upheld as a police regulation, and the court was then discussing the police power of the state. Subsequently this theory of taxation was overruled (Denver v. Knowles, 17 Colo. 204, 30 Pac. 1041, 17 L. R. A. 135), but such later decision in no wise detracts from the force of the argument of the court as to legislative enactments concerning the exercise of police powers. In Brophy v. Hyatt, 10 Colo. 223, 15 Pac. 399, the court having under consideration the power of towns, incorporated under the statute, to declare what should be a nuisance and to abate the same, etc., says: "The ordinance does not strictly speaking declare or work a forfeiture of impounded animals, since it provides for the payment of the proceeds of the sale to the owner after deducting the cost of the proceeding." Conversely it is true that a statute which does not provide for the payment of the balance to the owner after deducting the cost of the proceeding does work a forfeiture. It is not a sufficient answer to this proposition to say that the balance of the proceeds of the sale of animals remaining after deducting the cost for keeping and the cost of the proceedings and sale can be recovered by the owner in an action, because the constitutionality of the statute must be determined by what it authorizes to be done by virtue of its provisions. Brown v. City of Denver, supra, and cases cited; Ames v. People ex rel., 26 Colo. 83, 109, 56 Pac. 656.

Applying the foregoing well-established principles to the case at bar, we find the statute seeks to clothe the humane society and its agents with extraordinary powers. By its terms the agent is the sole judge of whether an animal is neglected, abandoned, or ill treated, and whether it has sufficient food, nourishment, and shelter. The truth respecting the matter cannot avail, because the agent is clothed with power to take possession of the animals, regardless of their condition. No tribunal or any hearing is provided to determine the facts. The agent may in his discretion take possession and create a charge which becomes a lien upon the property without notice or hearing. The owner may have no knowledge that his property is being taken. No provision is made for the payment of any residue over and above the charges of the agent and the expense of the sale to the owner, and such payment is not required by this law, and this is one of the tests of its constitutionality. There is no penalty for failure to return the proceeds of any sale to the owner, and the only redress is by an action to recover the same, and the party aggrieved must himself initiate the action to have his day in court. We think such powers are inhibited by the Constitution, and must hold that the statute is in contravention of article 2, § 25, Const. Colo., and of the fourteenth amendment to the federal Constitution, that it authorizes the taking of property without due process of law, and is not a valid exercise of the police power of the state.

Our attention is called to a line of decisions holding that legislation in the exercise of the police power of the state has been upheld where it was provided that property might be destroyed without notice and without compensation to the owner to prevent the spread of contagious disease, or in the case of a devastating fire and other exigencies. The rulings in such cases rest more upon the municipal right of self-protection and self-defense than the legal construction of provisions concerning due process of law. Such cases are not in point. In Munn v. Corbin, 8 Colo. App. 113, 44 Pac. 783, the court having under consideration the powers of a health commissioner to abate a nuisance, says: "The right to abate public nuisances, whether we regard it as existing in the municipalities, or in the community, or in the land of the individual, is a common-law right, and is derived, in every instance of its exercise, from the same source—that of necessity. It is akin to the right of destroying property for the public safety, in case of the prevalence of a devastating fire or other controlling exigency. But the necessity must be present to justify the exercise of the right; and whether present or not must be submitted to a jury under the guidance of a court." The distinction in all such cases seems to be whether public necessity demands summary action, and, when it does not, notice must be given to the owner of the property and an opportunity be given, before some competent tribunal, to determine the truth of the allegations in each case, before the same is taken and before any lien is created upon it, and before it can be sold. Many of these questions arise in connection with the right of killing animals; that is, in the manner provided in section 113 of the act under consideration. We do not construe that section, which is not before us, but the principles which control in such cases are analogous and applicable to those involved herein. 8 Cyc. 1122, and cases cited. It does not appear from the record that any public necessity existed, nor that the public safety was in any manner conserved by taking these animals from the range, or that any exigency existed which required them to be taken without a notice to the owner and a hearing to determine whether or not they were abandoned or neglected, nor does the statute purport to restrict the powers granted to cases of emergency.

At the trial there was a verdict for the plaintiff directed by the court, and judgment thereon, based upon the ruling that the statute is unconstitutional.

We think the judgment is correct; and it is affirmed. All the Justices concur.

JENKS v. WITCHER et al.

(Supreme Court of Colorado. Nov. 4, 1907.)

En Banc. Appeal from District Court, Fremont County; M. S. Bailey, Judge.

Action between Effie A. Jenks and William J. Witcher and another. From a judgment for the latter, the former appeals. Affirmed.

Geo. F. Dunklee and O. E. Jackson, for appellant. Waldo & Dawson, for appellees.

CASWELL, J. The facts involved in this case are the same as those involved and considered in Effie A. Jenks v. William A. Stump, 93 Pac. 17. By stipulation and order of the court below this case was consolidated with that case for the purpose of trial and determination; the stipulation providing for separate verdict and judgment in each case.

The questions presented for determination here are the same as the questions presented in that case, and the same law is applicable, and for the reasons there given the judgment herein is affirmed. All the Justices concur.

1. JUDGMENT—COLLATERAL ATTACK.

The attack upon a judgment is collateral if the action or proceeding has an independent purpose and contemplates some other relief or result than the mere setting aside of the judgment, although the setting aside of the judgment may be necessary to secure such independent purpose.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 30, Judgment, §§ 961, 962.]

2. SAME—DIRECT ATTACK.

Where the main object or purpose of an appeal, writ of error or motion, if taken or made in the original action, or in an independent action, is for the purpose of setting aside a judgment, such attack is direct.

3. SAME—JUDGMENT ROLL.

In an action where the service of the summons is made by publication, and the defendant fails to appear and answer, under the provisions of subdivision 1, § 4450, Rev. St. 1887, the following papers constitute the judgment roll, to wit: "Summons with the affidavit of proof of service, and the complaint with a memorandum endorsed thereon that the default of the defendant in not answering was entered, and a copy of the judgment."

*For opinion on petition to rehear, see 93 Pac. 257.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 30, Judgment, §§ 546-551.]

4. SAME—PRESUMPTIONS.

In a collateral attack on the judgment, the want of jurisdiction to render the judgment must appear upon the face of the judgment roll; otherwise, the presumption is in favor of the validity of the judgment.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 30, Judgment, § 837.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from District Court, Nez Perce County; Hon. Edgar O. Steele, Judge.

Action by Eugene O'Neill against Edmond D. Potvin. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Eugene O'Neill and Lloyd H. Eriesson, for appellant. Ben F. Tweedy and Chas. L. McDonald, for respondent.

SULLIVAN, J. This is an action to quiet title to about 157 acres of land, as per government survey, situated in Nez Perce county. Appellant in his complaint claims title in fee to said lands, and alleges that respondent makes some claim thereto adverse to him, and that such claim is without any right whatever, and prays to have the title thereto quieted in himself. The respondent answered, denying the ownership of said lands in the plaintiff, and avers that respondent is the owner of such land, and for a further answer avers that he obtained title to said land under sale by execution issued in the case of Edmund D. Potvin v. William Malenfant to enforce a judgment rendered in the district court in and for Nez Perce county, which judgment was against Malenfant and in favor of the respondent. After a trial of the cause, judgment was entered in favor of the respondent. A motion for a new trial was overruled, and this appeal is from the judgment and order denying the motion for a new trial. The appellant bases his title to said land upon a deed to said premises from Malenfant to the appellant. The real controversy arises over the validity of the judgment in the case of Potvin v. Malenfant; for, unless that deed is void, the appellant has no title, and is not entitled to have the title to said land quieted in himself. Counsel for appellant contend that said judgment was absolutely void by reason of the failure of Potvin in his suit against Malenfant to get service of summons on him by publication as required by law.

The first question presented is whether this is a collateral or direct attack on that judgment. This action was instituted to quiet the title to said land in the appellant. That was its ultimate object and purpose; and, in order to do that, said judgment in the Malenfant Case must be held to be void. This action is clearly a collateral attack on that judgment. In 1 Black on Judgments, § 252, the author defines a collateral attack as follows: "But if the action or proceeding has an independent purpose and contemplates some other relief or result, although the overturning of the judgment may be important or even necessary to its success, then the attack upon the judgment is collateral, and falls within the rule." "Collateral" is used as the antithesis of "direct." To constitute a direct attack upon a judgment, it is said that it is necessary that a proceeding be instituted for that purpose. In said section 252 the author states: "If an appeal is taken from a judgment or writ of error, or if a motion be made to affect or set it aside on account of some alleged irregularity, the attack is obviously direct; the sole object of the proceeding being to deny and disprove the apparent validity of the judgment." The appellant seeks in this action to obtain some other relief than that of setting aside said judgment. The main object is to quiet the title of said land in himself, and, although the overturning of that judgment is necessary to his success, it does not make this action any the less a collateral attack upon said judgment.

The next question to be considered is: What record may be used in a collateral attack upon a judgment of this kind? By the provisions of section 4456 it is provided that the judgment roll in cases where the complaint is not answered shall be composed of "the summons with the affidavit or proof of service and the complaint with a memorandum endorsed thereon that the default of the defendant in not answering was entered, and a copy of the judgment." That section was adopted from the Code of Civil Procedure of California (section 670), and in construing that section the Supreme Court of California in a number of decisions have held that the judgment roll in cases like the one at bar under that section of the statute consists of the summons, the affidavit or proof of service, the complaint with the default indorsed thereon, and a copy of the judgment. Hahn v. Kelley, 34 Cal. 391. That decision was rendered in 1868, and is reported in 94 Am. Dec. 742, and to that is attached an exhaustive note by the learned author, Freeman, which is very instructive, and cites many of the leading decisions that have approved or disapproved of the doctrine laid down in the Hahn-Kelley Case. That action, like the one at bar, was an action to quiet title to a tract of land. It appears that the respondent Kelley brought an action in the Fifteenth district court for the city and county of San Francisco against William Carey Jones, in which action he obtained judgment, and thereafter issued execution thereon to the sheriff, who levied upon the lands in controversy and advertised the same to be sold, and was about to sell the undivided one-quarter of the same as the property of said Jones when the action of Hahn v. Kelley was commenced to quiet his title and restrain the sale. In that action, the respondent Kelley answered, and, when the cause came on for trial, introduced, among other evidence, the decree in the case of Hawes v. Jones and Brown, the order of sale, the sale and deed by the sheriff to Jones, and the conveyance to the appellant by the latter, and then rested. The respondents then introduced in evidence, without objection, the remainder of what was claimed to be by them, the judgment roll in that action, which, as claimed by them, showed that an unsuccessful attempt had been made to serve Jones by publication of summons, but in consequence of certain alleged defects said service was a nullity, and that the decree was therefore absolutely void. The papers thus introduced in evidence by respondent consisted of the affidavit of plaintiff in that action to procure an order for the service of summons therein on said Jones by the publication of the same, the order of the judge directing the publication of the summons, the affidavit of the publisher of the paper in which said summons was published, and an affidavit showing that said summons had personally been served on said Jones in Washington, D. C. The affidavit of the plaintiff and the order for the publication of the summons were objected to as irrelevant and incompetent, because they constituted no part of the judgment roll in that action. It will be observed from that statement of facts that the rule of law applicable to that case ought to apply to the question under consideration in this case. In that case the court held that in a collateral attack on a judgment only such facts and circumstances can be shown or relied on in support of such attack as affirmatively appear on the face of the record or what under the law constitutes the judgment roll. So in a collateral attack on a judgment under our law the only evidence that is admissible in support of such attack is the judgment roll, and, if that shows on its face the court had no jurisdiction to try the cause, the judgment is absolutely void.

The case of Hahn v. Kelley, supra, has been very extensively cited, not only by the Supreme Court of California, but by the courts of many other states, and the rule laid down in that case has to some extent been modified or overruled by subsequent decisions of national and state courts. Mr. Freeman says in the note referred to that the first case in which the doctrines of the principal case were called in question is Galpin v. Page, 3 Sawy. (U. S.) 93, Fed. Cas. No. 5,206. Mr. Justice Field delivered the opinion in that case sitting as presiding judge of the United States Circuit Court for the Ninth Circuit. In the course of that opinion it is said: "The first position [referring to Hahn v. Kelley], that, when a judgment of a court of general jurisdiction is produced in evidence, it can only be collaterally attacked for matters apparent upon its record, and that in the absence of such matters the jurisdiction of the court must be conclusively presumed, as, with certain qualifications and exceptions, undoubtedly correct. These qualifications and exceptions arise where the proceedings, or the parties against whom they are taken, are without the ordinary jurisdiction of the court, and can only be brought within it by pursuing special statutory provisions." The learned justice, referring to the statute of California allowing constructive or substituted service, said: "The validity of the statute can only be sustained by restricting its application to cases where, in connection with the process against the person, property in the state is brought under the control of the court, and subjected to its judgment, or where the judgment is sought simply as a means of reaching such property or affecting some interest therein, or to cases where the action relates to the personal status of the plaintiff in the state." After pointing out the mischief which would arise from permitting citizens of one state to come into another state and recover personal judgments upon service of summons by publication against citizens of different states, he concluded as follows: "We do not think it within the competency of the Legislature to invest its tribunal with authority having any such reach or force. Certainly no presumption in favor of their jurisdiction can arise when a judgment of this character is produced against a non-resident who has never been within the state, and did not appear to the action." And, on further reasoning, he comes to the conclusion that the statute of California prescribing what the judgment roll should contain, properly construed, required full proof of the jurisdictional facts to be incorporated into the judgment roll; but further states that the courts of the United States are bound to accept as correct the construction of the state statute given by the state courts, and that construction in the Hahn-Kelley Case was that the judgment roll did not contain the affidavit and order for publication of summons. That opinion is very instructive and exhaustive on the question under consideration. But the Legislature of the state of California has failed to amend section 670 of the Code of Civil Procedure of that state, and require the judgment roll in such cases as that of Hahn v. Kelley to contain the affidavit on application for order to publish summons and the order made therein in addition to the papers now required by the provisions of said section. But the affidavit made for such order and the order are not required by the provisions of said statute to be made a part of the judgment roll, and this court has not the authority to amend that statute in that or in any manner. After Mr. Justice Field's said decision in Galpin v. Page, supra, the Supreme Court of California in Belcher v. Chambers, 53 Cal. 635, referring to the case of Galpin v. Page, 18 Wall. 350, 21 L. Ed. 959, said: "When the question upon which the judgment of this court depends is such as may be re-examined on a writ of error by the Supreme Court of the United States, we will follow the rule laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States." And it is stated in the syllabus of that case by the reporter that Hahn v. Kelley, 34 Cal. 391, 94 Am. Dec. 742, is overruled. We think the reporter misapprehended the effect of that decision, for in the Estate of Newman, 75 Cal. 213, 16 Pac. 887, 7 Am. St. Rep. 146, the court held that the affidavits of service of summons by publication against a nonresident defendant in an action for a divorce and recitals thereof in the judgment are conclusive upon a collateral attack, and that affidavits on the application for the order of publication and the order thereof are no part of the judgment roll, and cannot be considered. The court said: "The affidavits of service and the recitals in the judgment are conclusive. The affidavit on the application for an order of publication, and the order of publication, cannot be considered. They are no part of the judgment roll." The court there also declares that the case of Belcher v. Chambers, 53 Cal. 635, is not in point and said: "In that case, as in Pennoy v. Neff, supra, the judgment considered was a personal judgment against a nonresident without personal service of process. So far as the rule established in Hahn v. Kelley, supra, is applicable to proceedings in rem, it has not been overruled. The judgment referred to in that case was for money—the deficiency after foreclosure and sale." In the Malenfant Case the question of a personal judgment was not involved, at least to no greater extent than the value of the real estate attached in that action was concerned, which real estate was within the jurisdiction of the district court that tried that action. If service of summons is made by publication in an action where the defendant is not a resident of the state, and he has no property within the state, on the authority of Pennoy v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 24 L. Ed. 565, and Galpin v. Page, 3 Sawy. (U. S.) 93, Fed. Cas. No. 5206, and decisions along that line, the judgment would be absolutely void because a personal money judgment cannot be legally obtained on constructive service of summons—service by publication. And, if it appears on the face of a judgment roll that a personal judgment has been rendered against a nonresident who had no property in the state, such judgment is absolutely void under the decisions above cited. In the Malenfant Case the land in question was within the jurisdiction of the court that tried the case, and the judgment roll in that case shows that that court acquired jurisdiction sufficient of the person of the defendant to subject the land owned by him and held under an attachment to the processes of that court. The Legislature of this state has seen fit to adopt said section 4456, Rev. St. 1887, from the practice act of California, which was done after the Supreme Court of California had construed the provisions of that section, and the general rule is that one state adopting the provisions of the statute of another state adopts with it the constructions placed upon it by the Supreme Court of the state from which it is adopted; and, further than that, it seems to me that the language of that section is too plain to require construction. It provides that the following papers shall constitute the judgment roll, to wit: "In case the complaint be not answered by any defendant, the summons with the affidavit or proof of service and the complaint with a memorandum endorsed thereon that the default of the defendant in not answering was entered, and a copy of the judgment." The specific papers are therein named that go to make up the judgment roll, and, if the Legislature had intended that the affidavit for the order of publication and the order of publication should be contained in such roll, it certainly would have named them.

Counsel for appellant contend that this court in Strode v. Strode, 6 Idaho, 67, 52 Pac. 161, 96 Am. St. Rep. 249, held that the affidavit and order for publication of summons was a part of the judgment roll. In that case the question was not raised as to what constituted the judgment roll, and the record contains the affidavit of the publisher of the newspaper named in the order for publication, stating the time that the alias summons was published. The record failed to show that a copy of the summons and complaint had been sent to the defendant as required by law, and the main point in that case was that the proof of service of summons failed to show that a copy of the summons and complaint were mailed to the defendant as required by law. The controlling question in that case was the failure of the judgment roll to show the proper service of summons on the defendant. It failed to show that a copy of the summons and complaint had been mailed to the defendant at his last known place of residence or at all. The case of Mills v. Smiley, 9 Idaho, 325, 76 Pac. 783, is cited by counsel for appellant as sustaining the position that the judgment roll must contain the affidavit on the application for an order for publication of summons, and the order of the judge made thereon. That case was an appeal from an order made by the court denying the motion to set aside a writ of assistance in that action. The original action was brought to foreclose a mortgage, and the decree foreclosing the mortgage and ordering the sale of the mortgaged property was entered, and thereafter the court granted a writ of assistance in said action against Smiley. Smiley thereafter made application to have the order granting said writ of assistance set aside, and the court denied the application, and the appeal was from such order of denial. The trial court in passing upon that question had before it the record containing the affidavit on the application for the order directing publication of summons, and the order directing such publication. When the case was brought to this court on appeal, that record was brought here, and this court reviewed that record and considered the case as a direct attack upon that judgment, and not collateral, for the reason that the application for the writ of assistance had been made in that action, and was an order made in that action after final judgment. In that view of the case, the court considered the sufficiency of the said affidavit and order. The court, therefore, passed upon that case as being a direct attack upon the judgment, and for that reason it is not an authority in the case at bar.

We therefore conclude that this action is a collateral attack on the judgment of a court of general jurisdiction; that being true, the fact that the judgment is void must appear upon the face of the record; that the record consists of the judgment roll, and in the Malenfant Case the defendant was a nonresident of the state, service of summons was had by publication; that the judgment roll in that case consisted of summons with the affidavit or proof of service and the complaint with a memorandum indorsed thereon that the default of the defendant in not answering was entered, and a copy of the judgment; and on the face of that roll it does appear that the court had jurisdiction.

The judgment must therefore be affirmed, with costs in favor of the respondent.

AILSHIE, C. J. (concurring). In concurring in the conclusion reached in this case, I think it best that I state the specific grounds on which I place my concurrence. Section 4456, Rev. St. 1887, was taken from the California Code (section 670, Deering's Code of Civil Procedure), and adopted literally into our code of laws. At the time of and prior to its adoption here the Supreme Court of California had held that the affidavit and order for publication of summons were not a part of the judgment roll, and had no place therein. See cases in main opinion. Under the general rule governing the construction of a statute adopted from another state where it had already been construed, I feel constrained to concur in the opinion of Justice SULLIVAN. In Stein v. Morrison, 9 Idaho, 426, 75 Pac. 246, this court held that "when a statutory or constitutional provision is adopted from another state, where the courts of that state have placed a construction upon the language of such statute or Constitution, it is to be presumed that it was taken in view of such judicial interpretation, and with the purpose of adopting the language as the same had been interpreted and construed by the courts of the state from which it was taken." Personally I do not think the statute ever meant what the California court has said it meant. When the Legislature said that, "in case a complaint be not answered by any defendant," the judgment roll shall contain "the summons with the affidavit or proof of service," it never, in my judgment, intended that the affidavits of a printer and of mailing should constitute "proof of service." Service may be made by the sheriff, and his certificate to that effect indorsed on the summons is "proof of service" (section 4143, Rev. St. 1887), or it may be made by "any person over the age of eighteen years not a party to the action," but in the latter case proof of service is made by affidavit (section 4143). This is proof of personal service. On the other hand, constructive service cannot be made until certain conditions precedent are shown to exist. A printer's affidavit alone in the judgment roll is no proof at all that the case is one where constructive service might be made, and therefore falls short of "proof of service." In such case it seems to me that, in any reasonable view of the law, the affidavit and order for publication are necessary and essential to constitute "proof of service" in this unusual and extraordinary manner, where a defendant is at most only given a constructive notice. I yield, however, my personal views to the construction that has been placed on this statute for so many years, but I now voice the hope that the Legislature may so amend section 4456, Rev. St. 1887, as to specifically require the affidavit and order for publication to hereafter be made a part of the judgment roll in cases where the defendant makes no appearance.

VALLEY LUMBER & MFG. CO. v. NICKERSON et al.

1. CORPORATIONS—FOREIGN CORPORATIONS—ACTIONS—PLEADING—WAIVER.

In order for a foreign corporation to maintain an action in the courts of this state, it is necessary that it plead a compliance with the Constitution and statutes prescribing the conditions on which it may qualify and obtain a legal capacity to contract and maintain actions thereon, and a complaint that fails to state such facts is subject to demurrer. If, however, the defendant fails to raise the question by demurrer or answer, he will be deemed to have waived the same.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 12, Corporations, § 2647; vol. 39, Pleading, § 1355.]

2. PLEADING—DEMURRER.

A demurrer to a complaint on the ground that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action is not sufficient to raise the question of the legal capacity of a foreign corporation to maintain an action in this state.

3. MECHANIC'S LIEN—FILING LIEN—DELAY.

Where the materialman had furnished no material for 30 days, and during the last 20 days of that time the building was occupied by the owner, and in the meanwhile the contractor had returned material that was not used in the building, and the materialman had notice of all these facts, he cannot extend the time for filing a lien by proof that he thereafter sent to such building, for the contractor, 40 cents worth of material; there being no showing that such material was necessary for, or used in, the building under the original contract.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Mechanics' Liens, § 200.]

4. SAME—DELIVERY OF MATERIAL—EVIDENCE.

A memorandum kept by a yardman in the employ of a lumbering company, giving a description of lumber, the name of the owner of the building to which it was sent, and the name of the teamster to whom the lumber was delivered, is not competent evidence to prove a delivery of the material to the contractor or at the building for which it was furnished, where the teamster was in the employ of the lumbering company, and not the agent of, or in the employ of, the contractor.

5. SAME—PROPERTY SUBJECT—LIABILITY OF OWNER.

Under the mechanic's lien law of this state (Act Feb. 7, 1899; See Laws 1899, p. 147), the contractor for the construction, alteration, or repair of a building is the special agent of the owner for the purpose of securing the material necessary for the construction, alteration, or repair of such building; but through such agency the owner cannot be personally bound, but the charge becomes one purely in rem, and runs against the building or structure only.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Mechanics' Liens, § 128.]

6. SAME—POWERS OF CONTRACTOR.

The contractor being only a special agent of the owner, with limited power, his authority to bind the property benefited for the payment of the value of the material extends only to such material as is reasonably and ordinarily sufficient properly to construct or repair the building in accordance with the plans and specifications thereof, or in pursuance of the agreement and contract entered into between the owner and the builder.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Mechanics' Liens, § 128.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from District Court, Nez Perce County; Edgar C. Steele, Judge.

Action by the Valley Lumber & Manufacturing Company against John E. Nickerson and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Eugene A. Cox, for appellants. C. H. Lingenfelter, for respondent.

AILSHIE, C. J. The plaintiff, the Valley Lumber Company, a corporation, furnished to the defendant Hugh Morrison, who was the original contractor in the construction of a building for the defendant Nickerson, lumber and material necessary for the construction of the building. It is alleged by the complaint that the material was furnished and delivered at the premises between the 27th day of February, 1905, and the 31st day of May of the same year. The lien was filed on July 28th following. The lien was therefore filed 58 days after the date on which it is alleged the last material was furnished. The complaint is in the usual form for the foreclosure of a materialman's lien, with the exception of paragraph 1 thereof, which alleges plaintiff's corporate existence and is as follows: "That the plaintiff is, and was at all times hereinafter mentioned, a corporation organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the state of Washington, with its principal place of business at Clarks-ton, Wash., and doing business at Lewiston, Nez Perce county, Idaho." The defendants demurred to the complaint on the grounds that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The demurrer was overruled, and defendants thereupon answered. The answer did not put in issue the corporate existence of the plaintiff, nor did it contain any allegation touching the plaintiff's compliance with the foreign corporation laws of this state.

At the trial the plaintiff introduced a certified copy of its articles, together with a certificate showing that the same had been filed with the county recorder of Nez Perce county, and also a certificate showing that it had filed a designation of an agent; but it did not go further and show that it had made its filings with the Secretary of State. Defendant's attorney objected to the evidence as immaterial and outside of the issue. The defendants failed, however, to raise the question either by demurrer or answer, and must be deemed to have waived it. In Valley Lumber & Manufacturing Co. v. Driessel, 93 Pac. 765, just decided, we have held that it is necessary for a foreign corporation commencing an action in this state to allege and prove that it has complied with the law entitling it to do business in the state; but we also held that if it fails to do so, the defendant must raise the question by demurrer or answer, in the usual and ordinary manner of pleading and settling issues, or he will be deemed to have waived it. Of course, if during the trial it should clearly appear to the court, by admission or evidence, that the plaintiff had not complied with the Constitution and statutes of this state, the court might of its own motion nonsuit such a plaintiff. Katz v. Herrick, 12 Idaho, 1, 86 Pac. 873.

Passing, now, to a more serious question in this case: Appellants contend that the company has no valid lien, for the reason that it did not file its claim of lien within 60 days after the completion of the building or the furnishing of the last item of material. If appellant's contention is correct on that point, our determination of that assignment of error will dispose of this appeal. The evidence on this point is rather brief. Morrison, the contractor, testifies that "the building was finished 60 days before that (May 31st), and they were living in the house." Nickerson moved into the house on May 11th, and Morrison further states that the house had been completed before Nickerson moved in, and the lumber and material had been cleared away from about the house prior to that time, and unused material had been returned and credited on the bill. He further testifies that he notified the plaintiff of the completion of the building, and that the owner had moved in, and that thereupon the company furnished him with an itemized statement of the material that had been used in the building, and that he checked over the list with the company's secretary, and they made some corrections in the account, and upon the trial he produced this itemized statement, and it was introduced in evidence as Defendants' Exhibit A. Plaintiff had attached to its complaint what purported to be an itemized statement of the material furnished, and had it marked "Exhibit A." When the contractor was on the witness stand, the plaintiff's attorney asked him a number of questions about the account as shown on Exhibit A, and the defendants' attorney likewise asked the witness a number of questions about the statement as shown on Exhibit A. A careful examination of the proceedings at the trial satisfies us that the plaintiff's attorney was referring to Exhibit A attached to the complaint, while defendants' attorney was referring to Exhibit A introduced in evidence, and which exhibit was the itemized statement presented to the contractor at the time he notified the company of the completion of the work; and it is equally clear that the witness so understood the questions propounded by the respective attorneys. The only material difference between these statements is the last entry in Plaintiff's Exhibit A, which is: "May 31, 20 ft. ceiling, $0.40." This item does not appear on the Defendants' Exhibit A. The last entry in each of the exhibits, prior to this one of May 31st, is the same, having been made of date May 1st. This latter entry is the last item appearing on Defendants' Exhibit A. The contractor was on the witness stand, but at no time did he state that he ever did any work of any kind on the building, or place any material therein, after the owner moved in. On the contrary, he stated that he had never seen any statement containing this charge of May 31st until he was called as a witness. The plaintiff, in its endeavor to establish the fact that the 40 cent item of May 31st was furnished and delivered for this building, introduced its yardmaster's book, which contains the following entry:

"May 31, Nickerson's
20 ft. Bead Ceiling
20 ft. 1x2 stop."

Frank

—and follows that by proof of the following entry in the office books of the plaintiff corporation:

"May 31, 1905, for Hugh Morrison Delivered at Nickerson Teamster Frank 20 ft. No. 2 cedar ceiling, .40"

The bookkeeper was unable to identify the handwriting on the yardmaster's book, showing these entries. He thought, however, they were made by one Cooper. He could not identify the 40 cent entry, however, and was doubtful as to the word "Frank," saying that it was apparently a different handwriting from the balance of the entry. Hollister, secretary of the corporation, testified that he entered the name of the teamster on the yard slip. A question arose upon the trial over the admission in evidence of the yardmaster's book, and the bookkeeper's entry of the item, for the purpose of proving the delivery of the material to the contractor or at the building for which it was furnished. There can be no doubt but that charges made by the yardmaster and the company's officers at the lumberyard are not competent to prove a delivery of the material to a third party or at a point removed from the place of the actual delivery. 2 Ency. of Evidence, 641; White v. St. Phillips Church, 2 McMul. (S. C.) 306, 39 Am. Dec. 125. These entries were proper and competent for some purposes, and might be admissible to prove that the company delivered such material to the teamster; but it would take the evidence of the teamster, or some other person, who saw the lumber delivered or knew of its delivery, to prove an actual delivery at the place to which the company undertook to make delivery. If the delivery had been made to the defendants' agent, the case would be quite different; but this delivery seems to have been made to the plaintiff's own teamster, and would not prove a delivery to the defendants. There is an utter lack of evidence in this record to establish even a prima facie showing that the plaintiff furnished the item for the building charged, under date of May 31st, and it likewise fails to show that any work was ever done on the building after May 11th, or that any material was used therein. For this reason alone the plaintiff has failed to establish a valid lien. Where the materialman had furnished no material for 30 days, and during the last 20 days of that time the building was occupied by the owner, and in the meanwhile the contractor had returned material that was not used in the building, and the materialman had notice of all these facts, he cannot extend the time for filing a lien by proof that he thereafter sent to such building, for the contractor, 40 cents worth of material; there being no showing that such material was necessary for or used in the building under the original contract.

The question of trivial work, or a slight change or improvement, by the contractor, not being sufficient to extend the time for filing a lien, does not require our consideration in this case. Here the claimant has failed to establish the essential fact that it filed the lien "within 60 days after * * * it ceased to furnish material." The "20 ft. bead ceiling" item, for which the 40 cent charge is made, is not sufficiently established to extend the time for filing the lien. Plaintiff's counsel, with commendable zeal and much ability, has presented this phase of the case in the most favorable light possible for his client; but the lumber company has failed to furnish him with evidence to establish its contention, or show it in time in preferring its lien. In this case the owner paid the contractor for the job, and the latter failed and was unable to pay the company for the lumber used. Considerable time is consumed by appellants' counsel in arguing the proposition that it is incumbent on a materialman to show that the material furnished was not only "to be used in the building," but that it was actually used. Section 1 of the mechanic's lien law of February 7, 1890 (Laws 1890, p. 147), is the same as section 3660, Hill's Ann. Laws Or. 1892, and the point under consideration here was considered by Chief Justice Moore in Fitch v. Howitt, 32 Or. 206, 52 Pac. 192, and the following conclusion was reached: "The contractor, being in the nature of a special agent of the owner, with limited power, has authority to bind the property benefited for the payment of the reasonable value of such material only as is ordinarily sufficient to properly construct the building in accordance with the plans and specifications thereof, or in pursuance of the agreement entered into between the owner and the contractor." By section 1 of our lien law the "contractor * * * shall be held to be the agent of the owner for the purposes of this chapter." The contractor is a special agent for this purpose only, and the materialman must take notice of the limitations of the agency. It extends only to the purchase of material reasonably necessary out of which to build the structure in accordance with the contract entered into between the owner and the builder. The agency cannot bind the owner personally, but rather binds the property constructed or improved under the contract, and the charge is purely in rem.

Appellants complain of what they contend was a failure on the part of the plaintiff to establish at the trial that the material furnished was necessary for, or was used in, or was to be used in, this particular building. Morrison, the contractor, testified that he was engaged on about six buildings at the time he was at work on this contract, and that he used the Nickerson building as a central point of supply, and that he moved lumber from that place to other buildings as he might need it, instead of returning it to the lumberyard. Plaintiff's yards were in Clarkston, state of Washington, while this building and all the others on which Morrison was then engaged were in Lewiston, in this state. Since a new trial must be had in this case, the parties can produce their proofs as to the amount of material that was to be used in this building that was reasonably necessary for it, and it will be unnecessary for us to further consider that point here.

The judgment must be reversed, and a new trial will be granted. The plaintiff will be entitled to a judgment against the contractor for whatever amount may be found due from him to it. We assume, from what we gather from the record, that there is no reason for a new trial as to the lien; but, since a new trial must be had, it may be on the whole case, and, if the plaintiff should conclude that it has evidence to establish its lien within the purview of the law as herein construed, it may again be heard on that issue.

Judgment is reversed, and a new trial granted. Costs awarded in favor of appellants

WILKINSON v. BETHEL.

(Supreme Court of Idaho. Dec. 18, 1907.)

TRIAL—FINDINGS OF COURT—SUFFICIENCY.

Under the conditions of the pleadings in this case, held, that the following findings of fact are sufficient to support a judgment of dismissal in favor of defendant: "That plaintiff did not purchase or pay for the 30,000 shares which plaintiff claims defendant holds in trust for him; that the allegations of plaintiff's complaint herein are not supported by the evidence, and are untrue; that the allegations of defendant's affirmative defense are proven, and true."

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from District Court, Nez Perce County; Edgar C. Steele, Judge.

Action by George W. Wilkinson against J. H. Bethel. Judgment of dismissal and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John O. Bender, for appellant. Daniel Needham, for respondent.

AILSHIE, C. J. This is an appeal from the judgment. The assignments of error go to the sufficiency of the findings to support the judgment. The only allegation in the complaint is as follows: "That on or about September 20, 1905, plaintiff purchased from the Ozark Mining & Milling Company, Limited, a corporation, 50,000 shares of its capital stock, and paid the full purchase price therefor, $250, and said corporation issued 40,000 shares of said stock to the defendant, and said defendant still holds 30,000 shares of said stock for the plaintiff." To this complaint defendant answered as follows: "Defendant denies that on or about September 20, 1905, plaintiff purchased from the Ozark Mining & Milling Company, Limited, a corporation, 50,000 shares of its capital stock, or any other number of shares or at all, or that plaintiff paid the full purchase price therefor, $250, or any other purchase price or amount whatever or at all. Defendants admit that said corporation issued 40,000 shares of its capital stock to him. Defendant denies that he, said defendant, still holds 30,000 shares of said stock for the plaintiff, or that he ever at any time or at all held any stock whatever or at all for the plaintiff; and for a separate and special defense to plaintiff's cause of action defendant alleges that he is the owner and holder of 30,500 shares of the corporation stock of the said Ozark Mining & Milling Company, Limited." The cause was tried to the court without a jury, and at the close of the trial the court made and caused to be filed a document entitled, "Judgment of dismissal," the principal portion of which is a recital of facts the court finds from the evidence, ending with the conclusion of law "that the defendant does not hold 30,000 shares of the capital stock of the Ozark Mining & Milling Company in trust for plaintiff, or otherwise, or at all for plaintiff." The greater part of the findings is with reference to some purported agreement or contract that had been entered into between the plaintiff and his father and one G. A. Nehrhood in regard to the purchase of something like 150,000 shares of the capital stock of the Ozark Mining & Milling Company. None of these findings have the slightest reference to the issues as made by the pleadings (If, indeed, any issues were made by the pleadings). They were outside of the issues entirely, and not responsive thereto, and can in no way support the judgment in this case. The only findings which in any way refer to or are responsive to the issues are as follows: "That plaintiff did not purchase or pay for the 30,000 shares which plaintiff claims defendant holds in trust for him; that the allegations of plaintiff's complaint herein are not supported by the evidence and are untrue; that the allegations of defendant's affirmative defense are proven and true."

It will be seen at once that the pleadings and findings in this case were rather scant, and it is uncertain as to just what issue was being tried. The evidence is not in the record. We are inclined to think, however, that whatever issues were joined by the pleadings are covered by the foregoing findings of fact. Under the rule as adopted by this court in Eastwood v. Standard Mines & Milling Company, 11 Idaho, 195, 81 Pac. 382, that the appellate court will give to the findings of the trial court the most liberal construction consonant with the language employed in order to uphold the judgment, we are inclined to hold that the findings in this case are sufficient to cover whatever issues were made and to support the judgment in favor of the defendant.

Judgment affirmed, with costs in favor of respondent.

In re McVAY'S ESTATE.

(Supreme Court of Idaho. May 20, 1907. On Rehearing, Jan. 8, 1908.)

1. APPEAL—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR.

Under the facts of this case, held, that where a widow makes application to have a homestead set apart out of the real estate belonging to the estate of her deceased husband, and the probate court refuses to grant the petition and an appeal is taken to the district court, where a demurrer is interposed to the petition on the ground that it does not state facts sufficient to entitle her to a homestead, and the court sustains such demurrer and permits the petitioner to amend her petition, where it appears that the petition was sufficient without any amendment, the cause will not be reversed on the ground of the error of the court in permitting an amendment.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 4106, 4107.]

2. SAME.

As both parties proceeded upon the theory that the district court might try this matter de novo, it is not necessary for us to decide whether on such appeals the district court may try the case anew.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 2, Appeal and Error, §§ 1054, 1055.]

3. SAME—BOND—DEPOSIT OF MONEY.

Under the provisions of section 4778, Rev. St. 1887, a deposit of money equal to the amount of the required undertaking may be received in the place of the undertaking on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 2, Appeal and Error, § 2071.]

4. HOMESTEAD—RIGHTS OF WIDOW—SEPARATION OF HUSBAND AND WIFE.

Under the facts of this case, held, that the separation of the husband and wife was not permanent and was caused by his cruel and inhuman treatment, and that such separation was not voluntary, and not intended by her to be permanent.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 25, Homestead, § 264.]

5. APPEAL—REVIEW—IMMATERIAL ERRORS.

Under the provisions of section 4231, Rev. St. 1887, the court in every stage of an action must disregard any error or defect in the proceedings which does not affect the substantial right of the parties.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 4029, 4033.]

6. HOMESTEAD—PROPERTY SUBJECT.

Held, that the real estate referred to at the time of the decedent's death could have been selected for a homestead under the laws of this state by either himself or his wife.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 25, Homestead, §§ 286-289.]

7. JUDGMENT—EFFECT—PROBATE COURTS—JURISDICTION.

Article 5, § 21, of the Constitution, grants to the probate court exclusive, original jurisdiction in all matters of probate, and, as to such matters, the probate court is a court of record, and to the judgments, records, and proceedings of which absolute verity is attached.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 30, Judgment, § 1154.]

8. COURTS—DISTRICT COURTS.

Article 5, § 20, of the Constitution, grants to district courts original jurisdiction in all cases, both at law and in equity, and such appellate jurisdiction as may be conferred by law, from which a clear distinction is drawn between "in all cases both at law and in equity," and "matters of probate, settlement of estates of deceased persons and appointment of guardians."

9. SAME.

Under article 5, § 20, the Legislature is the sole and exclusive judge as to the extent and scope of the appellate jurisdiction that it will confer upon district courts. It may limit it to any case, or class of cases, or subject-matter, or it may not grant any at all; but the Legislature cannot grant to the district court original jurisdiction to hear and determine matters of probate and settlement of estates of deceased persons.

10. SAME — "TRIAL DE NOVO" — DISTRICT COURTS.

Trial de novo, as used in Laws 1903, p. 372, means "to try anew," or, "a second time"; that is, to retry the case upon the original papers, and upon the same issues as the case was tried in the probate court.

11. SAME—APPEAL FROM PROBATE COURT.

Under this statute and the Constitution, if an appeal is taken upon a probate matter upon questions of law alone, the district court may review such questions of law which appear upon the face of the record, and may affirm or reverse the decision of the probate court. When an appeal is taken upon both questions of law and fact, if the court should affirm the action of the probate court upon questions of law, the cause may then be tried upon the same questions of fact as were raised in the probate court, in the same way as other cases are tried in the district court.

12. HOMESTEAD—SETTING APART—RIGHTS OF SURVIVING WIFE.

A petition to set aside a homestead, under the provisions of Rev. St. 1887, § 5441, which sets forth the making and return of the inventory of the decedent, the description and ownership of the real property returned in the inventory, that such property was the property of the deceased and that its value did not exceed $5,000, and that no homestead had ever been designated or selected by deceased or his widow during his lifetime, is sufficient to entitle the widow to have the property therein described set off as a probate homestead.

13. SAME—PROBATE HOMESTEAD.

Under the provisions of Rev. St. 1887, §§ 5440, 5441, a probate homestead is one to be created by the probate court out of real property belonging to the decedent which was subject to a homestead at the time of the death of the decedent, and its value is less than $5,000, and was of such property as might have been occupied as a home at the time of the decedent's death.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 25, Homestead, §§ 286-289.]

14. COURTS — PROBATE COURTS — DECREE — BOND.

Where the probate court in a probate matter enters one judgment, and includes therein more than one order and the appeal is taken from the judgment, only one bond or one deposit of $100 under section 1 of the act of March 11, 1903 (Laws 1903, p. 372), is required.

15. APPEAL—CORRECTING RECORD—BOND.

Where an appeal is taken to the district court from the probate court, and the probate court fails to transmit to the district court the undertaking on appeal or the deposit in lieu thereof, the district court may, when it is so made to appear, direct the probate court to transmit such undertaking or deposit to the district court.

16. COURTS—APPEAL FROM PROBATE COURT—JUDGMENT OF DISTRICT COURT.

A judgment entered in the district court in a probate matter on appeal from the probate court is to be executed by the district court certifying such judgment to the probate court, with direction to execute the same in accordance with the terms thereof.

17. APPEAL—REVIEW—RULINGS.

Where evidence has been admitted which becomes immaterial under the law, it is not error for the district court to admit the same.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 4029, 4033.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from District Court, Fremont County; J. M. Stevens, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of David H. McVay, deceased. Petition of the widow to have a homestead set aside granted, and, from the order granting the same, certain of the heirs appeal. Affirmed.

Caleb Jones, for appellant. Soule & Soule, for respondents.

SULLIVAN, J. This is an appeal from the judgment of the district court setting aside certain real estate and personal property to Americus J. McVay, widow of David H. McVay, deceased, and holding that said property is community property of the said McVays; it having been acquired by them during the existence of their marriage. It appears from the record that the said McVays were married at Edgemont, S. D., in 1897, and soon after came to Idaho. On the 21st of July, 1898, they settled upon the land in controversy, which at that time was unsurveyed public land. Mrs. McVay at that time paid one George Summers $205 from her separate estate for his squatter's right to said land. Thereafter David H. McVay entered said land under the desert and homestead laws of the United States, and by reason of such entries acquired title to said land from the United States while he and his said wife were residing upon said land. The record shows that Mrs. McVay resided upon said land with the deceased until she was compelled by his cruel treatment toward her to leave his home, and reside elsewhere. It appears from the record that the McVays entered into some kind of an arrangement on or about November 9, 1904, whereby he was to furnish her $1,500, and she was to go away; that some time in November she left her home, and went to the state of Missouri, and thereafter returned to Colorado, and came back to Idaho in 1905. It appears that in March, 1905, McVay leased the land and personal property in question to one Oleson. Oleson took possession thereof, and McVay resided there with him until about the middle of May, when he became sick and went to St. Anthony, the county seat of the county in which said land was situated. He remained there some weeks, and was finally taken to St. Mark's Hospital, in Salt Lake City, Utah, where he died on the 13th or 14th day of July, 1905. His remains were brought back to Fremont county, Idaho, and buried there. It appears that on the 13th day of June, 1905, the said David H. McVay executed his last will and testament, bequeathing to said Levi Oleson all of his property, both real and personal, which will and testament was filed in the probate court of Fremont county on the 20th day of July, 1905, and the time fixed for hearing the petition for admitting said will to probate. At the time fixed, at the request of the attorney for the petitioner, the matter was postponed until the 11th day of September, 1905. It seems that a contest had been filed prior thereto, but the will was admitted to probate on the 15th day of September, 1905. Thereafter, on the 17th day of October, 1905, the widow presented her petition, praying that the court select, designate, and set apart a homestead out of the real property of the deceased for her exclusive use and benefit, which matter was presented to the court and taken under advisement, and was thereafter denied by the court. Thereafter an appeal was taken to the district court from said order refusing to set apart a homestead to the said widow, and also from an order refusing to set apart the exempt personal property to said widow. Thereafter the executor demurred to the petition of the widow, on the ground that her petition did not state facts sufficient to entitle her to a homestead or to the relief demanded or to any relief whatever, and that said petition did not state facts sufficient to give the court jurisdiction to select, designate, or set apart or cause to be recorded a homestead out of the property of the estate of said decedent. On the 7th day of June, 1906, the court sustained said demurrer, and, over the objection of the attorneys for the executor, permitted counsel to amend said petition, and on the following day the matter came on regularly for hearing, and a jury of 12 men were impaneled to render an advisory verdict to the court. Counsel for the executor thereupon moved that the appeal be dismissed on the ground that no undertaking had been filed or deposit made, which motion was denied. Thereafter a number of witnesses were sworn and testified, and certain documentary evidence introduced. The following interrogatories were submitted to the jury for their answers, and the answer to each interrogatory immediately follows it, to wit: "Q. Did David H. McVay give his consent and approval to his wife's going away from their home in Fremont county, Idaho? A. Yes. Q. Was Americus J. McVay, on account of her husband's cruel treatment towards her, compelled to abandon her home with him? A. Yes. Q. Was the absence of Americus J. McVay from her home with her husband enforced by his cruel treatment of her? A. Yes. Q. Where did Americus J. McVay reside at the time of and immediately prior to the death of David H. McVay? A. In Colorado. Q. If there was a division of the property, was it made with a view to a permanent separation? A. No. Q. Did David H. McVay and Americus J. McVay agree to separate as husband and wife and live apart? A. Yes; by fear. Q. If you find that they did so separate, was such separation mutually intended to be permanent? A. No. Q. If you find that they did so separate, was such separation voluntary? A. No. Q. If you find that they did so separate, did they thereafter look to one another for aid and support? A. Yes. Q. If you find that they separated, did they thereafter conduct their business entirely independent of one another? A. Yes; for the time being. Q. At the time of his death did David H. McVay reside upon the premises in question? A. He was away temporarily from home. Q. Did David H. McVay before his death leave said premises with the intention of taking up his residence elsewhere? A. No." The court thereafter made its findings of fact and conclusions of law, and entered judgment setting apart all of the real estate and personal property to the widow. The appeal is from that judgment.

A number of errors are assigned and a reversal of the judgment is asked. The first and second errors relate to the action of the district court in permitting the petitioner to amend her petition to set apart a homestead, and making such amendment by a pasteur slip attached to the original petition. We are not advised as to just what such amendment was, although we have two papers in the transcript, one entitled "Petition to Set Apart Homestead," and the other entitled, "Amended Petition to Set Apart Homestead," but the provisions of the amendment are not set forth. In our view of the matter, either the petition or the amended petition was sufficient to warrant the court in passing upon the question whether a homestead should be set apart to the widow or not. The record shows that the application of the widow to have a homestead set apart was contested, and considerable evidence was introduced pro and con. Before proceeding further, however, we will say that, as no amendment was required to give the court jurisdiction to act on said petition, the amendment did not affect it one way or the other. As both parties proceeded upon the theory that the district court might try said matter anew, or de novo, we shall proceed upon that theory without deciding whether on such appeals the district court may try the case anew.

A motion to dismiss the appeal on the ground that no undertaking had been filed on the appeal from the probate to the district court was made by counsel for the executor, which was resisted by the petitioner. It appears that the petitioner, instead of filing an appeal bond on the appeal from the probate court to the district court, had deposited the required amount of cash with the probate judge, and in the record sent up to the district court that fact was not shown, but was made to appear on the hearing of the motion. There was no error in the action of the court in denying such motion, as a deposit of money is authorized by the provisions of section 4778, Rev. St. 1887, instead of the undertaking.

A number of errors are assigned going to the admission of certain evidence. While some of the evidence was immaterial, we do not think it in any way prejudiced the rights of the contestant. The theory advanced by counsel for the contestant is that there was an agreement of separation between the petitioner and her husband whereby their property rights were all settled and adjusted, and that the petitioner was paid $1,500 as her part of the community property, and that they separated with the purpose and intention never to reside together again. The questions involved in said separation and the adjustment of their property rights were submitted to a jury, and the jury found, in substance, that the deceased gave his consent and approval to his wife's going away from their home in Fremont county; that on account of his cruel treatment she was compelled to abandon her home with him, and her absence from her home was enforced by his cruel treatment of her; that the division of property that was made was not made with a view of permanent separation; that she agreed to separate from her husband and live apart through fear, and that such separation was not mutually intended to be permanent, and was not voluntary; that at the time of the death of McVay he was away temporarily from the premises sought to be set aside as a homestead, and that he did not leave said premises with the intention of taking up his residence elsewhere. Those findings were all in favor of the contention of the respondent. After an examination of the evidence, we are satisfied that it supports the special findings of the jury and the findings deduced therefrom by the court. While there may have been some technical error in the admission and rejection of some of the evidence introduced and offered, we do not think it sufficient to demand a reversal of the judgment; for, under the provisions of section 4231 of the Revised Statutes of 1887, it is provided that any error or defect must be disregarded when it does not affect the substantial rights of the parties, and that no judgment should be reversed or affected by reason of such error or defect. We think, under the facts of this case, that the petitioner or widow is entitled to have a homestead and all exempt property set apart to her.

It appears from the evidence that the real estate described in the petition was the home and residence of the deceased; that he had leased it for one year to Mr. Oleson, from March, 1905; that he left it temporarily in May because of sickness; that he grew worse, and was taken to Salt Lake to a hospital to be treated; that he died therein July 1905. From the facts as shown by the evidence, the deceased or his wife might have had said real property set apart as a homestead at the date of his death. They were only temporarily absent therefrom. As this matter was tried upon the theory that the probate court had no authority to set aside a homestead unless out of property which could, under the law, have been selected as a homestead at the date of decedent's death, the facts of this case bring it clearly within that theory or contention, and for that reason we are not required to decide that question.

We have examined all of the assigned errors, and find nothing that would warrant a reversal of the judgment of the trial court. That judgment is therefore affirmed, with costs in favor of the petitioner.

On Rehearing.

STEWART, J. A rehearing was granted in this case, and the cause was argued orally, and all the questions presented by the appeal have been fully considered by the court.

Counsel contend that the original opinion falls to pass upon a number of questions presented by the record, and on other questions considered by the court a correct conclusion was not reached. We have therefore deemed it advisable to take up all the assignments of error and decide them. The facts are stated in the opinion delivered by Justice SULLIVAN.

When the cause reached the district court on appeal upon questions of both law and fact, a demurrer was filed to the petition, asking that a homestead be set off to Americus J. McVay. This demurrer was sustained by the district court, and permission was given the respondent to amend the petition by "paster slip." The record, however, shows that an amended petition was filed in the district court. No motion was made to strike the amended petition from the files, nor was any objection made to the amended petition, on the ground that the same was not made or filed in accordance with the permission of the court. Just what an amendment by "paster slip" means we are unable to say; but presume the court intended that the amendment might be pasted on to the original petition; but it is immaterial in this case just what an amendment by "paster slip" means, for the reason that an amended petition was filed.

The appellant assigns as error the action of the court in allowing the respondent to amend her petition in the district court. This assignment of error involves the question of raising new issues on appeal in the district court and of the amendment of pleadings. An examination of sections 20 and 21 of article 5 of the Constitution discloses at once the fact that the framers of that instrument saw fit to classify "matters of probate, settlement of estates of deceased persons and appointment of guardians" as separate, distinct, and aside from "cases at law and in equity," over which they gave the district court "original jurisdiction." It will also be seen from section 20 that "in all cases, both at law and in equity," from which they have clearly distinguished "matters of probate, settlement of estates of deceased persons and appointment of guardians," the district court has "original jurisdiction," and that in all other matters that the Legislature might provide for being heard in district courts the jurisdiction should be solely "appellate." The words "original jurisdiction" and "appellate jurisdiction" as employed in section 20 are used in the clearest and most unequivocal contradistinction to each other. By section 21 the probate courts are given the sole and exclusive "original jurisdiction" in all matters of probate. As to those matters, the probate court is a court of record, to the judgment, records, and proceedings of which, in such matters, absolute verity is attached in every respect as fully and completely as can attach to the records, judgments, and proceedings of district courts or other courts of record.

Clark v. Rossier, 10 Idaho, 348, 78 Pac. 358; In re Elmer and Alva Brady, 10 Idaho, 366, 79 Pac. 75. Under section 20, art. 5, of the Constitution, the Legislature is the sole and exclusive judge as to the extent and scope of the "appellate jurisdiction" that they will confer upon district courts. In other words, they may limit it to any case or class of cases, or subject-matter they may see fit, or they may not grant any at all; but it was never intended by this or any other provision of the Constitution that the Legislature could circumvent the clearest provisions and intent of that instrument by giving to the district court, under the guise of the right to try appeals, what amounts to an original jurisdiction to hear and determine matters of probate and settlement of estates of deceased persons.

It must be assumed that the Legislature when it passed the act of March 11, 1903 (Sess. Laws 1903, p. 372), providing for a trial "de novo" in the district court, on appeal from the probate court, in probate matters, was acting within the purview of the Constitution, and did not intend to go any further than to provide for the exercise of the "appellate jurisdiction" of the district court. Proceeding upon that assumption, let us see what trial "de novo" means. It is defined in Cyc. and Rapalje & L. L. Dictionary as "anew; a second time." In Paul v. Armstrong, 1 Nev. 96, the court, in considering the meaning of this term, said: "The statute says that upon an appeal the case shall be tried de novo in the appellate court. That is, as I understand it, in the same manner, with the same effect, and upon the issues tried in the court below." It would seem that the correct doctrine is stated by the Texas Court of Appeals in Ex parte Morales, 53 S. W. 107, wherein the court held that a trial "de novo" on appeal requires "that appeals be tried upon the original papers and upon the same issues had below." It is axiomatic that a cause or an issue cannot be tried de novo that has never been tried. Southern Pac. Co. v. Sup. Court, 59 Cal. 471. If there is no issue, there can be no case-made. "Appellate jurisdiction," as used in section 20 of the Constitution, is the direct antithesis of the words "original jurisdiction" in the same section. In the latest edition of Bouvier's Law Dictionary the words "appellate jurisdiction" are defined as follows: "The jurisdiction which a superior court has to rehear causes which have been tried in inferior courts." Similar definitions are given in numerous cases reported from the courts. See State ex rel. Williams v. Anthony, 65 Mo. App. 543; State v. Baker, 19 Fla. 19; In re Jessup's Estate, 81 Cal. 408, 21 Pac. 976, 22 Pac. 742, 1028, 6 L. R. A. 594; Dodds v. Duncan, 12 Lea (Tenn.) 731; People v. City of Chicago, 193 Ill. 577, 62 N. E. 196. The very expression, "appellate jurisdiction," refutes and contradicts any idea of filing new pleadings, and framing and settling issues in a court of such jurisdiction. The amendments of pleadings and filing new pleadings and joining issues suggest at once to the practitioner a court of "original jurisdiction" as the forum in which such practice and procedure is taking place. It is a practice and procedure not usually or ordinarily invoked or countenanced in courts exercising only appellate jurisdiction, and we are not prepared to believe that the framers of the Constitution ever intended to use the phrase in any uncommon, unusual, or extraordinary sense. Amendments should not be allowed in the district court on appeal from the probate court in a probate matter. Section 3 (page 373) of the act of March 11, 1903, supra, provides: "The appeal may be taken either upon questions of both law and fact. If taken upon questions of law alone, the district court may review any such questions which sufficiently appears upon the face of the record or proceeding without the aid of a bill of exception, but no bill of exceptions shall be allowed or granted in the probate court in probate matters. If the appeal be upon questions of both law and fact, the trial in the district court shall be de novo." That is, if the appeal is taken upon questions of law alone, the district court will review such questions of law as were raised in the probate court upon the record, but will not permit any new questions of law to be raised. If the district court sustains the appellant's views, then the judgment will be reversed, and the probate court directed to proceed accordingly. If, however, the district court affirms the judgment of the probate court, then the same is certified back to the probate court with the decision thereon. If the appeal be taken upon questions of both law and fact, then the district court proceeds to try, first, the questions of law, and, if the cause is reversed on questions of law, the questions of fact are not tried. If, however, the cause is not reversed on questions of law, then the same questions of fact as were tried in the probate court will be retried in the district court as other trials in said court are conducted. Witnesses may be called and may testify the same as in the trial of any other cause. In other words, this statute, under the Constitution, grants to the district court appellate jurisdiction to retry only the same issues of law and fact as were heard and determined by the probate court. Whatever judgment may be entered in the district court is to be certified back to the probate court for execution in accordance therewith.

Appellant also contends that the petition filed in the probate court was insufficient, and did not state facts sufficient to entitle her to the relief asked for or any relief; while respondent contends that the petition was sufficient and even goes to the extent of contending that no petition to have a homestead set off to the widow is necessary at all. Rev. St. 1887, § 5420, requires every executor or administrator to return to the court a true inventory and appraisement of all the estate of the decedent, including the homestead, if any. Section 5422 requires the appraisers to appraise the property embraced in the inventory. Section 5440 provides that "when a person dies, leaving a widow or minor children, the widow or children, until letters are granted and the inventory returned, are entitled to remain in possession of the homestead," etc. Section 5441 provides that "upon the return of the inventory, or at any subsequent time during the administration, the court or the probate judge may on his own motion or on petition therefor, set apart for the use of the surviving husband or wife, or the minor children of the decedent, all property exempt from execution, including the homestead selected, designated and recorded. If none has been selected, designated and recorded, the judge or the court must select, designate, set apart and cause to be recorded, a homestead for the use of the persons thereinbefore named, in the manner provided in this chapter, out of the real estate belonging to the decedent." Section 5448 provides that "if the homestead selected and recorded prior to the death of the decedent is returned in the inventory and appraisement, at not exceeding five thousand dollars in value, the probate court must by order set it off to the persons in whom title is vested by the preceding section." Taking these various provisions of the statute, it is apparent that the Legislature contemplated the setting off to the husband or wife or the minor children of the decedent two classes of homesteads: First, the homestead which had been selected, designated, and recorded prior to the death of the decedent; second, a homestead to be carved out of the real property of the decedent, by the probate court, for the use and benefit of the surviving husband, wife, or the minor children of the decedent. In the case at bar no homestead had been selected, designated, or recorded prior to the death of David McVay; therefore, whatever homestead could be set apart to the surviving widow, must be such as the court created out of the property of the deceased. Inasmuch as the statute provides that upon the return of the inventory or at any time subsequent the court or probate judge may on his own motion or petition set apart a homestead, the respondent contends that no petition was necessary in this case. As to the sufficiency of the petition filed in the probate court asking that a homestead be set aside to the petitioner, Americus J. McVay, the majority of the court are of the opinion that the petition was sufficient, as they contend that the nature and organization of the probate court and the character and class of subjects it has to deal with in probate matters makes it impossible to apply the ordinary principles of pleadings to their proceedings; that many of the orders provided for may be made upon motion of the probate judge himself or upon suggestion by the administrator or executor or a surviving husband or wife or an interested party in whose favor such order is made; and that the fact that an order is made in a probate proceeding upon the motion of the judge himself, or at the suggestion of an interested party, and without any petition or written pleading at all, does not prevent the party aggrieved from appealing and having the order or decision reviewed in the district court; and that in the case at bar the probate judge might have made an order setting aside a homestead without any written petition at all being made therefor, under the provisions of section 5441 of the Revised Statutes of 1887; that in the instances where the statute provides that a petition or complaint in writing is required, and what it shall contain, in such instances the statute must be followed; but in the case at bar the petition filed in the probate court stated every fact necessary to give the court jurisdiction to act and to grant the petitioner the relief asked for in the petition. In this conclusion of the majority of the court the writer of this opinion cannot concur. It is apparent from the reading of the statute that the probate judge must have before him certain facts in order to warrant him in creating a homestead where none had been selected. These facts are, first, that the applicant is a surviving husband, wife, or minor children of the decedent; second, that the real property was property of the decedent; third, that the property to be set off was a homestead—that is, property upon which a declaration of homestead had been filed, or property which could be created into a homestead at the time of the death of the decedent; fourth, that the value thereof did not exceed $5,000. If these facts appear to the probate court upon the return of the inventory, from the inventory itself, or such papers as have been filed in the case up to that time, and such facts are proven to the court, then the statute clearly authorized the probate judge to set apart a homestead to the surviving husband, wife, or minor children without any petition therefor. If, however, such facts do not appear, then it becomes necessary to present such facts by a proper petition alleging the same and proofs offered in support thereof. The Estate of Delaney, 37 Cal. 176; Cameto v. Dupuy, 47 Cal. 79. The necessary facts, in my opinion, did not appear in this case from the inventory and other papers on file; hence a petition was necessary. The petition filed in the probate court was not, in my opinion, sufficient to entitle the applicant to the relief therein asked, as it did not state the necessary facts sufficient to authorize the probate court to act.

This leads us to the consideration of the question as to what constitutes a homestead under the provisions of Rev. St. 1887, §§ 5440, 5441. As stated above, had a declaration of homestead been filed prior to the death of the decedent, it would have constituted the property therein named a homestead under these two sections. But in the case at bar no declaration was filed. Therefore it becomes necessary to consider the question as to what is a probate homestead, and what property may be set aside as such where none has been selected, designated, or recorded prior to the time of the death of the decedent. The homestead contemplated under these circumstances is one to be created by the probate court—that is, a probate homestead—and it may be created out of any property belonging to the estate which was subject to a homestead at the time of the death of the decedent—that is, was it property of the decedent; was it of a value less than $5,000, and was it such property as might have been occupied as a home at that time? In other words, was it land upon which a residence or dwelling house had been constructed which at the time of the death of the decedent could have been occupied as such? If so, it was property out of which the probate court could have created a homestead. It was not necessary that the husband and wife actually lived on the property at the time of the death of the decedent; but, if it were such property as could have been occupied by them, it is property which may be impressed with the homestead right, under the statute, as a probate homestead. Estate of Gallagher, 134 Cal. 96, 66 Pac. 70; In re Pohlmann's Estate, 2 Cal. App. 360, 84 Pac. 354. This being the law, it becomes immaterial in this case whether McVay and his wife lived together at the time of his death or were actually living upon the premises which she asked to be set aside as a homestead; the only question being, was the property such as could have been occupied by them as a homestead at such time? This clearly appears in the amended petition filed in the district court, and also by the proof. The fact that they were living apart, or the fact that McVay was absent from the premises and had leased the same, is of no consequence. Eproson v. Wheat, 53 Cal. 715; Wickersham v. Comerford, 96 Cal. 433, 31 Pac. 358.

The next question argued by counsel for appellant is that, when an appeal was taken from the probate court to the district court, the appellant deposited $100 with the probate court in lieu of the undertaking required by section 1 of the act of March 11, 1903. An examination of the record in this case shows that on the 17th day of October, 1905, the probate judge entered this judgment: "After duly considering the evidence and carefully examining the authorities cited, the court is of the opinion that the petition to set apart homestead and exempt personal property should be denied, and it is so ordered." The notice of appeal provides that the appeal is taken from an order made and entered in the probate court on the 17th day of October, 1905, refusing to set apart the homestead of said deceased David H. McVay to the petitioner, Americus J. McVay, and also from an order made and entered in the said probate court on the 17th day of October, 1905, refusing to set apart the exempt property of said deceased David H. McVay to said petitioner, Americus J. McVay. It will thus be seen that, while the notice of appeal specifies these two orders as separate orders, yet the judgment of the probate judge was single; both orders being covered by the same judgment. Therefore there is but one appeal, and that is from the judgment made by the probate judge on the 17th day of October, 1905, and the appellant was not required to deposit but $100 under the provisions of section 1 of the act of March 11, 1903. Where an undertaking on appeal or deposit is made, the appeal cannot be dismissed for failure of the probate court to certify that fact to the district court. When it appears to the district court that an undertaking on appeal has been given, or deposit made, the district court should order the probate court to certify the fact to the district court.

This opinion so far covers assignments of error 1, 2, 3, 33, and 34. Assignments of error from 4 to 32, inclusive, relate to matters involving the admissibility of evidence and other matters which become immaterial under the view of the law as announced in this opinion, as to what is a homestead, and out of what property it may be created by the probate court. Specifications of error 35, 36, and 37 relate to the definiteness of the findings of the court, and under the view of the law as herein announced the findings of the court are sufficiently definite and certain, and even go beyond the requirements of the law.

Under the rule announced in this opinion, it was error for the trial court to permit the petition of the respondent, and the objection and answer thereto by the appellant, to be amended in the district court. But this error in no way affects the respondent's right to recover in this action; and, as a different judgment could not have been rendered from the one the trial court did enter, it would not avail the appellant anything should the cause be reversed for such error. Under the provisions of section 4231 of the Revised Statutes of 1887, "the court must, in every stage of the action, disregard any error or defect in the pleadings or proceedings which does not affect the substantial right of the parties, and no judgment shall be reversed or affected by reason of such error or defect." This court does not feel disposed to reverse this case on the error committed by the trial court in permitting the pleadings to be amended in the district court, as the judgment of the trial court on the record was correct.

The judgment of the lower court will be affirmed; costs awarded to the respondent.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from District Court, Bonner County; W. W. Woods, Judge.

Action by Hattie E. Ames against Stephen B. Howes. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

R. E. McFarland, for appellant. C. L. Heitman, for respondent.

SULLIVAN, J. This action was commenced by the appellant to recover the title to certain mining claims. The action was brought in Kootenai county prior to the creation of Bonner county out of a portion of Kootenai, and this action was transferred to Bonner county. It appears from the allegations of the amended complaint that the husband of the appellant and the respondent became joint and equal owners of certain mining claims, they having discovered and located the same in 1897; that on the 4th day of September, 1899, while they were joint and equal owners of said mining claims, a corporation known as the "Grand Copper Mining Company," was organized under the laws of the state of Washington, and it is alleged that by fraud and deceit, and through fraudulent promises and representations, and without any consideration therefor, it induced said Ames and Howes to transfer by deed a three-fourths interest in and to said mining claims to said corporation; that thereafter, on the 3d day of April, 1900, the said Ames and Howes commenced an action in the district court of the First judicial district in and for Kootenai county against said corporation to recover the title to said properties, and to require said corporation to reconvey to them the mining interests so conveyed as aforesaid; that thereafter, on the 27th day of April, 1900, a judgment and decree was entered in favor of respondents, requiring the said corporation to reconvey to them said interests in said mining claims; that thereafter, on the 12th day of June, 1900, the said corporation, pretending to comply with the requirements of said judgment, executed and delivered to said Howes a quitclaim deed conveying to him an undivided three-fourths interest in and to all of said mining claims, which deed was on the 20th day of June, 1900, filed for record in the recorder's office of said county; and that said corporation executed and delivered to said Ames a quitclaim deed conveying to him an undivided one-fourth interest in and to said mining claims, which quitclaim deed was on the 20th day of June, 1900, duly recorded in the office of the county recorder of said county; that at all of said times said Ames owned and was entitled to an undivided one-half interest in and to said mining properties, and the said Howes was entitled to and owned only an undivided one-half interest in and to said mining claims; that, by the deed of conveyance conveying to said corporation the said mining claims, the said Howes pretended to convey to said corporation a three-fourths interest therein, but that he only owned an undivided one-half interest in said mining properties, and has never at any time owned any greater interest than one-half thereof; that at the time said deeds were executed by Ames and Howes to said incorporation there remained to the said Ames an undivided and undisposed of one-fourth interest in and to all of said properties, and that said quitclaim deed from the said corporation to the said Howes, which pretended and purported to convey to said Howes a three-fourths interest in said mining claims, in fact and in truth conveyed to said Howes only an undivided one-half interest, and that, if it should be held by the court that said deed from said corporation conveyed to said Howes a three-fourths interest in said claims, then one-third of said interest so conveyed belonged to, and should have been conveyed to, the said Ames, and that the said Howes has held that interest in trust for Ames. It is further alleged that on August 13, 1904, the said Ames died intestate, leaving no heirs, except his said wife, Hattie E. Ames, the appellant, and that he left no estate except his said interest in said mining claims, and that he at the time of his death left no unpaid debts. It is further alleged that said deed of said corporation conveying a three-fourths interest in said claims to Howes creates a cloud upon the title of the plaintiff as heir at law of said Ames, deceased, in and to the said undivided one-fourth interest in said mining claims. It is further alleged that on the 2d day of May, 1906, at Kootenai county, plaintiff made written demand upon defendant to convey to her as sole surviving heir at law of said Ames, deceased, the said one-fourth interest in and to said mining properties, but that said defendant for the first time then and there laid claim thereto, and refused and still refuses to convey to her said one-fourth interest. The prayer is that plaintiff be decreed to be entitled to an undivided one-fourth interest in and to said mining claims, and that Howes be compelled to convey to her by good and sufficient deed said interest, and that said Howes held said one-fourth interest as trustee for Ames, and now holds the same in trust for the plaintiff, and that said deed from the mining company be so reformed as to convey to said Howes only one-half interest in said claims, and that the cloud created by said deed to said one-fourth interest be removed, and that the title to the same be quieted. It will be observed that the complaint is drawn upon and proceeds upon the theory that Howes holds the title to said one-fourth interest in trust for plaintiff, and that he be compelled to convey said interest to the plaintiff. To the amended complaint was filed a demurrer based upon two grounds. The first was that said amended complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; and, second, that the alleged cause of action is barred by the provisions of section 4036 of the Revised Statutes of 1887 of Idaho. We will state here that, after the original complaint was filed, a demurrer was interposed thereto on the grounds above stated, and was sustained by the court, and the plaintiff given time in which to file an amended complaint. An amended complaint was filed, which was a copy of the original complaint, except that to the twelfth allegation of the complaint was added the following words, to wit: "For the first time then and there laid claim to the same, and." The demurrer to the amended complaint was based on the same grounds as the demurrer to the complaint. Before the demurrer to the amended complaint was decided by the court, counsel for respondent filed a motion to strike the amended complaint from the files, on the grounds (1) that it is identical in language with and the exact duplicate of the original complaint; (2) that on the 4th day of January, 1907, the court sustained defendant's demurrer to the original complaint on the ground that the action was barred by the statute of limitations, to which ruling of the court counsel for the plaintiff excepted, and was allowed 30 days from the 4th day of January, 1907, in which to prepare, file, and serve an amended complaint; that plaintiff did on the 14th day of January file said amended complaint, that the order so made on the 4th day of January sustaining the demurrer has never been appealed from, and is in full force and effect. Said motion was sustained by the court and the action was dismissed and judgment of dismissal entered. The appeal is from that judgment.

It is first contended by counsel for appellant that the demurrer to the complaint should have been overruled, for the reason the complaint shows that at the time the defendant and the deceased, Ames, conveyed the properties to said mining company, Ames held and owned an undivided one-half interest therein; that Ames and Howes joined in an action for the cancellation of the conveyance made by them to the mining company; and that, on obtaining a decree cancelling said conveyance, the mining company conveyed to the respondent Howes a three-fourths interest in said mining claims, and to said Ames a one-fourth interest. The facts there stated are correct, but it further appears from said complaint that Howes had conveyed to said mining company a three-fourths interest in said mining claims, and that Ames had conveyed to it only a one-fourth interest therein. There is no allegation in the complaint showing why that was done in that way, or showing whether it was done through mistake or not. Ames must have known that he only conveyed a one-fourth interest in and to said mining claims, and, under the decree of the court, the mining company reconveyed to him said one-fourth interest.

It is also alleged in said complaint that the mining company, under said decree and judgment, pretended and purported to convey to said Howes a three-fourths interest in said mining claims, when, in fact and in truth, it conveyed to him only an undivided one-half interest. The whole pleading, as we understand it, purports to allege that the mining company, disregarding said decree, conveyed a greater interest in said mining claims to said Howes than he was entitled to, and alleges that said Howes holds the same in trust for Ames. The demurrer to the complaint was sustained upon the ground that it appeared upon the face of the complaint that the cause of action therein mentioned was barred by the statute of limitations. We think that the demurrer was properly sustained, for the reason that, if there was any trust alleged in the complaint, it was a trust arising from an implication of law, an implied trust. It was not an express trust, as it is not alleged that it was created by contract; but arises from the fact that the mining company had conveyed a greater interest in said claims to Howes than he was entitled to, although it reconveyed to him just the same interest that he had conveyed to it. Express trusts are those which are created by the direct and positive acts of the parties by writing, deed or will. 3 Words & Phrases, p. 2611, and authorities there cited; Perry on Trusts, § 2425. It is stated in Wood on Limitations, § 200, as follows: "It is well settled that a subsisting, recognized, and acknowledged trust, as between the trustee and cestui que trust, is not within the operation of the statute of limitations. * * * And trusts which arise from an implication of law, or constructive trusts, are not within the rule, but are subject to the operation of the statute, unless there has been a fraudulent concealment of the cause of action, and the statute is as complete a bar in equity as at law." No fraud is alleged in the complaint against Howes, and no express agreement is alleged. We think the court correctly sustained the demurrer.

The appellant amended her complaint simply by inserting in paragraph 12 thereof the following words: "For the first time then and there laid claim to the same, and." In order that that amendment may be fully understood, we will here insert a copy of paragraph 12 as found in the original complaint, and following that a copy of paragraph 12 as found in the amended complaint: Paragraph 12 of the original complaint: "That on the 2d day of May, 1906, plaintiff made written demand upon the said defendant to convey to her, as sole surviving heir at law of the said George Ames, the said demanded one-fourth interest in and to said mining properties, but that the said defendant refused and still refuses to do so." Paragraph 12 of the amended complaint: "That on the 2d day of May, 1906, at Kootenai county, Idaho, plaintiff made written demand upon the said defendant to convey to her, as sole surviving heir at law of the said George Ames, the said demanded one-fourth interest in and to said mining properties, but that the said defendant for the first time then and there laid claim to the same and refused and still refuses so to do." It will be observed that in paragraph 12 of the original complaint appellant alleged that she demanded of respondent the said one-fourth interest in said mining properties, but that said respondent refused and still refuses to convey the same to her. In the amended complaint, the allegation, in addition to the ones in the original complaint, is that the appellant on that date, May 2, 1906, "for the first time then and there laid claim to said one-fourth interest." The question then arises, under the demurrer and motion to strike the second complaint, whether the amendment is such that the amended complaint on its face shows that this action is barred by the statute of limitations. No fraud is alleged on the part of the mining company or of Howes in the execution of a deed reconveying said mining claims to Howes. It appears from the allegations of the complaint that the mining company conveyed a one-fourth interest in and to said mining claims to Ames, now deceased, on the 12th day of June, 1900, and on the same date conveyed a three-fourths interest in and to said claims to the said Howes, and that they both filed their deeds for record in Kootenai county on the 20th day of June, 1900. It appears that Ames died in 1904, about four years after said reconveyances were executed. There were no allegations contained in the complaint as to the relations of said Ames and Howes during that period of time in regard to the possession of said mining claims. It does not appear whether they were working the mining claims or not; but it does appear that on the 2d day of May, 1906, about six years after the mining company had reconveyed said mining claims to Ames and Howes, and about two years after Ames' death, a demand was made on Howes for a conveyance of one-fourth of said mining claims to the appellant, and it is alleged that for the first time on the 2d day of May, 1906, Howes claimed to be the owner of said one-fourth interest. Perhaps the inference to be drawn from that allegation is that he had never claimed it before that date; but, as there is no allegation in the complaint sufficient to show that Howes held one-fourth interest under a contract or agreement with Ames to do so, no express trust is alleged; but there is sufficient in the complaint to show that, if Howes held said interest in trust at all, it was under an implied trust, and an implied trust comes within the statute of limitations. Section 4036, Rev. St. 1887, provides that actions for the recovery of real estate cannot be maintained, unless it appears that the plaintiff, his ancestors, etc., was seised or possessed of the land in question within five years before the commencement of the action. We gather from the complaint that Howes never owned the one-fourth interest in controversy; that the mining company conveyed it to him by mistake. That being true, Howes held that interest under an implied trust, and, as implied trusts come within the operation of the statute of limitation, the complaint on its face shows that the action is barred by the provisions of section 4036, Rev. St. 1887, and for that reason the court did not err in striking the complaint and entering a judgment dismissing the action.

While this was on motion, it raised the same questions as raised by the demurrer. It is contended that Ames and Howes were tenants in common of said mining claims, and that the law presumes the possession of all co-tenants, and, before the possession of one can become adverse, there must be an actual ouster, and, before a tenant in common can rely on an ouster of his co-tenants, he must claim the entire title to the land in himself, and must hold an exclusive and adverse possession. We find no fault with the proposition of law there stated, but in the case at bar there was a decree of a court of general jurisdiction, in a case wherein Ames was one of the plaintiffs, in which a decree was entered requiring the mining company to reconvey to Ames and Howes the title to said mining claims, and on the 12th day of June, 1900, the mining company did reconvey said mining claims, a one-fourth interest to Ames and a three-fourths interest to Howes, and said deeds were filed for record in the proper county. The filing or registration of that deed was notice to Ames that Howes had the title thereto so far as the mining company was concerned, and it is well settled that "the possession of one tenant asserting an exclusive right to the land under a deed conveying the land to him by specific description is adverse to co-tenants having notice of the deed. The registration of a deed under which a tenant in common claims exclusive right to the land is notice thereof to his co-tenants." Puckett v. McDaniel, 8 Tex. Civ. App. 630, 23 S. W. 860, and cases cited; Winterburn v. Chambers, 91 Cal. 171, 27 Pac. 658. The deed to Howes was recorded on June 20, 1900, and this action was commenced on May 7, 1906, nearly six years after the date of the conveyance to Howes. Under the provisions of section 4036, Rev. St. 1887, such actions as the one at bar must be commenced within five years from the time that the right accrues.

It is alleged in the complaint that on September 4, 1899, Ames and Howes, "by virtue and right of discovery and location, were joint and equal owners" of said mining claims, and on that date Ames conveyed a one-fourth and Howes conveyed a three-fourths interest therein to said mining company; that thereafter, under a judgment and decree, the mining company reconveyed to Ames and Howes by separate deeds just the share or interest in said mining claims that each had theretofore conveyed to it. If Howes only held one-half interest in said claims under the location notices thereof or deed, the fact that he conveyed a greater interest than he owned did not divest Ames of any interest that he owned therein, and a reconveyance by the mining company to Howes of just the interest that Howes had conveyed to it would not divest Ames of any part of the interest he owned in said claims. I must admit that I do not understand in what manner the transaction between Howes and the mining company divested Ames of any interest he owned in said claims. If A. sells and conveys real estate to C. that belongs to B., the legal title to which is in B., and C. thereafter reconveys the same to A., B. is not thereby divested of his title to said land, and, if the legal title to one-half of said mining claims was in Ames, the fact that Howes attempted to convey the same to said mining company, and thereafter said mining company reconveyed it to Howes, that transaction could in no manner affect Ames' title to said one-half interest thereto.

Judgment affirmed, with costs in favor of respondent.

EISENHAUER v. QUINN, Sheriff (GERARCI, Intervener).

(Supreme Court of Montana. Dec. 23, 1907.)

1. FIXTURES—UNLAWFUL ATTACHMENT—CONVEYANCE OF LAND.

Where S. wrongfully attached intervener's house, which was then a chattel, to lands belonging to S., and then conveyed the land and house to plaintiff, the house did not thereby become a part of the realty as between plaintiff and intervener, though plaintiff purchased, without notice of intervener's rights, under the rule that a chattel in order to become an irremovable fix-ture must be annexed to the realty by the owner of the fixture, or with his consent.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 23, Fixtures, § 6.]

2. SAME—REPLEVIN—IDENTIFICATION.

Where S. wrongfully attached intervener's house, while a chattel, to certain land belonging to S., and then sold the land with the house thereon to plaintiff, intervener was entitled to maintain replevin or claim and delivery to recover the house if it could be identified.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 23, Fixtures, § 70.]

3. SAME—BONA FIDE PURCHASER FOR VALUE.

Where S. wrongfully attached intervener's house, while a chattel, to land belonging to S., and then sold the land with the house to plaintiff, the fact that plaintiff was a bona fide purchaser for value was no defense to intervener's right to recover the house in replevin under the rule that in the absence of statute the defense of bona fide purchaser for value without notice is not available against the holder of the legal title, though it may be interposed as against the holder of an equitable title only.

4. ESTOPPEL—DEFENSE—PLEADING—NECESSITY.

Where S. wrongfully attached intervener's house, while a chattel, to certain land, and then sold the house and land to plaintiff, plaintiff could not claim that intervener was estopped to claim title to the house without pleading such estoppel.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 19, Estoppel, § 300.]

5. EXECUTION—INJUNCTION—BILL—ADEQUATE REMEDY AT LAW.

Intervener, having levied execution on a house for which he had recovered judgment, which house S. had wrongfully removed to certain land and then sold with the land to complainant, complainant sued to enjoin a levy, alleging that he had no plain, speedy, or adequate remedy at law, but did not allege that the sheriff was insolvent, that his official bond was not ample, nor any facts indicating that plaintiff's injury by the removal of the house could not be compensated by damages. Held, that the bill was defective for failure to show that plaintiff did not have an adequate remedy at law.

Appeal from District Court, Silver Bow County; Geo. M. Bourquin, Judge.

Suit by John Eisenhauer against John T. Quinn, as sheriff of Silver Bow county, and Tony Gerarci, Intervener. From a decree in favor of complainant, defendant and intervener appeal. Reversed and remanded.

W. D. Kyle and M. P. Gilchrist, for appellants. E. M. Lamb, for respondent.

HOLLOWAY, J. In September, 1901, Tony Gerarci was the owner of a certain two-room frame dwelling house, which he had purchased from H. L. Frank. The house was sold to Gerarci separate from the ground upon which it stood, and he immediately started to remove it to another location. One H. H. Smith thereupon wrongfully, without Gerarci's knowledge or consent, took possession of the house and moved it about, and finally located it at 132 West Platinum street, in Butte, partly upon ground purchased by him from Hayes Cannon, and partly upon land belonging to Cannon. In July, 1902, Gerarci commenced an action in claim and delivery against Smith and others to recover possession of the house. This action was not finally determined until 1904, when Gerardi recovered judgment for the possession of the house or its value. In the meantime, in 1903, Smith and Cannon sold to John Eisenhauer the land upon which the house then stood, and Smith assumed to sell the house also. Immediately after recovering his judgment, Gerardi had execution issued and placed in the hands of the sheriff. When the sheriff undertook to levy the writ, Eisenhauer instituted this suit to secure an injunction restraining the sheriff from removing the house. Gerardi filed a complaint in intervention. The sheriff answered. Issues were joined, the case tried to the court without a jury, and a decree rendered and entered in favor of the plaintiff. From that decree and an order denying a new trial, the defendant and intervener appeal.

In deciding the case the court said: "When Smith attached Gerardi's house to his (Smith's) realty it became a part of the freehold and passed to Eisenhauer on sale and conveyance to him by Smith, Eisenhauer being a bona fide purchaser without notice." In passing upon the motion for a new trial, however, the court held that when Smith seized the house, Gerardi should have asserted his right and should have prevented Smith from attaching the house to Smith's realty, and, after Smith had so attached it, Gerardi should have taken possession of it in his claim and delivery action, or should have filed a notice of lis pendens, and having failed to do any of these things, after Smith had sold the property to Eisenhauer, Gerardi was estopped to assert his claim of ownership as against Eisenhauer. These questions only need to be determined: (1) Where Smith tortiously attaches Gerardi's house, which was then a chattel, to land belonging to Smith and Cannon, by placing it upon a stone foundation, does the house thereby become a part of the real estate, as between Gerardi and Eisenhauer, so that by deed of land with its appurtenances and improvements Smith and Cannon could convey to Eisenhauer a title to the house sufficient to defeat Gerardi's claim to the house itself? (2) Is the defense that he was a bona fide purchaser for value, without notice, available to Eisenhauer as against Gerardi, the holder of the legal title to the house in question? (3) Is the defense of an estoppel available to Eisenhauer? And (4) does the complaint state facts sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to an injunction?

1. Upon the first proposition many decisions are cited by counsel for the respective parties, all bearing somewhat upon the general proposition, but, with a single exception, presenting facts so different from those in the case now under consideration that they do not render any aid in reaching a solution of the question before us. The exception noted is the case of Shoemaker, Miller & Co. v. Simpson, 16 Kan. 43, which is somewhat analogous to the case before us. Shoemaker, Miller & Co. owned certain bars of railroad iron, or rails, near Wyandotte, Kan. Simpson owned certain city lots in Lawrence. The Kansas Pacific Railway Company wrongfully took Shoemaker, Miller & Co.'s rails, hauled them to Lawrence, and with them and cross-ties laid a track over Simpson's lots for the purpose of hauling sand. The rails were taken without the knowledge or consent of Shoemaker, Miller & Co., and placed on Simpson's lots without his consent. Shoemaker, Miller & Co. brought an action in replevin against Simpson to recover the rails. Simpson defended upon the theory that when the rails were fixed to the cross-ties imbedded in his land, they thereby became a part of his real estate. The trial court found for the defendant, but on appeal the judgment was reversed, the Supreme Court saying, among other things: "We know of no way by which an innocent person can be permanently and legally deprived of his property against his will by the wrongs and trespasses of others, so long as it remains within the power of such innocent person to reclaim his property without committing any serious or substantial injury to the person or property of any other person." And again: "But we do not think that any innocent person can be deprived of the title of his personal property against his consent by having it attached without his consent to the real estate of another by a third person, where such personal property can be removed without any great inconvenience, and without any substantial injury to the real estate." The question, when does a chattel become a part of realty so that it passes as a part of such realty, is one most difficult of solution. It depends upon such a variety of considerations that every case must necessarily depend upon its own state of facts. There is no universal test whereby the character of what is claimed to be a fixture can be determined in the abstract. But one of the elementary rules of the law of fixtures is that a chattel, to become an irremovable fixture, must have been annexed to the realty by the owner of the fixture, or with his consent. Bronson on Fixtures, 73; 13 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law (2d Ed.) 604; Adams v. Lee, 31 Mich. 440; Cochran v. Flint, 57 N. H. 514; Lansing Iron & Engine Works v. Wilbur, 111 Mich. 413, 69 N. W. 669; General Electric Co. v. Transit Equipment Co., 57 N. J. Eq. 460, 42 Atl. 101. With the exception of property taken by judicial process, no one can be deprived of property to which he has the legal title, without his consent, unless he has estopped himself to assert his title. And where A. attaches B.'s chattels to A.'s realty wrongfully, and without the knowledge or consent of B., B. may maintain replevin, or claim and delivery, to recover the same, if the chattels can be identified. Bronson on Fixtures, 351; 13 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law (2d Ed.) 681; McDaniel v. Lipp, 41 Neb. 713, 60 N. W. 81.

There is no question but what the property in this instance was sufficiently identified by Gerardi, even though certain changes had been made in it after it left his possession. Under the facts disclosed by this record then, we hold that Gerardi did not lose title to his property by reason of the tortious acts of Smith; and this is true whether Eisenhower had knowledge of Gerardi's claim at the time he purchased the property or not.

2. But particular stress is laid by respondent upon the proposition that he was an innocent purchaser for value, without notice of Gerardi's claim. This contention, however, cannot prevail. Gerardi had the legal title to the house. Smith had not any title at all. It is a general rule in this country that, in the absence of statute, the defense of purchase for value and without notice is not available against the holder of the legal title. Gaines v. New Orleans, 6 Wall. (U. S.) 642, 18 L. Ed. 950; Stout v. Hyatt, 13 Kan. 232; 23 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law (2d Ed.) 482, and cases cited; 24 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law (2d Ed.) 1169; 19 Cyc. 1052. But such a defense may be interposed as against the holder of an equitable title only. 19 Cyc. above.

3. In denying the motion for a new trial the district court held that Gerardi had estopped himself to urge his title to the property, and in making the order said: "But for estoppel, I am of the opinion Gerardi would be entitled to recover even from Eisenhower, a bona fide purchaser." This position, however, is altogether untenable. Gerardi in his complaint in intervention set forth his claim to the property, and recited at length the history of his litigation with Smith concerning it. Eisenhower answered this complaint, but, though he had ample opportunity to do so, he did not plead an estoppel. In Capital Lumber Co. v. Barth, 33 Mont. 94, 81 Pac. 994, this court announced the rule as follows: "It is the general rule that matter of estoppel, to be effective, must be alleged. Where, however, there has been no opportunity to allege it, it may be given in evidence with the same conclusive effect as if alleged. In Isaacs v. Clark, 12 Vt. 692, 36 Am. Dec. 372, it is said: 'It is no doubt true that where the party has an opportunity to plead the estoppel he is bound to do it, and if he omits it, the jury will not be bound by the estoppel, but may find according to the facts. If, however, there has been no opportunity to plead the matter as an estoppel, it may, in general, be given in evidence, and it will have the same conclusive effect as in cases where it is pleaded. This is according to the current of the authorities, though they may not have been entirely uniform.'" However effective an estoppel might have been, if pleaded and proved, it is not available to Eisenhower in this instance, since he did not plead it.

4. Appellants contend that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action for an injunction. While the complaint alleges that plaintiff has no plain, speedy, or adequate remedy at law, there are not any facts stated from which such a conclusion could be drawn. If in removing the house the sheriff acted wrongfully and to plaintiff's injury, he would be liable. There is not any allegation that the sheriff is insolvent, nor that his official bond is not ample. Neither is there any allegation from which it can be said that the injury to plaintiff, by a removal of the house, could not be amply repaired by damages. It is elementary that before one can go into a court of equity he must show that he has not a plain, speedy, or adequate remedy at law. We think the complaint fails, in this regard, to state a cause of action for an injunction. In Wilson v. Harris, 21 Mont. 374, 54 Pac. 46, this court said: "If plaintiffs had a plain, adequate, and complete remedy at law, a court of equity should refuse to take jurisdiction; and, indeed, it would be without jurisdiction, for equity may act in those matters only in which no remedy is afforded in the ordinary course of law, or in which the remedy at law is deficient." See, also, McCormick v. Riddle, 10 Mont. 407, 26 Pac. 202.

The judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to grant a new trial.

Reversed and remanded.

NORTH REAL ESTATE LOAN & TITLE CO.
v. BILLINGS LOAN & TRUST CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of Montana. Dec. 23, 1907.)

1. TAXATION—ASSESSMENT—SEPARATE PARCELS OF LAND—SALE EN MASSE.

Rev. St. 1879, Fifth Div. §§ 1001, 1004, 1011, 1013-1015, 1030, 1035, 1037-1040, provide for the listing and assessment of land for taxes, and for the sale and redemption of land on which the taxes are unpaid, and, in case of town lots, that the name of the town in which the lots are situated, with a proper description thereof by number and blocks, shall be given, and Comp. St. 1887, Fifth Div. § 1696, provides that each tract of land and each town or city lot shall be assessed separately, except when one or more adjoining tracts or lots are returned by the same person in which case they may be assessed jointly. Held, that section 1696 did not change the law as it previously existed, and that a tax deed showing that several disconnected town lots were assessed together and sold en masse for a single sum was void.

2. APPEAL—DISPOSITION OF CAUSE—EQUITY CASE—FINAL JUDGMENT.

Where, in a suit to quiet title, it appeared that defendant's claim was void on its face, a decree for defendant would be reversed on appeal and the cause remanded with directions to enter judgment for plaintiff under Code Civ. Proc. § 21, as amended by Acts 2d Leg. Extr. Sess. 1903, p. 7, c. 1, requiring the Supreme Court in equity cases to finally determine the same, unless there appears cause for a new trial.

Appeal from District Court, Yellowstone County; Sydney Fox, Judge.

Action by the North Real Estate Loan & Title Company against the Billings Loan & Trust Company and others. From a judgment in favor of the Billings Loan & Trust Company, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

T. S. Hogan and M. J. Lamb, for appellant. Jas. R. Goss and W. M. Johnston, for respondent.

SMITH, J. The above-named plaintiff, a corporation, alleges in its complaint that it is the owner and in possession of lots 5 and 6, in block 52, of the city of Billings; that it has title in fee to the lots, and that the defendants, naming several, claim an estate therein adverse to it, which claims are without any legality. The prayer is that plaintiff be declared to be the owner of the lots, that the defendants be adjudged to have no right or title thereto, and that they be enjoined from asserting any claim thereto adverse to plaintiff. The Billings Loan & Trust Company, a corporation, was the only answering defendant. After denying the material parts of the complaint, it alleged affirmatively that it is the owner of the lots in question by virtue of a certain tax deed. The successive steps leading up to the issuance of the deed to one of the defendant's predecessors in interest are pleaded. Plaintiff by replication denies the validity of this tax deed, for the reasons, among others, "that it is void upon its face, and is of no force or effect whatever, and did not convey any right, title, or interest in or to said lots, or any of them to the defendant. * * * or any other person whomsoever." Other objections to the deed were raised, but we do not find it necessary to consider them.

The district court made findings of fact and conclusions of law in favor of the defendant, and entered a decree in accordance with the conclusions of law and the prayer of defendant's answer. The plaintiff thereafter made its motion for a new trial, which motion was overruled, whereupon it appealed from the judgment or decree and from the last-mentioned order. It appears from the bill of exceptions that, after the plaintiff had shown its chain of title by mesne conveyances through the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, the Minnesota & Montana Land & Improvement Company, F. T. Robertson and wife, and Austin North Company to itself, it rested its case. Thereupon defendant offered in evidence a county treasurer's tax deed, which reads as follows: "Know all men by these presents that whereas, the following described real property, to wit: Lots 20, 21, and 22 in block 6; lots 5 and 6 in block 52; lots 18 and 19 in block 53, city of Billings, situated in the county of Yellowstone, and territory of Montana, was subject to taxation for the year A. D. 1886, and, whereas, the taxes assessed upon said real property for the year or years aforesaid, remained due and unpaid at the date of the sale hereinafter named; and whereas, the treasurer of said county did, on the 25th day of February, A. D. 1887, expose at public sale, at the court house, in the county aforesaid, in substantial conformity with all the requirements of the statute in such case made and provided, the real property above described, for the payment of the taxes, interest and cost then due and remaining unpaid on said property; and whereas, at the time and place aforesaid, Jas. R. Goss of the county of Yellowstone, and Territory of Montana, having offered the sum of eight dollars and 57 cents, being the whole amount of taxes unpaid on said property, which was the least quantity bid for, and payment of such sum having been made by him to the said treasurer, the said property was stricken off to him at that price; and whereas, the time of redemption having elapsed since the date of said sale, and the said property has not been redeemed therefrom as provided by law: Now therefore, I, A. S. Douglas, treasurer of the county aforesaid, for and in consideration of the sum, to the treasurer paid as aforesaid, and by virtue of the statute in such case made and provided, have granted, bargained, and sold, and by these presents do grant, bargain and sell unto the said Jas. R. Goss, his heirs and assigns, the real property last here described. To have and to hold unto him the said Jas. R. Goss, his heirs and assigns, forever. In witness whereof, I, A. S. Douglas as aforesaid by virtue of authority aforesaid as aforesaid, have hereunto subscribed my name on the seventh day of May, A. D. 1888. A. S. Douglas, County Treasurer." To the introduction of this deed in evidence the plaintiff's counsel interposed the following objection: "That it is a deed to a private individual, and not to the county, and shows that three separate noncontiguous pieces of property are included therein, and in the recitals thereof it appears that the three parcels were sold together, and that the whole of said three tracts of land were purchased as the least quantity bid for." The court overruled the objection, and admitted the deed in evidence. Thereupon defendant introduced in evidence, over plaintiff's objection, a deed from Jas. R. Goss and wife to Albert Carswell, a deed from Carswell to Wm. Read, and a deed from Read and wife to the defendant, all purporting to convey lots 5 and 6 in block 52, and, after one Burton had testified that the property was vacant and unoccupied, rested its case. There was no rebuttal testimony, and the plaintiff thereupon asked for a judgment in its favor "for the reason that the defendant has failed to make any defense to the action." This motion was denied and a decree entered for the defendant, as before stated. No evidence as to adverse possession or abandonment was offered at the trial, and the question of laches is not discussed in the briefs, and was not touched upon in the argument.

The property in question was assessed for taxes by virtue of the provisions of Rev. St. Mont. 1879, Fifth Div. A reference to those statutes discloses the following provisions:

"Sec. 1001. Every tax levied under the provisions of this chapter is hereby made a lien against any and all the property assessed, and such lien shall attach at the time of such assessment, and shall not be satisfied or removed until such taxes are paid."

"Sec. 1004. Every inhabitant of this territory, of full age and sound mind, shall list all property subject to taxation in this Territory of which he is the owner," etc.

"Sec. 1011. The district assessors of each county shall assess and value all property required by the provisions of this article to be assessed and valued, and between the first day of February and the tenth day of September in each year, shall demand of each tax payer in his district a list, as hereinafter provided, of his, her, or their property," etc.

"Sec. 1013. The list shall contain: First: His, her, or their lands, to be designated by township, range, section, and any division or part of section; and where such part is not a government division or subdivision, then some other description to identify it; and his town lots, naming the town in which they are situated, and their proper description, by number and blocks, or otherwise, according to the system of numbering in the town.

"Sec. 1014. Before proceeding to assess any property under the provisions of this article, it is hereby made the duty of the assessor to administer to the person about to be assessed the following oath or affirmation: [giving form of oath] And to ask him, among other questions, the following: How many town lots do you own? Where are they? Describe them.

"Sec. 1015. On or before the tenth of September, annually, the assessor shall make out and deliver to the county clerk an assessment roll, containing in tabular form and alphabetical order, the names of the persons and bodies in whose names property has been listed in his district, with the several species of property and the value, as hereinafter indicated, with the columns of numbers and value footed," etc.

"Sec. 1030. The treasurer shall give notice of the sale of real property. * * * Such notice shall contain a notification that all lands on which the taxes of the preceding year or years, naming it, have not been paid, will be sold, and the time and place thereof, with a list of the lands," etc.

"Sec. 1035. The county treasurer shall make out, sign and deliver to the purchaser of any real property sold for the payment of taxes as aforesaid, a certificate of purchase, describing the property on which the taxes and costs were paid by the purchaser, as the same was described in record of sales, and also how much and what part of each tract or lot was sold, and stating the amount of each kind of tax, interest and costs, for each tract or lot for which the same was sold, as described in record of sales, and that payment has been made therefor. If any purchaser shall become the purchaser of more than one parcel of property, he may have the whole included in one certificate."

"Sec. 1037. Real property sold under the provisions of this article may be redeemed at any time before the expiration of one year from the date of the sale, by the payment to the treasurer of the proper county, to be held by him subject to the order of the purchaser, of the amount for which the same was sold and subsequent taxes," etc.

"Sec. 1038. The county treasurer shall, upon application of any party to redeem any real property sold under the provisions of this article, and being satisfied that such party has the right to redeem the same, and upon the payment of the proper amount, issue to such party a certificate of redemption, setting forth the facts of the sale, substantially as contained in certificate of sale," etc.

"Sec. 1039. Immediately after the expiration of the time allowed for the redemption of any land sold for taxes under the provisions of this article, the treasurer then in office shall make out a deed for each lot or parcel of land sold and remaining unredeemed, and deliver the same to the purchaser upon the return of the certificate of purchase; * * * any number of parcels of land bought by one person, may be included in one deed, as may be desired by the purchaser."

Section 1040 provides a form of tax deed, of which the one received in evidence in this case is a substantial copy.

It will be seen from the foregoing quotations that at the time these lots were assessed and sold for taxes the law required that the owner should furnish to the assessor a list of his property; and, in case of town lots, that he should name the town in which they were situated, and give a proper description thereof by number and blocks, and that from the lists so obtained the assessor should make out an assessment roll containing the names of the persons who had listed property in his district, together with the several species of property and the value thereof. The Legislature of 1887 passed a law providing that "each tract of land, and each town or city lot, shall be valued and assessed separately, except when one or more adjoining tracts or lots are returned by the same person, in which case they may be valued and assessed jointly." Comp. St. 1887, Fifth Div. § 1696. The Supreme Court of California in the case of Terrill v. Groves, 18 Cal. 149, said this: "The act of April, 1857, under which these proceedings were taken, in the fourth section provides that the assessor shall set down in his assessment book (1) the names of all taxable inhabitants; (2) all real estate and improvements on public lands taxable to each, giving the metes and bounds, or describing by lots or fractions of lots; (3) the cash value of all improvements on real estate, etc. We think the true meaning of the provision is to require a separate assessment and valuation of each lot in cases like this of city property. If a man owned a hundred lots, or if, after the assessment, he sold some of them, and it became necessary or desirable to pay the taxes on a part of the property, it would be impossible to do so without paying the full amount assessed. It was evidently the intention of the statute that each lot should be made to bear its own portion of the public burdens, and a great deal of confusion and injustice would grow out of a gross assessment of several lots, and a sale in gross for the payment of the general tax. This construction seems to be given to the provisions of statutes not very dissimilar in Maine and Ohio (Shimmin v. Inman, 26 Me. 228, and Willey v. Scoville's Lessee, 9 Ohio, 43), and we think it warranted by the language of our own act." We are of opinion that the passage of section 1696, supra, by the Legislature of 1887, added nothing to the duties of the assessor as the same were indicated by the provisions of the Revised Statutes of 1879, above quoted.

In the case of Casey v. Wright, 14 Mont. 315, 36 Pac. 191, the court said: "In Terrill v. Groves, 18 Cal. 149, a case very similar to the one under consideration, the court says: 'The plaintiff claims under a tax deed. It seems that these lots were assessed as the property of one Alonzo Green. They were separately listed, but valued jointly, and the aggregate tax on all of them, and two other lots in other blocks, set down. The lots sued for were contiguous to each other, and formed a part of block No. 28 on the plan of the city. These lots were put up and sold together for the aggregate amount of this tax. The appellants contend that this was illegal, and that the sale and the consequent deed were void; and we are of the same opinion.' We think the authorities are almost unanimous that such a sale is void." In the case of Emerson v. Shannon, 23 Colo. 274, 47 Pac. 302, 58 Am. St. Rep. 232, the court said: "The defendant, to maintain his title at the trial, offered in evidence a tax deed, purporting to convey lands sold for delinquent taxes en masse for a gross sum, viz. [Here follows description of the land.] We have just held in the case of Crisman v. Johnson, 23 Colo. 264, 47 Pac. 296, 58 Am. St. Rep. 224, that under our statute it is lawful for the authorities to assess and sell en masse, for delinquent taxes, a number of town lots. Section 3822, Mills' Ann. St., provides for such assessment if the lots are listed by the same person; and section 3894 provides that, 'when * * * adjoining lots are offered as the property of the same person, one or more may be sold for the taxes of all.' It is not necessary to determine whether, when all our statutes on the subject are considered, it is permissible to sell for taxes several tracts of contiguous acre property, as such a case is not presented, as the description given of the several tracts in the treasurer's deed will only apply to lands that are not contiguous, but widely separated and in different townships. It shows that these noncontiguous tracts were sold together for a gross sum. When this instrument was offered in evidence for the purpose of showing title in the defendant, the court properly rejected the same. The authorities are uniform that such a deed is absolutely void." In the case of Speed v. McKnight, 76 Miss. 723, 25 South. 872, the court said: "The assessment under which this property was sold and the sale were utterly void. * * * The assessment here was the act of the sheriff, and the lots were physically widely separated and of different values, as shown by proof, and should not have been sold as one tract." In the case of National Bank of Augusta v. Baker Hill Iron Co., 108 Ala. 635, 19 South. 47, this language is found: "There can be no sort of doubt that the tax sale and deed under which plaintiff claims were absolutely void, for the reason that the assessment and sale were not made in compliance with the statutory requirements. * * * The assessment in question * * * embraced a great many pieces of property, none of which were valued separately, as required by section 33 of the act (Acts 1868, p. 310), but all were assessed at one gross valuation. * * * Finally, the property was not offered for sale by sections or parts of sections, as required by section 79 (page 321), but was sold en masse, though there were many different and disconnected subdivisions of sections." In Cocks v. Simmons, 55 Ark. 104, 17 S. W. 594, 29 Am. St. Rep. 28, it was said: "By the recitals of the deed four sections of land severally assessed were sold in a body for the sum of the taxes due upon all. Each section was thereby sold for the taxes due upon each of the others, as much as for the taxes due upon it. Such a sale is absolutely void, for the collector has no more authority to sell one tract of land for a tax due upon another than for a store account or other ordinary debt." In Cornellus v. Ferguson, 16 S. D. 113, 91 N. W. 460, it was said: "But the deed, when read in connection with the eighth finding of fact, is clearly shown to be void, as the court in the latter finding finds that the lots for the year 1889 were sold in bulk for the gross sum of $59.55. Reading, therefore, the two findings together, the court was clearly right in its conclusions of law that the tax deed was void on its face." The Supreme Court of Iowa, in Ackley v. Sexton, 24 Iowa, 320, used this language: "This tax deed was void upon its face, because it embraced several distinct tracts of land, which purported to have been sold en masse for a gross sum. It was precisely such a deed as has been adjudged void on its face by prior decisions of this court." Judge Cooley, in his work on Taxation (2d Ed.) p. 493, thus expresses his views on the subject under consideration: "To group lands in the sale which are assessed as separate interests is incompetent, even though they be owned by the same person. Each parcel is chargeable with its own taxes, and is to be redeemed by paying them; but such a joint sale charges it with the tax upon the other also, and is like issuing one execution upon several judgments, and selling jointly the lands which are charged with separate liens. It may or may not be important to the owner that he have the opportunity of a separate redemption, but the fact that it possibly may be so is sufficient reason why the law should protect the right." See, also, Cartwright v. McFadden, 24 Kan. 622; Wyer v. La Rocque, 51 Kan. 710, 33 Pac. 547; Weeks v. Merkle, 6 Okl. 714, 52 Pac. 929; Lowenstein v. Sexton, 18 Okl. 322, 90 Pac. 410; Barnes v. Boardman, 149 Mass. 106, 21 N. E. 308, 3 L. R. A. 785; Gibson v. Kueffer, 69 Kan. 729, 77 Pac. 282.

In reply to the contention of the appellant, counsel for the respondent calls attention to section 1039 of the Revised Statutes of 1879, supra, which provides that any number of parcels of land bought by one person may be included in one deed, if the purchaser so desires, and numerous cases are cited from other states to uphold this proposition. Under the statute, there is no doubt that a deed would not be invalid because it conveys a number of lots or parcels of lands; but it is equally clear to us that, where a deed shows on its face that several noncontiguous parcels of property were sold en masse, the deed is void. The deed received in evidence in this case shows, on its face, that certain lots in blocks 6, 52, and 53, in the city of Billings, were assessed together, and that they were sold en masse for $8.57. We know, of course, that blocks in cities and towns are bounded by streets and alleys, and it therefore follows that the lots in these different blocks could not be adjoining lots. As was indicated by the Supreme Court of California and also by Judge Cooley, supra, the object of the statute undoubtedly was to provide that the officers' books should show the tax which attached as a lien to each separate lot, piece, or parcel of land, so as to enable the owner, or his successor in interest, to redeem any one lot by paying the tax thereon, without any obligation to pay the tax on other lots in order to clear the title to the particular lot. It seems to us that this is a reasonable right or privilege secured to the owner, and that the courts have properly by their decisions recognized and protected the same. We hold that the tax deed received in evidence in this case is void on its face, and ought not to have been considered by the trial court.

This being an equity case, and no cause appearing why a new trial or the taking of further evidence should be ordered, it is our duty to finally determine the same. Code Civ. Proc. § 21, as amended by the Legislature in Acts 2d Leg. Ex. Sess. 1903, p. 7, c. 1. It is therefore directed that the judgment and order appealed from be, and the same are hereby, reversed, and the cause is remanded to the district court of Yellowstone county, with instructions to enter a judgment in favor of the plaintiff in accordance with the prayer of its complaint.

Reversed and remanded.

ANDERSON v. RED METAL MINING CO.

1. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE—APPEAL—APPELLATE JURISDICTION.

Though under the express provisions of Const. art. 8, § 21, a justice's court has no equity jurisdiction, and where the justice has no jurisdiction the district court can acquire none on appeal, except to dismiss the appeal and render judgment for costs, yet a person who has mistakenly assumed that he is entitled to equitable relief, and has formed his pleadings accordingly, will not on appeal from the justice to the district court be turned out of court if upon any theory of his pleadings he is entitled to other relief, since under the express provisions of Const. art. 8, § 23, there is but one form of action, and law and equity may be administered in the same case.

2. SAME—JURISDICTION—CIVIL ACTIONS.

Under the express provisions of Const. art. 8, § 21, a justice's court has no equity jurisdiction. An action was brought in a justice's court on an account for labor performed for defendant company by one to whom the account had been assigned, who also prayed that another alleged assignment of the account to other parties who were made defendants should be declared void. A demurrer of the defendant assignees to the complaint was sustained. Held that the case being disposed of in so far as it involved equitable relief, the justice could properly decide the remaining legal question of the defendant company's liability to plaintiff on the account, under Code Civ. Proc. § 66, subd. 1, giving a justice's court jurisdiction of actions arising on contract for the recovery of money only, etc.

3. SAME—INTERPLEADER—SCOPE OF REMEDY—LEGAL ACTIONS.

Code Civ. Proc. § 588, provides that a defendant against whom an action is pending upon a contract may, before answer upon affidavit that without collusion with affiant, a person not a party, makes a demand upon such contract, obtain an order of court substituting such person in his place, etc., on his depositing in court the amount claimed, and the action of the interpleader may be maintained and plaintiff be discharged from liability to the conflicting claimants, though their claims have not a common origin, but are adverse and independent of one another. In an action by an assignee on an account, in which others claiming the account by virtue of a levy under their execution against the assignor were made defendants, a justice of the peace ordered a substitution of the assignor and the other defendants for the debtor. Held, that the order of substitution did not convert the legal action into an equitable one, so as to deprive the justice of jurisdiction, since the provision for an interpleader was intended to cover both legal and equitable cases.

4. INTERPLEADER—PROCEEDINGS—EFFECT OF FAILURE TO FILE AFFIDAVIT—WAIVER.

Though the formal affidavit required by the section was not filed, but the application for substitution was made on the amended answer, the irregularity was waived where the substituted parties became defendants without objection.

5. APPEAL—TRANSFER OF CAUSE—NOTICE—"ADVERSE PARTY."

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1760, providing that, when an appeal is taken, a notice thereof must be served on the adverse party, etc., an adverse party is one who has an interest in opposing the object sought to be accomplished by the appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 2, Appeal and Error, §§ 2136-2139.]

6. SAME.

Where an action is brought on an account by an assignee thereof, and the debtor interpleads the assignor and another claimant of the account, and the assignor disclaims any interest, admitting the assignment to plaintiff, the assignor is not an adverse party on whom notice of an appeal must be served by plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 2, Appeal and Error, §§ 2136-2139.]

7. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE—APPEAL—TRIAL DE NOVO—DEMURRER.

An assignee of an account suing in justice's court asked for judgment against the debtor, and that the claim of P. to the same account be declared void. P.'s demurrer was sustained. The debtor then interpleaded P. and the assignor, who, on being brought in, both answered, P. making no objection that the complaint did not raise any issue as to the right between himself and plaintiff, but setting up his claim under a levy of execution. Judgment was rendered for P., and plaintiff appealed to the district court, where P. again submitted his demurrer offered before the justice. Held, that the court properly overruled such demurrer, since, when the justice sustained it, on the ground that he could not grant the relief asked against P., he practically dismissed P. from the case, and the demurrer had done its work.

8. APPEAL—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF IMPROPER EVIDENCE.

In an action on an account by an assignee, where defendants offer no evidence, but rest their case entirely upon their objection to the jurisdiction, the admission of incompetent evidence as to the consideration for the assignment is not prejudicial where there is no question as to the sufficiency of the consideration nor as to whether it was for value.

9. SAME—PRESUMPTIONS.

Where it appeared that the parties and the judge proceeded upon the assumption that the amount in controversy had been paid into the justice's court, and that at the time of trial it was in the clerk's possession, and the answer of another defendant recited that the money had been paid to the justice, a verdict by direction of the court that plaintiff "is entitled to the sum of $94 heretofore paid into court" will not be reversed for lack of evidence that any sum had been paid into court, since it will be presumed that the fact that the money had been paid to the clerk was ascertained by the court before it adjudged that the sum belonged to plaintiff.

10. INTERPLEADER—JUDGMENT—INTEREST.

In a trial on an interpleader, it is error in giving judgment for the sum in dispute to award interest on it against the interpleader defendant during the time it was in the custody of the court.

Appeal from District Court, Silver Bow County; Geo. M. Bourquin, Judge.

Action by A. E. Anderson against the Red Metal Mining Company, Paris Bros., and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants Paris Bros. appeal. Modified and affirmed.

L. P. Forestell and I. A. Cohen, for appellants. Donovan & Meizer, for respondent.

BRANTLY, C. J. This action originated in a justice of the peace court. It was brought to recover a judgment against the Red Metal Mining Company, hereinafter referred to as the "company," upon an account for $94 for labor performed for the company during September, 1907, by one Frankovich, which the plaintiff alleges had been assigned to him for value. Frankovich and Paris Bros., a co-partnership, were made parties defendant. The complaint contains allegations sufficient to state a cause of action against the company. No attempt is made to state a cause of action against Frankovich, nor in the prayer is judgment demanded against him. As to the appellants Paris Bros., it is alleged that they claim to be the assignees of the account under an assignment by Frankovich, but that this assignment is a forgery, and therefore void. In the prayer the plaintiff demands that the Paris Bros.' assignment be declared void, and that he have judgment for the amount of the account and for costs. Paris Bros. interposed a general demurrer to the complaint, which was sustained. The company filed an answer. After the demurrer of the Paris Bros. was sustained, it filed an amended answer, which was verified, in which it admitted all the allegations of the complaint, except as to the merits of the respective assignments of the plaintiff and Paris Bros. As to these, it is alleged that it had no knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief, and, further, that both plaintiff and defendants Paris Bros. were claiming the money due on the Frankovich account under their alleged assignments. It concluded with a prayer that an order be made allowing it to pay into court the amount of the account; that Frankovich and Paris Bros. be substituted as parties defendant in its stead; that the action be dismissed as to it; and that the plaintiff and Paris Bros. be required to submit their respective claims for determination. The order prayed for having been made, the company paid the amount of the account to the justice. Frankovich filed his answer, admitting that he had assigned the account to the plaintiff, and alleging that he had never after made any claim to the amount due thereon. Paris Bros., without objection and apparently without formal notice of the order, answered. After putting in issue the material allegations of the complaint, they allege, as the basis of their claim, that during the month of October, 1906, Frankovich being indebted to them to the amount of $109, they instituted an action against him to recover the same; that they had caused an attachment to issue and to be levied upon the moneys due him from the company, to secure the payment of the judgment which it sought to recover in the cause; that judgment was duly given and made in said cause in their favor, and against Frankovich for the sum of $100 and costs; that they thereupon caused an execution to be issued thereon, and to be levied upon the moneys in the hands of the company, and that, by reason of these facts, the moneys in the hands of the court belonged to the defendants Paris Bros., and not to the plaintiff. A trial on the issue thus framed resulted in a judgment in favor of the Paris Bros. Thereupon the plaintiff appealed to the district court. His notice of appeal was not served on Frankovich. When the record was filed in the district court, counsel for Paris Bros. moved to dismiss the appeal on the ground that the court was without jurisdiction of the action or of the appeal. This motion was overruled. The demurrer of Paris Bros., interposed before the order of substitution was made, was submitted to the district court, but was overruled. The trial resulted in a judgment for plaintiff; defendants Paris Bros. declining to offer any evidence, but contenting themselves with their general objection to the jurisdiction of the court to entertain the appeal and try the case. These defendants have appealed to this court from the judgment and an order denying them a new trial.

The contention is made that it is manifest from the complaint filed in the justice's court that the relief sought by the plaintiff is equitable in its nature, and that, since under the Constitution (article 8, § 21) a justice's court has no equity jurisdiction, it had no power to proceed with the trial, hence the jurisdiction of the district court did not attach by virtue of the appeal, in that its jurisdiction on appeal is the same as that of the justice's court. It has frequently been held by this court that, if the justice's court has no jurisdiction of the subject-matter in a particular case, the district court on appeal acquires none, except to dismiss the appeal and render judgment for costs. Gassert v. Bogk, 7 Mont. 585, 19 Pac. 281, 1 L. R. A. 240; Shea v. Regan, 29 Mont. 308, 74 Pac. 737; Oppenheimer v. Regan, 32 Mont. 110, 79 Pac. 695. It does not necessarily follow, however, that the character of an action is to be determined by particular allegations incorporated in the complaint. In a given case a party may assume that he is entitled to equitable relief, and proceed to formulate his pleadings accordingly. It may be apparent therefrom that he is not entitled to the relief he seeks, yet he will not for this reason be turned out of court, if upon any theory of his pleading he is entitled to other relief. Under the Constitution (article 8, § 28) there is but one form of action in this state. Law and equity may be administered in the same case. A mistake as to the form in which the action should be brought, or as to the relief which may be demanded upon the statement of facts made, is of no moment. If equitable relief is demanded, but the facts do not warrant this character of relief, a complaint will be sustained for legal relief, if the facts warrant it. Donovan v. McDevitt, 36 Mont. —, 92 Pac. 49. In this case the plaintiff made Frankovich and Paris Bros. parties. His counsel seem to have proceeded upon the assumption that by so doing he could secure the cancellation of the alleged forged assignment held by Paris Bros. In this they were in error. The court could not grant that character of relief. This contention was made by Paris Bros.' demurrer. The justice, in sustaining this, sustained the contention of defendants that he was without equitable jurisdiction. He retained the action as between the plaintiff and the company, as he should have done. This condition left a simple legal question of the liability of the defendant company to the plaintiff, which the justice had jurisdiction to determine. Code Civ. Proc. § 66. As between these parties the action was one arising on a contract for the payment of money. So far, then, there can be no doubt that the action of the justice was correct. A judgment rendered settling the question of the liability of the company to the plaintiff would have been valid.

Did the justice lose jurisdiction of the case by making the order of substitution? In other words, was the case converted into an equity case by this order? A solution of the question involved turns upon a correct answer to the inquiry: What is the scope and application of section 588 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which declares: "A defendant against whom an action is pending upon a contract, or for specific personal property, may, at any time before answer, upon affidavit that a person not a party to the action makes against him, and without any collusion with him, a demand upon such contract, or for such property, upon notice to such person and the adverse party, apply to the court for an order to substitute such person in his place and discharge him from liability to either party, on his depositing in court the amount claimed on the contract, or delivering the property, or its value, to such person as the court may direct; and the court may, in its discretion, make the order. And whenever conflicting claims are or may be made upon a person for or relating to personal property, or the performance of an obligation, or any portion thereof, such person may bring an action against the conflicting claimants to compel them to interplead and litigate their several claims among themselves. The order of substitution may be made, and the action of interpleader may be maintained, and the applicant or plaintiff be discharged from liability to all or any of the conflicting claimants, although their titles or claims have not a common origin, or are not identical, but are adverse to and independent of one another." There is a conflict in the decisions as to the result of an order of substitution made under the first sentence of this section. Some of the courts, as in New York and Missouri (Clark v. Mosher, 107 N. Y. 118, 14 N. E. 90, 1 Am. St. Rep. 798; Dinley, Adm'x, etc., v. McCullagh, 92 Hun, 454, 36 N. Y. Supp. 1007; Miller v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 68 Mo. App. 19), hold that such a substitution converts a case which was at law into one of equitable cognizance. It seems to us, however, that these courts overlook the fact that the method of interpleader provided for in this portion of the section had its origin at the common law, and is cognizable by courts proceeding according to the common law. Originally in cases of joint bailment, when separate actions in detinue were brought by the bailors, the bailee might require them to interplead. If only one had brought suit and the other threatened to sue, the bailee might have the other brought in by garnishment. This might be done, also, by the finder of property under the same circumstances. 2 Story, Equity Jurisprudence, 801-803. In one or two other kinds of actions at law this legal interpleader might be resorted to. Our statute—and most of the states have a similar one—was modeled after the English statutes of 1 and 2 William IV (chapter 58, § 1) and 23 and 24 Victoria (chapter 126, § 12). The first included actions in debt, assumpsit, detinue, and trover. The latter was enacted to avoid the effect of the decision in Crawshay v. Thornton, 2 Mylne & Craig, 1 (English Rep. 40 Full Reprint, p. 541), in which it was held by Lord Cottenham that there can be no interpleader where the rights asserted by the claimants are independent, and have not a common origin (4 Pomeroy, Equity Jurisprudence, § 1324, notes). In the class of actions named, after substitution was made, the cause proceeded in the same court between the plaintiff and the substituted defendant, and the question of right was determined according to the course of the common law. Hamlyn v. Betteley, 6 Q. B. Div. 63. If a suit is not brought by either claimant, the person against whom the conflicting claims are made may bring his action in equity to compel them to interplead; for, having no cause of action against either of them, he cannot bring an action at law. The second sentence of the section provides for this situation. The last sentence embodies the provision of section 12 of the statute of Victoria, supra. Clearly the section, taken as a whole, is intended to cover the subject of interpleader, both at law and in equity; one purpose being, as declared by the statute of William, supra, to enable courts of law to grant relief in a summary way in many cases in which theretofore they could grant none. So, while there is a conflict in the decisions of the courts in the United States as to the question whether such cases as the one at bar become of equitable cognizance after substitution is made, there can be no doubt that on principle such is not the case. If the case be one which presents only legal issues, it is not changed in character merely by the substitution, but proceeds according to law, unless, as may be the case, some equitable defense is interposed which invokes the equity powers of the court. This may be the case under the Code, because our courts of general jurisdiction administer both law and equity. It could not be so, however, as pointed out above, in case arising in a justice's court. In support of this view, we cite the following authorities: 4 Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence, § 1329; Maginnis v. Schwab, 24 Ohio St. 336; Bank v. Beebe, 62 Ohio St. 41, 56 N. E. 483; McElroy v. Baer, 9 Civ. Proc. R. (N. Y.) 133; Satkofsky v. Jormudowsky, 49 Misc. Rep. 624, 97 N. Y. Supp. 357; Bixby v. Blair & Co., 56 Iowa, 416, 9 N. W. 318; Hoyt v. Gouge, 125 Iowa, 603, 101 N. W. 464; Moore v. Ernst, 54 Miss. 642, note to 1 Am. St. Rep. 800; Phillips, Code Pl. § 459.

The claims of the parties here present strictly legal issues. The plaintiff claims by assignment. The defendants Paris Bros. claim by virtue of their levy under their execution. The court was not called on to aid these defendants in any way to enforce the lien of their execution, but was required simply to determine whether they had a lien which was paramount to the title of the plaintiff under his assignment. If the plaintiff had not shown title under his assignment, these defendants would have been entitled to judgment for their costs, and they would have been entitled to nothing more if the suit had been brought in the district court, which has equitable jurisdiction, in the first instance. It is doubtful whether an action for equitable interpleader would have been entertained after this action was brought; for, as suggested in Hoyt v. Gouge, supra, the company had a remedy at law, which it properly invoked, and thus was not entitled to go into a court of equity, because this remedy was adequate. It is true that the formal affidavit was not filed. The application for substitution was made on the amended answer; but Paris Bros. became defendants without protest or objection. The irregularity in the mode of their substitution was thus waived.

It is said that the district court had no jurisdiction of the appeal because Frankovich was not served with the notice, as required by the statute. Code Civ. Proc. § 1760. An adverse party, within the meaning of this statute, is one "who has an interest in opposing the object sought to be accomplished by the appeal." Power & Bro. v. Murphy, 26 Mont. 389, 68 Pac. 411. In Harper v. Hildreth, 99 Cal. 285, 33 Pac. 1103, it is said: "Whether a party to the action is 'adverse' to the appellant must be determined by their position on the record and the averments in their pleadings, rather than from the manner in which they manifest their wishes at the trial, or from any presumption to be drawn from their relations to each other, or to the subject-matter of the action in matters outside of the action. * * * If his (the party's) position on the record makes him nominally adverse, he must be so considered for the purpose of an appeal from the judgment thereon." While this is true, it does not follow that one who is neither a necessary nor a proper party to the action must be considered adverse merely because he appears as such upon the record. Having parted with his title to the fund by his assignment to the plaintiff, as he admits, Frankovich was not a necessary or proper party, because he had no interest in the action. His presence as a party, therefore, was no more appropriate than that of any other stranger. No relief was demanded against him, nor did he demand any. Nor could he have any interest in the result of the appeal. The justice might have dismissed the action as to him of his own motion. This would not have affected him in the least. Under such circumstances, he was not an adverse party, and it was not incumbent upon plaintiff to treat him as such. The motion to dismiss the appeal was properly denied.

It is said that the court should have sustained Paris Bros.' demurrer. In this contention there is no merit. The justice sustained the demurrer, and practically dismissed these defendants out of the case. This was upon the theory, presumably, that he would not entertain the action as brought and grant the relief demanded against them. It had accomplished its purpose. When the order of substitution was made, the objection was not urged that the complaint did not tender an issue upon the question of right between them and the plaintiff. The district court should have disregarded it, as it virtually did by overruling it.

The court overruled an objection to evidence of a conversation had between plaintiff and Frankovich at the time the assignment was made. The conversation related to the consideration for the assignment; such consideration being medical services rendered to Frankovich by the plaintiff, who is a physician. No question was made as to the sufficiency of the consideration to support the assignment, nor as to whether it was for value. The evidence was therefore not competent. But it is apparent that the ruling was not prejudicial. The appellants offered no evidence, but rested their case entirely upon their objection to the jurisdiction. Upon the evidence furnished by the writing alone, the court was justified in directing a verdict for plaintiff, as it did. The admission of the incompetent evidence could not have affected the judgment of the court in this matter.

The verdict returned under the direction of the court is as follows: "We, the jury in the above-entitled action, find as our verdict that the plaintiff A. E. Anderson is entitled to the sum of $94 heretofore paid into court." It is said that there is no evidence that any sum had been paid into court, and hence no evidence to support this verdict. It is apparent, however, that the parties and the judge proceeded upon the assumption that the company had paid to the justice the amount in controversy at the time it was dismissed from the case and was in the hands of the clerk at the time of the trial. The fact that it had been paid to the justice is recited in the answer of Paris Bros. In any event, we must assume that the fact that it had been paid to the clerk was known to the court, or, if not actually known, was ascertained before it adjudged that the sum belonged to the plaintiff. There is no merit in this contention.

The judgment entered declares the plaintiff entitled to recover of Paris Bros. the sum of $94 in the hands of the clerk, with interest and costs. It is not correct in awarding any recovery as against the appellants, except for costs. It would be manifestly wrong that appellants should be compelled to pay interest for the time during which the sum in controversy was in the hands of the clerk. The judgment should simply have awarded the sum in dispute to the plaintiff, and adjudged appellants to pay the costs.

The cause is remanded, with directions to the district court to modify the judgment as herein indicated. When so modified it will stand affirmed; the respondent to recover his costs.

Modified and affirmed.

OKLAHOMA CITY v. OKLAHOMA RY. CO.
(Supreme Court of Oklahoma. Dec. 18, 1907.)

1. MANDAMUS — PERFORMANCE OF PUBLIC SERVICE.

"When there is a grant and acceptance of a public franchise which involves the performance of a certain service, the person or corporation accepting such franchise can by mandamus be compelled to perform such service."

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 33, Mandamus, § 268.]

2. CARRIERS — CONTROL AND REGULATION—PREFERENCES AND DISCRIMINATIONS—PASSES—HALF-FARE TICKETS.

The provisions of section 13, art. 9, of the Constitution, do not prohibit a municipal corporation operating a street railway from furnishing transportation free to its policemen and firemen and United States mail carriers, and half-rate tickets to school children, and free transportation to children under a certain age whilst traveling with a parent or guardian.

3. SAME.

Municipalities are not prohibited by the provisions of section 13, art. 9, of the Constitution, from granting franchises for street railways with conditions contained therein for the carrying of policemen, firemen, United States mail carriers, and children under a certain age free, and for the furnishing of transportation to school children at a reduced fare, and when accepted by the grantee in the franchise, are valid.

4. OFFICERS—QUALIFICATION—OATH.

Policemen, firemen, and United States mail carriers are not officers contemplated or included by section 1, art. 15, of the Constitution.

5. CARRIERS — CONTROL AND REGULATION — PREFERENCES AND REGULATIONS — HALF-FARE TICKETS.

Street railways undertaking and contracting with municipalities by provisions contained in franchises granted by such municipalities, to carry policemen, firemen, United States mail carriers, and children under a certain age free, and also to carry school children at half the regular rate, are not absolved therefrom by section 13, art. 9, of the Constitution.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Application by the city of Oklahoma City for writ of mandamus to the Oklahoma Railway Company. Writ granted.

The relator is a municipal corporation and a city of the first class under the laws of the state of Oklahoma, and has been since the 1st day of January, A. D. 1902. On the 30th day of January, 1902, the mayor and council of said city duly passed an ordinance authorizing the Metropolitan Street Railway Company, among other things, to build and construct a system of electric street railways over and along the streets of said city, defining the conditions of the exercise of the authority therein conferred to construct such street railway system, and regulating the operation and maintenance thereof, and imposing certain contractual obligations on said company. Thereafter, on the 8th day of February, 1902, the Metropolitan Street Railway company, in accordance with the requirements of said ordinance, filed with the city clerk of said city its proper and written acceptance of the terms and conditions thereof. Thereafter during said year, the Metropolitan Street Railway Company constructed a system of railways in said city, and placed the same in operation, and on the 15th day of June, 1904, said railway company sold, conveyed, and assigned its said railway system, together with the franchise rights and privileges existing in its favor by virtue of said ordinance, to the Oklahoma Railway Company, the respondent herein. and said respondent, in order to procure the assent of the mayor and councilmen of said city to said transfer, filed the said transfer with the mayor and councilmen of said city, together with its written acceptance and assumption of all the duties and burdens imposed therein. Thereafter, on the 27th day of June, 1904, an ordinance was duly passed ratifying and confirming said transfer to said respondent, and authorized the extension and maintenance of said system of street railways on the streets and public thoroughfares of said city, said respondent thereby becoming subrogated to all the powers and rights in said original ordinance of the Metropolitan Railway Company, and thereby became bound to the performance of all the duties therein imposed upon said railway company. As a part of the consideration for the granting of said privileges by virtue of said ordinance and for the use of the streets and public thoroughfares in said city by said railway company in the transportation of passengers from one point to another, it was provided in section 7 of said ordinance as follows: "The charges for transporting passengers to be exacted by said railway company shall not exceed the sum of five cents for one continuous passage over the said company's lines from points within the city limits to any other point in such city; such limit in price shall not prevent the exaction of any additional fare for return journeys, nor shall transfer slips be good for stop-over privileges. Tickets for the use of school children shall be furnished good for one continuous passage, in quantities not less than twenty rides at the rate of two and one half cents each, under any reasonable regulation which the company may impose to prevent the abuse of such privilege or the use of such tickets by others than children under fifteen years of age in actual attendance on the public schools of said city. United States mail carriers, policemen, and members of the fire department, while in the discharge of their duties shall be carried free." Said respondent has refused, and does refuse, to issue and furnish tickets for the use of school children for one continuous passage in quantities of not less than 20 rides at the rate of 2½ cents each, and has further refused to carry United States mail carriers, policemen, and members of the fire department when in the discharge of their duties, and children under five years of age when accompanied by parents or guardians, free; but is collecting of and from all children, mail carriers, policemen, and members of the fire department, and such children under the age of five years the full authorized fare under the terms of said franchise, five cents for each passenger carried, in violation of the terms of said franchise agreement. It is further alleged by the plaintiff that the transportation of its policemen and firemen while in the discharge of their official duties by the said railway company is a valuable undertaking in behalf of said city, and that, if the said provision is not enforced against said railway company, it will work great hardship in requiring it to pay a large amount of money for the passage of its policemen and firemen over said railway while in the discharge of their several duties, to the great damage and injury of said city. Relator further alleges and avers that said city has paid, and is paying, said respondent to transport said persons and for said reduced fares as a part of the rental or consideration of the use of the streets for said street railway system, and it was so understood and agreed that said railway company should render said service as a part of the consideration for the use of said streets and the privileges granted under said franchise, and that during the five years the said street railway company had been operating in said city numerous schoolhouses have been erected with reference to the line and routes of said respondent's railway system to promote the convenience of children of school age attending schools of said city, and that inhabitants thereof have built and located their homes and residences with reference to such routes, and with reference to the cheap and convenient line for their children to reach the schools of said city to which they might be assigned, and that the discontinuance of the sale of said school tickets will work a great hardship to the said relator and its inhabitants. The respondent voluntarily entered its appearance, without the issuance of an alternative writ, and confessed the facts stated in said petition, but alleged as a matter of law that the relief demanded should be denied under the provisions of section 13, art. 9, of the Constitution of the state of Oklahoma, and submitted this case under such issue of law.

T. G. Chambers and John Embry, U. S. Atty., for relator. John W. Shartel, for respondent.

WILLIAMS, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). "When there is a grant and acceptance of a public franchise which involves the performance of a certain service, the person or corporation accepting such franchise can by mandamus be compelled to perform such service." Merrill on Mandamus, § 27. Section 13 of article 9 of the Constitution of the state of Oklahoma reads as follows: "No railroad or transportation company, or transmission company shall, directly or indirectly, issue or give any free frank or free ticket, free pass or other free transportation, for any use, within this state, except to its employees and their families, its officers, agents, surgeons, physicians, and attorneys at law; to ministers of religion, traveling secretaries for railroad Young Men's Christian Associations, inmates of hospitals and charitable and eleemosynary institutions and persons exclusively engaged in charitable and eleemosynary work; to indigent, destitute and homeless persons, and to such persons when transported by charitable societies or hospitals, and the necessary agents, employed in such transportations; to inmates of the National Homes, or State Homes for disabled Volunteer Soldiers, and of Soldiers' and Sailors' Homes, including those about to enter and those returning home after discharge, and boards of managers of such Homes; to members of volunteer fire departments and their equipage while traveling as such; to necessary care takers of live stock, poultry, and fruit; to employees of sleeping cars, of express cars, and to linemen of telephone and telegraph companies; to railway mail service employees, postoffice inspectors, custom inspectors, and immigration inspectors; to newsboys on trains, baggage agents, witnesses attending any legal investigation in which the railroad company or transportation company is interested, persons injured in wrecks, and physicians and nurses attending such persons: Provided, that this provision shall not be construed to prohibit the interchange of passes for the officers, agents and employees of common carriers and their families; nor to prohibit any common carrier from carrying passengers free with the object of providing relief in cases of general epidemic, pestilence, or other calamitous visitation; nor to prevent them from transporting, free of charge, to their places of employment persons entering their service, and the interchange of passes to that end; and any railroad, transportation, or transmission company or any person, other than the persons excepted in this provision, who grants or uses any such free frank, free ticket, free pass, or free transportation within this state, shall be deemed guilty of a crime, and the Legislature shall provide proper penalties for the violation of any provision of this section by the railroad or transportation or transmission company, or by any individual: Provided, that nothing herein shall prevent the Legislature from extending these provisions so as to exclude such free transportations or franks from other persons." The only question that is necessary to be determined in this case is whether or not said section absolves the respondent from its obligation and undertaking to the relator to furnish the tickets to the school children under the terms named, and to carry the policemen, firemen, mail carriers, and certain children free, as stipulated in said franchise. If it be determined that said section does not affect said obligations and undertakings in said franchise, then the peremptory writ should issue.

Section 6 of article 18 of said Constitution reads as follows: "Every municipal corporation within this state shall have the right to engage in any business or enterprise which may be engaged in by a person, firm or corporation by virtue of a franchise from said corporation." It could not be successfully contended that, if the relator were directly engaged in the business of operating said street railway line, it could not carry said school children at the rates and under the terms designated in said franchise, or its policemen and firemen, the mail carriers, and children under five years of age when accompanied by a parent or guardian, without charge, on account of the provisions of section 13, art. 9, supra; for the term "railroad" or "transportation company" or "transmission company," as used in said section, would not include the relator. Section 1 of article 9 of the Constitution reads as follows: "As used in this article the term 'corporation' or 'company' shall include all associations and joint stock companies having any power or privileges, not possessed by individuals, and exclude all municipal corporations and public institutions owned or controlled by the state." Now, if the relator, being authorized to operate a street railway system in said city, would be permitted under the provisions of this Constitution to furnish tickets to the school children under the terms and prices hereinbefore named, and to carry its policemen and firemen, the mail carriers, and certain children free, then, why would not a contract entered into to that end by the relator be valid? The respondent herein is not furnishing "free transportation." Transportation and reduced rates to a certain class is in this case furnished not by the respondent. This is done by the city, the relator herein, which it has a right to do under the law. In Re Grimes v. Minneapolis, Lyndale & Minnetonka Railway Company, 37 Minn. 67, 33 N. W. 34, the court said: "Grimes and wife conveyed to defendant certain land for the purposes of its railway, and in consideration of the conveyance defendant agreed to 'carry' said Grimes and wife, and any of their children, 'free of charge,' in the passenger cars run upon its road. Plaintiff is one of the children mentioned. Held, that the effect of defendant's agreement is to entitle the plaintiff to be carried free of charge. The fact that his father purchased and paid for this right of free carriage is not important. The plaintiff's right is as complete as if he had purchased and paid for it himself, and, as a logical consequence, its infringement, whether tortious or otherwise, is a wrong to him for which he has his action." In re Erie & Pittsburg Railway Company v. Douthet, 88 Pa. 245, 32 Am. Rep. 45: "The agreement of the defendants was to give the plaintiff a pass over their railroad for himself and his family for his lifetime as the consideration of his release of the right of way over his land. The pass was given for a while, and then refused, and this action was to recover damages for their breach of contract." The court held in the above case that the plaintiff was entitled to recover. In Re Curry v. Kansas & Colorado Pacific Company, 58 Kan. 18, 48 Pac. 583, the court said: "The company cannot excuse itself upon the score of the interstate commerce act. That act forbids the gratuitous issuance of railway passes, not their issuance for a moneyed or other valuable consideration. The transportation in question was paid for by a conveyance of land; and does not, therefore, come within the prohibitive terms of the law behind which the company endeavors to shelter itself." In Re Dempsey v. New York Central & Hudson River Railway Company, 146 N. Y. 294, 40 N. E. 868, the court said: "In considering this question, it must be conceded that, unless the contractual relations of the parties distinguished this case from that of the ordinary public officer, the issue of the annual pass would be illegal. This court has very recently held, in the case of a notary public, that, while it was not quite obvious that he was not in that class of public officers who should be prohibited from accepting privileges or favors from corporations, yet, as the language of the Constitution was plain and comprehensive the courts were bound to strictly enforce its provisions. People v. Rathbone, 145 N. Y. 434, 40 N. E. 395, 28 L. R. A. 384. What, then, are the precise provisions of the Constitution which are claimed to be violated by the strict performance of this contract which was in force for nearly three years before the Constitution went into effect? 'No public officer or person elected or appointed to a public office under the laws of this state shall directly or indirectly ask, demand, accept, receive, or consent to receive, for his own use or benefit * * * any free pass * * * from any corporation, or make use of the same for himself or in conjunction with another.' Const. art. 13, § 5. It will be observed that a public officer is forbidden to receive and use a 'free pass'; it being the obvious intention of the Constitution to prohibit the public officers of the state from receiving from corporations privileges or favors, in other words gifts, that might improperly influence them in the discharge of their official duties. So, if this constitutional provision applies to the plaintiff as a public officer, it is due to the fact that he is accepting a 'free pass,' a gift from the defendant. This court more than 30 years ago held that the holder of a pass who had compensated the corporation therefor could not be regarded in any just sense as a gratuitous passenger. Smith v. N. Y. C. R. R. Co., 24 N. Y. 227." It was the obvious intention of the Constitution, not only to prohibit public officers of the state from receiving from corporations privileges or favors that might improperly influence them in the discharge of their official duties, but also that the general public should have equal facilities and conveniences of transportation without discrimination in the charges therefor. Section 1 of article 15 of the Constitution reads as follows: "Senators and representatives, and all judicial, state and county officers, shall, before entering upon the duties of their respective offices, take and subscribe to the following oath or affirmation: 'I, ———, do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will support, obey, and defend the Constitution of the United States, and the Constitution of the state of Oklahoma, and will discharge the duties of my office with fidelity; that I have not paid, or contributed, either directly or indirectly, any money or other valuable thing, to procure my nomination or election (or appointment), except for necessary and proper expenses expressly authorized by law; that I have not knowingly violated any election law of the state, or procured it to be done by others in my behalf; that I will not, knowingly, receive, directly or indirectly, any money or other valuable thing, for the performance or non-performance of any act or duty pertaining to my office, other than the compensation allowed by law, and I further swear (or affirm) that I will not receive, use, or travel upon any free pass or on free transportation during my term of office.'" Policemen, firemen, and mail carriers are evidently not officers contemplated by said section. Policemen and firemen are not required under the provisions of this Constitution to take this form of an oath; and hence it cannot be said that it was, or is now, against public policy for the relator, the municipality, to contract for the "free passage" of its policemen and firemen and the mail carriers. Nor is it against public policy for said relator to contract for a special rate for school children whilst traveling to and from school; for it is undoubtedly the policy of this state to support and maintain public schools. And so an undertaking for reduced fare to the end that the entire public may have the benefit of it for children whilst traveling to and from school is not violative of the spirit or the intention of section 13 of article 9 of the Constitution. Further, it is good policy for the United States mail to be delivered free, being approved not only by the federal, but also by the local, government, and the relator acting with a view of promoting free delivery did not contract against public policy, nor does the Constitution either in letter or spirit prohibit such undertaking which would neither reasonably tend to improperly influence such officers nor discriminate against the public; for the preservation of the peace, the attendance of children upon the public schools, and the free delivery of the United States mails are all conducive to the public welfare. The reduced transportation for the children and the free transportation for the policemen and firemen, the children of certain age, and mail carriers does not come from the respondent railway company, but from the city. It is the result of the city's act just as much so as if it had by bonded undertaking raised the money and paid a moneyed consideration to the respondent corporation, as a result of which said corporation had undertaken and bound itself to carry the school children under the terms named in that franchise, and to carry the policemen, firemen, mail carriers, and certain children of a designated age free of charge; for the franchise was an undertaking granting privileges of great value.

We are of the opinion that this contract which existed between Oklahoma City, the relator herein, and the Oklahoma Railway Company, the respondent herein, was not only a valid contract prior to the adoption of this Constitution, but is also now a valid contract, and not in conflict with section 13 of article 9 of said Constitution, and that the former is entitled to the relief prayed for. Let the peremptory writ of mandamus issue.

STATE v. BROWN.

(Supreme Court of Utah. Dec. 17, 1907.)

1. CORPORATIONS—PROOF OF CORPORATE EXISTENCE.

Under Rev. St. 1898, § 4859, providing that in a criminal case the existence of a corporation need not be shown by the articles or act of incorporation, but may be proved by general reputation or by the statutes of the state by which the corporation was created, testimony that a company was a corporation organized under the laws of a certain state is incompetent; this not being proof by reputation.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 12, Corporations, § 110.]

2. FORGERY—UTTERING FORGED INSTRUMENT—INFORMATION—MATERIAL ALLEGATION.

The allegation that the company was a corporation, in an information charging that defendant knowing the instrument to be forged, and with intent to damage a certain company, a corporation organized under certain laws, uttered and passed as true to a bank a writing purporting to be a check, is a material allegation.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 23, Forgery, § 86.]

3. WORDS AND PHRASES—"REPUTATION."

"Reputation" is what is generally said of a person by the people of the community where he is known.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 7, pp. 6118-6120.]

Appeal from District Court, Salt Lake County; Geo. C. Armstrong, Judge.

Arthur Brown appeals from a conviction. Reversed, and new trial granted.

Powers & Marioneaux, for appellant. M. A. Breeden, Atty. Gen., and F. C. Loofbourrow, Dist. Atty., for the State.

MCCARTY, C. J. The defendant was tried and convicted for the crime of forgery. The information, so far as material here, alleges: "That the said Arthur Brown, at the county of Salt Lake, in the state of Utah, on the 21st day of May, A. D. 1906, did then and there willfully, unlawfully, feloniously, and knowing the same to be false, forged and counterfeited, and with intent to prejudice, damage, and defraud the Utah Apex Mining Company, a corporation duly organized and existing under the laws of the state of Maine, utter, publish, and pass as true and genuine to and upon the Commercial National Bank a certain false and counterfeited writing or paper purporting to be a check, commonly called a 'bank check,' the tenor whereof is as follows [then follows the description of the check]." To prove the existence of the corporation mentioned in the information the district attorney, over the objections made by defendant, was permitted to ask W. C. Orem, a witness for the state, and the witness was allowed to answer the following questions: "Q. Mr. Orem, what, if any, mining companies are you interested in? A. The Utah Apex Mining Company * * * and others. Q. I will ask you what sort of a company the Utah Apex Mining Company is? A. It is a corporation organized under the laws of Maine. Q. I will ask you what, if any, business that corporation carries on within this state? A. The business of mining." Other questions were asked by the district attorney, and answered by the witness, in which the corporate existence of the company was assumed, but no testimony such as the statute requires to prove corporate existence in cases of this kind was offered at the trial. In fact, the only testimony in the record that tends in any degree to show that the company in question was a corporation is that given by the witness Orem, and timely objections were made to his testimony on this point, on the ground that it was incompetent, immaterial, and irrelevant. The action of the court in overruling the objections is assigned as error.

Section 4859, Rev. St. 1898, provides that: "If upon a trial or proceeding in a criminal case, the existence, constitution or powers of any corporation shall become material, or be in any way drawn in question, it is not necessary to produce a certified copy of the articles or acts of incorporation, but the same may be proved by general reputation, or by the printed statutes of the state or government or country by which such corporation was created." Defendant, appellant here, contends that, as the statute has pointed out but two ways in which a corporate existence in criminal cases may be proved, all other ways or methods of proving this fact are excluded; while, on the other hand, counsel for the state contend that, as the existence of the corporation was material only as a matter of description, the evidence under consideration was sufficient. But matters of description, when essential, must be proved by competent evidence, the same as every other material issue in a criminal case. Now, the statute provides that the existence of a corporation in a case like the one at bar may be shown in two ways: First, by the charter or act of incorporation; and, second, by general reputation. In this case the state attempted to bring itself within the foregoing provisions of the statute, and to prove the corporate existence by reputation, but failed to do so. Reputation is what is generally said of a person by the people of the community where he is known. And, when the subject of inquiry is a corporation, the same rule governs that controls in the introduction of evidence respecting the reputation of a natural person. Therefore it was incumbent upon the state to prove that the company in question was generally reputed to be a corporation in the community where it is known. In other words, before the defendant could be legally convicted, it was necessary to prove the corporate existence of the company either by its charter or act of incorporation or by evidence showing that the people in the community where the company was known in speaking of it generally referred to it as a corporation. But, as we have stated, no evidence of this character was produced at the trial. The testimony given by W. C. Orem on this point in no way tended to prove the corporation by general reputation, and was therefore incompetent, and it was error for the court to admit it.

At the conclusion of the introduction of evidence in the case, defendant requested the court to instruct the jury to return a verdict of not guilty. The refusal of the court to instruct the jury as requested is also assigned as error. The allegation that the Utah Apex Mining Company was a corporation was one of the material allegations of the information, and, the state having failed to produce any competent evidence whatever in support of this allegation, the defendant was entitled to an instruction from the court directing a verdict of not guilty, and the failure of the court to so instruct the jury was error.

The judgment must therefore be reversed and a new trial granted. It is so ordered.

NEPHI PLASTER & MFG. CO. v. JUAB COUNTY.

(Supreme Court of Utah. Dec. 4, 1907.)

1. WORDS AND PHRASES—"GYPSUM."

Gypsum is a mineral, and constitutes a mineral deposit under the mineral laws.

2. STATUTES — CONSTRUCTION — MEANING OF WORDS.

In determining the meaning of words used in a statute or Constitution, the construction placed upon them by the courts must prevail over the popular conception of the terms.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 44, Statutes, §§ 206-230.]

3. WORDS AND PHRASES—"MINES"—"MINERALS."

The term "mines" is not limited to mere subterranean excavations or workings, nor is "minerals" limited to the metals or metalliferous deposits, whether contained in veins that have well-defined walls, or in beds or deposits that are irregular and are found at or near the surface, or otherwise.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 5, pp. 4511-4512; 4513-4515; vol. 8, p. 7722.]

4. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — CONSTRUCTION OF PROVISIONS—EJUSDEM GENERIS—TAXATION.

While, under the doctrine of ejusdem generis, when general words in a Constitution or statute follow particular words, the things contained within the general words must be of the same class or kind as those particularly mentioned, and general words will not be held to include anything which is of a class superior to the class mentioned in the particular words, the doctrine is only a rule of construction to aid in arriving at the intent of the lawmaker, and cannot be applied to override the fundamental principles that all words in a law must, if possible, be given their ordinary meaning, and that the intention of the lawmaker must be gathered from the language employed in the light of the context and of the subject-matter to which it is applied, and that when the intention is clear it must prevail, except that courts cannot assume that the lawmaker really intended to enact either absurd or unjust laws.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 10, Constitutional Law, §§ 9-11.]

5. TAXATION — PROPERTY SUBJECT TO TAX — CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS — CONSTRUCTION—MINES AND PROCEEDS THEREOF.

Const. art. 13, § 4, provides that all mines and mining claims, etc., containing or bearing gold, silver, copper, lead, coal, or other valuable mineral deposits, shall be taxed, etc., and the net annual proceeds of all mines and mining claims shall be taxed, etc. At the time the Constitution was framed the specified metals were the only ones mined in large quantities in the territory, and coal, with the exception of lime and common rock, was the only nonmetallic product mined in quantity sufficient to justify the method of taxation proposed. Held, that the classification was not intended as a limitation, but an enumeration of substances then produced in quantity sufficient to warrant the method of taxation imposed, and, under the exception to the rule of ejusdem generis that where the particular things enumerated are complete so that there remain no others of like kind, then the things that fall within the general words must be assumed to be of a different kind and not ejusdem generis with those enumerated, the phrase "other valuable mineral deposits" embraces all mineral deposits, including a deposit of gypsum, and the net annual profits from the sale of products manufactured therefrom are taxable under the section.

Appeal from District Court, Juab County; Joshua Greenwood, Judge.

Action by the Nephi Plaster & Manufacturing Company against Juab county. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed, and remanded with directions.

M. A. Breeden, W. A. C. Bryan, T. L. Foote, and Henry Adams, for appellant. Van Cott, Allison & Riter, for respondent.

FRICK, J. This action is based on sections 2684, 2685, Rev. St. 1898, which provide for the recovery of taxes paid by a taxpayer under protest in case such taxes are unlawfully imposed. The action was commenced by the respondent to recover back the sum of $205 paid as taxes to the appellant, Juab county, under protest for the year 1904, and which, the respondent contends, were unlawfully imposed. It appears from the record that the respondent was then the owner of a placer mining claim patented, on and in which are contained large and valuable deposits of gypsum, which deposits are, and for a number of years, by means of the necessary buildings, machinery, and appliances erected on said mining claim, have been, manufactured or converted into hard wall plaster, dental plaster, finishing plaster, fertilizers, and other manufactured products, all of which were sold on the market. The tax involved represents the ordinary rate of taxes imposed on the net proceeds or profits derived by the respondent from the sale of the products aforesaid, and were imposed by virtue of section 4 of article 13 of the Constitution of this state, which reads as follows:

"Sec. 4. (Taxation of Mines.) All mines and mining claims, both placer and rock in place, containing or bearing gold, silver, copper, lead, coal or other valuable mineral deposits, after purchase thereof from the United States, shall be taxed at the price paid the United States therefor, unless the surface ground, or some part thereof, of such mine or claim, is used for other than mining purposes, and has a separate and independent value for such other purposes; in which case said surface ground, or any part thereof, so used for other than mining purposes, shall be taxed at its value for such other purposes, as provided by law; and all the machinery used in mining, and all property and surface improvements upon or appurtenant to mines and mining claims, which have a value separate and independent of such mines or mining claims, and the net annual proceeds of all mines and mining claims, shall be taxed as provided by law."

The Constitution became effective January 4, 1896, and in April following the first Legislature enacted a verbatim copy of the section above quoted as section 3 of what was termed the "Revenue Act" (Laws 1896, p. 424, c. 129), except that instead of ending the section with the words, "shall be taxed as provided by law," the section ended with the words, "shall be taxed as other personal property." The act also provided the manner in which the net proceeds of mines and mining claims should be ascertained for assessment and taxation. Section 3 of the act of 1896 was carried forward into the Revised Statutes of 1898 and re-enacted as section 2504, with the exception of the four words, "as provided by law," which were omitted from the body of the section. In 1903 (Laws 1903, p. 76, c. 91) the section was amended by adding thereto, after the words "mining claims," the following italicized words: "And also the net annual proceeds of coals made from coal or bullion or matte made from ore not taxed, which is deemed a product of the mines, shall be taxed as other personal property." Why this last amendment was added is not material now. From the foregoing it is manifest that the law in effect has undergone no material change since its first enactment, and is, in its scope and effect, as it was when first adopted. At all events the scope of the section must be limited in its effect to the terms used in the Constitution. With the intention of so limiting it, the district court entered its conclusion of law to the effect that the profits derived from the product manufactured from the gypsum taken from respondent's mining claim was not the subject of taxation as the net proceeds of mines and mining claims, and entered a judgment in favor of the respondent for the sum of $205, the amount of taxes paid by it as net proceeds, from which judgment Juab county appeals.

While there are numerous errors assigned, the whole case may be determined upon the one assignment, namely, that the court erred in its conclusion of law and in rendering a judgment for the respondent.

The appellant contends that gypsum is a mineral and falls within the term, "other valuable mineral deposits," referred to in the Constitution, and that it, or the product thereof, also falls within the clause, "and the net annual proceeds of all mines and mining claims," contained in the section quoted. The respondent concedes that the mining claim on and in which the deposit of gypsum is found and from which it is taken was located and patented under the mineral laws of the United States and of this state; that the net proceeds or profits amounted to a sum which would produce the sum of $205 under the legal rate of taxation, if such proceeds constitute the net proceeds of mines within the purview of the constitutional provision; and that gypsum is a mineral and constitutes a valuable mineral deposit. That gypsum is a mineral, and constitutes a mineral deposit under the mineral laws, cannot well be disputed. Lexicographers, geologists, and laymen all agree that it is a mineral, and such is also the holding of the officials of the Interior Department of the government of the United States, as will be seen from the following decisions: Phifer v. Heaton, 27 Land Dec. Dep. Int. 57; McQuiddy v. State, 29 Land Dec. Dep. Int. 181; Pacific Coast Marble Co. v. N. Pac. Ry. Co., 25 Land Dec. Dep. Int. 233; 1 Lindley on Mines, § 97. The only question for solution, therefore, is, does the profit realized from the product manufactured from the gypsum taken from respondent's mining claim constitute "net proceeds" under the clause in the Constitution that all net proceeds of "all mines and mining claims" shall be taxed, as the term is used in the Constitution? If it does, the court erred; if it does not fall within that clause, then gypsum, or the manufactured product therefrom, must be taxed generally as other manufactured products, and not under this section.

Respondent's counsel contend that the gypsum deposit, although a mineral deposit, does not come within the mineral deposits mentioned in the Constitution, and that it does not come within the term "mine" or "mines" as the term is there used. We might dispose of this contention by simply saying that it does clearly come within the term "mining claims," and is a mineral deposit, and therefore falls within the terms in that regard. In view of the contention, however, that the products of respondent's mining claim should not be taxed in this form, because they are not the net proceeds of a mine, as that term is popularly understood, we have examined the authorities, and we think that the workings on respondent's mining claim, under the decisions, also fall within the term "mine," and that minerals, prima facie at least, are not confined to the metals.

The question, however, is, what is to be deemed as being within the popular conception of a mine? Is it to be confined to the understanding that a farmer, stock raiser, or ordinary merchant has of the term. Or to what those who work in or come in contact with mines and mining rights generally and popularly understand it to be? Or is it to be understood, when found in a statute or Constitution, what the courts generally have held it to mean? In view that the decisions of courts are but the reflection of the common understanding with respect to particular things and the terms used in any industry, business, or calling, and are thus simply reduced to legal terms, we think that if the courts have construed and applied what is meant by the terms "mine" and "mines," then this meaning must control, and especially so when the term is used in some statute or Constitution. This must be so for the simple reason that the term will then have acquired a legal meaning, which, unless the contrary clearly appears from the context, must be deemed to be the meaning intended to be applied to it in the law in which it is found.

In 1 Lindley on Mines, §§ 87 to 97 the author reviews the authorities and discusses the meaning of mines and minerals, and there points out that anciently the term "mine" or "mining" meant subterranean excavation. But in section 89 the author points out that the term "mine" has received an enlarged meaning in later times. He says: "These primary significations were soon enlarged, so that in time the word 'mine' was construed to mean, also, the place where minerals were found, and soon came to be used as an equivalent of 'vein,' 'seam,' 'lode,' or to denote an aggregation of veins, and, under certain circumstances, to include quarries and minerals obtained by open workings." (Italics ours.) In section 91, in his work on Mines, Mr. Lindley states some general rules of interpretation as applied in England and Scotland, the fourth of which reads as follows: "Where the term 'mines' and 'minerals' are both used in the same deed or statute, the word 'minerals' is not, on that account, to suffer limitation of its meaning." In referring to the authorities upon this subject, we cannot, for lack of space, give a statement of the cases, but must confine ourselves strictly to the point decided in them.

Turning now to the decisions of this country, we find that the term "mines" is not confined to subterranean excavations or workings, nor is the term "minerals" confined to metalliferous ores. In Hartwell v. Camman, 10 N. J. Eq. 128, 64 Am. Dec. 448, 3 Morr. Min. Rep. 229, the chancellor of the New Jersey Court of Chancery, in construing a deed in which the granting clause read "all mines, minerals, opened, or to be opened," after some discussion, at page 136 of 10 N. J. Eq. (64 Am. Dec. 448), said: "Nor can I see any more propriety in confining the meaning of the terms used to any one of the subordinate divisions into which the mineral kingdom has been subdivided by chemists either earthy or metallic, saline, or bituminous. * * * I do not think the term should be confined to the metals or metallic ores. I cannot doubt if a stratum of salt, or even a bed of coal, had been found, they would have passed under the grant." In Griffin v. Fellows, *81 Pa. 114, 8 Morr. Min. Rep. 657, it was held that the term "minerals" is not to be limited to metalliferous ores. Gill v. Weston, 110 Pa. 312, 1 Atl. 921, is a case where the question arose under an act referring to mining lands passed before petroleum was discovered. The court held that petroleum was a mineral and was governed by the mining laws as such, although unknown when the laws were passed. The case of Murray v. Allred, 100 Tenn. 100, 43 S. W. 355, 39 L.

R. A. 249, 66 Am. St. Rep. 740, is a well-considered case in which a great number of authorities upon that subject are cited and reviewed, and the court concludes that under the term "minerals" all the known minerals are included and not only such as contain metals. It is accordingly held that petroleum passed under the grant of "minerals." In Detlor v. Holland, 57 Ohio St. 502, 49 N. E. 690, 40 L. R. A. 266, the Supreme Court of Ohio concedes and so holds that, as a general rule, under a grant of "all the coal of every variety and all the iron ore or fire clay and other valuable mineral," all minerals are included. In that case, however, in view of special circumstances, the court held that the petroleum did not pass under the grant. In Armstrong v. Granite Co., 147 N. Y., at page 505, 42 N. E., at page 189 (49 Am. St. Rep. 683), the Court of Appeals, in construing the meaning of "all the minerals and ores," after a discussion of the subject, and conceding that under the term "minerals," metals are generally intended, the court uses the following language: "But it would be an unwarranted limitation of such a grant or reservation to exclude from its operation beds of coal or other nonmetallic mineral deposits of commercial value, or to confine it to such minerals as were known or supposed to be on the premises at the time." In Brady v. Brady, 31 Misc. Rep. 411, 65 N. Y. Supp. 621, it was held that a reservation in a deed of "all mines and minerals" included lime rock. To the same effect is Phelps v. Church, etc., 115 Fed. 882, 53 C. C. A. 407. In Northern Pac. Ry. v. Soderberg (C. C.) 99 Fed. 506, it is held that the term "mineral," in referring to mineral lands under the mining laws of this country, is not synonymous with "metals." This holding was affirmed on appeal in 104 Fed. 425, 43 C. C. A. 620. In a note to the case of Armstrong v. Granite Co., reported in 49 Am. St. Rep., at page 691, the reporter, in giving his deductions from the decided cases, says: "The term 'minerals' in a grant includes prima facie every substance that can be got underneath the surface of the earth for profit. If the terms 'mines and minerals' are used in a grant or exception, the word 'mines' will not, prima facie, be held to be the governing word, so as to restrict the meaning which would otherwise be attached to the word 'minerals.'"

From an examination of a large number of cases we are convinced that the foregoing is a fair deduction of the law upon the subject as declared by the modern decisions both of England and this country. From the foregoing, it thus seems clear to us that where we find the terms "mines and minerals" used in grants or in reservations, in instruments of conveyance, in statutes or Constitutions, under the modern construction, the former is not limited to mere subterranean excavations or workings, nor is the latter limited to the metals or metalliferous deposits, whether contained in veins that have well-defined walls or in beds or deposits that are irregular and are found at or near the surface or otherwise. If, therefore, there are no other legal obstacles in the way, we would be forced to the conclusion that respondent's gypsum deposits are included within the term "other valuable mineral deposits," and would thus fall within the requirement of the Constitution that respondent be taxed on the net proceeds derived therefrom. It is, however, strongly urged by counsel for respondent that the clause in the Constitution, namely, "or other valuable mineral deposits," falls within the rule of construction that when general words follow particular words the things mentioned generally must be confined to the matters incorporated in the particular words. That is to say, all things that may be contained within the general words must be ejusdem generis; that is, of the same class or kind of those particularly mentioned. In addition to this general rule, there is also a further restriction upon general words which follow particulars by which the general words will not be held to include anything which is of a class superior to the class mentioned in the particular words. This rule or principle of construction is well established and is of frequent application, especially in penal or criminal statutes, but is not confined to that class. The doctrine of ejusdem generis is, however, only a rule of construction, and, like all rules, is resorted to only as an aid to the courts in arriving at the true intent of the lawmaker. These rules must not be applied so as to make them masters, since they are designed as servants merely. No rules of construction, however, can be permitted to override the fundamental principle underlying all rules which requires that all words contained within a statute must, if possible, be given their ordinary meaning, and that the intention of the lawmaker must be gathered from the language employed in the light of the context and of the subject-matter to which it is applied, and when such intention is clear it must prevail notwithstanding some rules to the contrary. By this we do not mean that where the ordinary meaning of the language employed would lead to an absurdity, or inflict great injustice, the ordinary meaning of the words should not be restricted or expanded, if necessary, to avoid an absurdity or an injustice; but this is only another way of stating that courts cannot assume that the lawmaker really intended to enact either absurd or unjust laws. Keeping this principle in mind, what was the intention of the framers of the Constitution in adopting section 4 of article 13 above quoted? When we have once ascertained this intention, it is our duty to declare it whether we deem it wise or unwise, or well or ill adapted to any matters therein contained. Is the clause, "or other valuable mineral deposits," to be restricted to deposits "containing or bearing gold, silver, copper, lead, coal," these being the things enumerated preceding the general clause, "or other valuable mineral deposits," which follows as an adjunct? The first exception to the rule of ejusdem generis is that where the particular things enumerated are complete so that there remain no others of like kind, then the things that fall within the general words must be assumed to be of a different kind and not ejusdem generis with those enumerated.

Can this exception be applied to this case? It seems to us that it not only is proper to apply it, but that, in view of the conditions prevailing when the Constitution was framed and adopted, it must be applied. These conditions, which are matters of common knowledge, were that gold, silver, copper, and lead were the only metals that were being mined and produced in large quantities in the then territory of Utah, and that coal, if lime and common rock be excluded, was the only nonmetallic product that was mined and produced in quantity sufficient to justify such a tax. These enumerated products, therefore, were the only ones from which any considerable revenue could be derived by a tax on the net proceeds derived therefrom. While large deposits of iron and other valuable mineral deposits existed, none were commercially considered, except to a very limited extent. In enumerating the four metals, and in adding coal thereto, the framers of the Constitution manifestly did not intend to classify the minerals along the line of the metals; but, in naming the four metals and coal, simply enumerated those as the ones which were then being largely mined and produced, with the intention, however, that the method of taxation provided for in the section should apply to all "other valuable mineral deposits," whether metallic or non-metallic. The fact that iron, which abounds in very large quantities in this state, was not mentioned, adds some force to this view. We can see no reason for not mentioning it, if it was not that it was not then produced as a commercial product. Its presence in large and valuable quantities was then well known. It may be conceded that, under the doctrine of ejusdem generis, iron would fall within the class of metals enumerated, although it also fell within the general terms of "all other valuable mineral deposits," because it is not a superior class, and is a metal, like the others specially enumerated. But if we are correct in assuming that the classification was not intended as a limitation, but rather for the purpose of simply naming the substances then produced in quantity sufficient to warrant the imposition of such methods of taxation, because the state would immediately derive considerable revenue therefrom, then the doctrine of ejusdem generis has no application, and the other valuable mineral deposits, whether metallic or non-metallic must be taxed the same as the ones enumerated although not specially named. This view is strengthened somewhat from the fact that coal, a nonmetallic substance, was included with metals in the specific enumeration. Coal, no doubt, was specially mentioned because it, like the metals mentioned, was produced in large quantities in this state, and thus would yield some revenue on net proceeds. It is true that ordinarily the enumeration of coal would add some force to the contention that since coal, a non-metallic product, was classed with metals, coal was the only nonmetallic substance that was intended to be reached with the metals. If, however, we keep in mind the theory that the metals and coal were mentioned because they were the only substances that were produced in such quantities that would yield a considerable amount of revenue to the state, the contention that coal being specially mentioned was the only nonmetallic substance sought to be reached loses all of its force. Pursuing the foregoing theory further, the framers of the Constitution, after enumerating the metals produced in large quantities, added thereto coal also produced, and then included, and intended to include, all other valuable mineral deposits whether metallic or nonmetallic in the general clause, "or other valuable mineral deposits." This view derives additional force from what follows near the end of the section, namely, "and the net annual proceeds of all mines and mining claims shall be taxed as other personal property." Having thus enumerated the mines, mining claims, and mineral deposits that should be taxed at the purchase price only with the improvements thereon, which is as applicable to respondent's mining claims as to all others, the ores or mineral deposits were not to be taxed according to their value in the earth, but the net annual proceeds derived therefrom were to be taxed as such proceeds were obtained by the owners. If this was a fair and just method of taxation on metals and coal produced, why is it not equally fair and just with regard to all other mineral products? Certainly the difference between the two is not so great either in kind or in the methods employed in obtaining them that it would be either absurd or unjust to treat them both alike in a general system of taxation. We think that it is reasonably clear that the phrase "or other valuable mineral deposits," was not intended to contain minerals only ejusdem generis with the metals specially named, but that it was intended that all mineral deposits should be taxed in this way, and not only the metalliferous minerals and coal.

In adopting this construction, we think we are sustained by the authorities. In speaking of the application of the doctrine of ejusdem generis, Sutherland on Statutory Construction, § 279, says: "It (the doctrine) affords a mere suggestion to the judicial mind that, where it clearly appears that the law-maker was thinking of a particular class of persons or subjects, his words of more general description may not have been intended to embrace any other than those within the class. The suggestion is one of common sense. Other rules of construction are equally potent, especially the primary rule which suggests that the intent of the Legislature is to be found in the ordinary meaning of the words of the statute. The sense in which general words, or any words, are intended to be used, furnishes the rule of interpretation, and this is to be collected from the context; and a narrower or more extended meaning will be given, according as the intention is thus indicated. To deny any word or phrase its known and natural meaning in any instance, the court ought to be quite sure that they are following the legislative intention. Hence, though a general term follows specific words, it will not be restricted by them when the object of the act and the intention is that the general word shall be understood in its ordinary sense." The foregoing text is well illustrated and supported by a great number of decisions, among which are the following well-considered cases: Woodworth v. State, 26 Ohio St. 190; Foster v. Blount, 18 Ala. 687; State v. Solomon, 33 Ind. 450; Tisdell v. Comb, 7 A. & E. (English Common Law) 223, 788. "The doctrine of ejusdem generis is but a rule of construction," says the Supreme Court of Minnesota, and is intended "to aid in the ascertaining the meaning of the Legislature, and does not warrant a court in confining the operation of a statute within narrower limits than intended by the lawmakers. The general object of an act sometimes requires that the final general term shall not be restricted in meaning by its more specific predecessors." Willis v. Mabon, 48 Minn. 140, 50 N. W. 1110, 16 L. R. A. 281, 31 Am. St. Rep. 626. The following cases are to the same effect: Webber v. Chicago, 148 Ill. 313, 36 N. E. 70; Lent v. Portland, 42 Or. 488, 71 Pac. 645. The foregoing statement, it seems to us, is most pertinent with regard to the meaning to be given to the phrase "or other valuable mineral deposits." To restrict this phrase so as to include no more than metalliferous deposits would, in view of what we have said about the production of metals in this state, practically rob the phrase of any meaning whatever. It would simply eliminate from consideration all other nonmetallic valuable mineral deposits of this state, of which there are a great number. To do this, as we read the constitutional provision, was manifestly not the intention of the framers thereof, nor do we think that such was the intent that the people had of it when they adopted the Constitution. The fact that in making reports of the net proceeds the Legislature required that the number of fine ounces of gold and silver and the number of pounds of copper and lead should be reported by the owners of the mines, while nothing was said about other deposits, is, to our minds, of but small significance. No provision in this regard is made with regard to coal, but the manner in which the cost of mining and reducing any mineral or coal deposit of a marketable condition is to be ascertained is provided for. Under this the net proceeds derived from a gypsum deposit is as easily ascertainable as the net proceeds from any metal or coal mine can be. The law, therefore, in this regard, is as applicable to gypsum or other valuable mineral deposits as it is to metalliferous deposits or coal. The contention that if the constitutional provision is held to apply to a deposit of gypsum because it is generically a mineral deposit, that it must likewise be held to apply to any clay or sand bank and to the waters of the Great Salt Lake is not directly involved in this case, and need not be considered at this time. It is enough for the present to determine that a gypsum deposit is within the constitutional provision, and as to whether any other particular one of the many mineral deposits is within the provision can be best determined when the question is actually presented. If we should now hold that any particular one fell within or without the provision, it would simply amount to a dictum and hence of no binding force or effect. This case involves a gypsum deposit, and nothing else.

We have carefully read all the cases cited by counsel for respondent. Among those cited is the case of Casher v. Holmes, decided in the English courts of common law, and reported in 2 B. & M. 592. The report, however, contains no more than a very brief synopsis of the decision. It appears, however, that certain import duties were imposed on "copper, brass, pewter, and tin, and on all other metals not enumerated." While the ground on which the decision is based does not appear, it perhaps was, to some extent at least, based on the doctrine that where a class of persons or objects is specified, which is followed by a general term referring to persons and objects generally, no person or object superior to the class specified will be included within the general term. And thus it was held that gold and silver, being of a superior class, were not included within the term "other metals." This doctrine is not applicable to this case. Nor is the broader doctrine of ejusdem generis applicable, as we have already pointed out. Apart from this, however, we have no means of ascertaining what the terms of the English act were upon which the court passed. It may well be that there was something in the history of English legislation upon the subject, or something in the act itself, that made it apparent that it was not the legislative intent to impose an import duty on the precious metals of gold and silver. It requires no very extended knowledge of political economy or of history to know that gold and silver constitute the metals upon which all nations rely for their medium of exchange, and that at no time did any nation discourage their importation, nor were they ever considered or classed as ordinary articles of trade or commerce with the other inferior metals. From these facts it may be readily inferred that a court would hesitate to include gold and silver within the general term under an act such as the one in question in that case. The other cases cited simply announce, illustrate, and apply the general rules of interpretation, and none of them lays down any rule contrary to those we have aimed to follow in this opinion, but, upon the contrary, we think they are in strict harmony with what has been quoted from Sutherland and the decisions.

From what has been said it follows that the trial court erred in the conclusion of law, and in entering judgment for the respondent. In view that the facts are all conceded, and thus the question involved is one purely of law, and it appearing that the respondent cannot so amend its complaint as to state a cause of action in law, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded to the district court, with directions to vacate its conclusions of law and substitute others therefor in conformity with the views herein expressed, and when so modified to enter judgment dismissing the complaint; the appellant to recover costs.

1. HABEAS CORPUS — EXISTENCE OF OTHER REMEDY—CONFINEMENT IN INSANE ASYLUM.

Rev. St. 1899, §§ 4894, 4895, providing a proceeding whereby one who has been adjudged of unsound mind and who has been restored to his right mind may have his restoration to capacity adjudged, and his guardianship, if not a minor, terminated, do not divest the courts of jurisdiction to issue a writ of habeas corpus in behalf of one illegally confined in an insane asylum, under their general power expressly given by Const. art. 5, §§ 3, 10, to issue the writ in behalf of a person in actual custody.

2. INSANE PERSONS—CUSTODY—STATE ASYLUM.—POWER OF OFFICIALS TO DISCHARGE.

In view of Rev. St. 1899, § 4888, requiring the state to pay the expenses of returning recovered patients, etc., to their homes, and in the absence of a statute to the contrary, the proper officers of the State Hospital for the Insane have authority to discharge a recovered patient, at least with the approval of the State Board of Charities and Reform, in whom, under the express provisions of sections 633, 634, is vested general supervision of charitable institutions supported by the state, and in the exercise of a reasonable discretion whenever the circumstances are deemed to justify such a course, the hospital officials may release a patient not fully recovered, either unconditionally or temporarily upon expressed conditions.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 27, Insane Persons, §§ 81, 83.]

3. SAME—RECOMMITMENT TO ASYLUM AFTER DISCHARGE — NECESSITY OF ANOTHER INQUIRY.

Rev. St. 1899, §§ 4879-4883, provide that the determination of the insanity or incompetency of a person shall be by a jury of six men, etc. Section 4886 provides that the clerk of the district court shall furnish the person to whom he issues the commitment warrant a certified copy of the verdict and physician's lunacy statement expressly required by section 4884, and the person having the warrant must deliver the certified copies, with the commitment warrant, to the superintendent of the hospital for the insane at the time of commitment. Sections 650-652 provide that the clerk shall notify the superintendent of the hospital of the proceedings, who shall cause the insane person to be conducted there. Held that, where a patient, not violently or dangerously insane, was unconditionally discharged by competent authority of the hospital, he cannot be reincarcerated without another judicial inquiry.

4. SAME—COMMITMENT WITHOUT WARRANT — VIOLENT LUNATICS.

The asylum authorities may not commit a person thereto without the legal inquiry except in case of one violently or dangerously insane, who may generally be confined temporarily without warrant until the necessary proceedings can be had.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 27, Insane Persons, § 81.]

Habeas corpus on behalf of Ed Byers against C. H. Solier, superintendent of the State Hospital for the Insane. Plaintiff discharged.

Robert S. Spence, for plaintiff. W. E. Mulen, Atty. Gen., for the defendant.

POTTER, C. J. In this case a petition for habeas corpus was presented to the Chief Justice by E. T. Payton, for and on behalf of the plaintiff, Ed Byers, alleged to be unlawfully restrained of his liberty at the State Hospital for the Insane at Evanston, in this state, by Dr. C. H. Solier, the superintendent of that institution. A similar application having been denied by District Judge Craig, within whose district the said hospital is located, for reasons presently to be stated, the petition here presented was referred by the Chief Justice to the court, and a preliminary hearing was had upon the question of the right to the writ or the propriety of issuing the same, in view of certain provisions of our statute, upon which the decision of Judge Craig, denying the writ, was based. Thereupon our conclusion to issue the writ as prayed for was orally announced, together with the views of the court upon the question argued at the preliminary hearing, and it was then stated that our opinion upon the question would be set out in writing upon finally disposing of the case. The writ was accordingly issued, and made returnable before this court as authorized by the Constitution. Const. art. 5, § 3. The defendant, as required by the writ, produced the body of the plaintiff before the court, and the case was heard upon the issues presented by the pleadings.

The petition alleges that the pretended cause of the restraint of said Byers is insanity or idiocy, or both; that about 14 years ago the said Byers was legally committed to the State Hospital for the Insane by a competent court of Albany county, in this state, but that the said restraint is illegal for the reason that the said Byers is sane, sensible, and able to attend to his own business. The answer and return of the defendant admit that the said plaintiff was duly and properly committed to said asylum or hospital for the insane as, an insane patient on or about the month of April, 1893, by the district court of Albany county, pursuant to proceedings therein had to determine plaintiff's mental condition, and alleges, in substance, that by reason of disease in early childhood the mental development of plaintiff became arrested; that he could not learn to read or write, notwithstanding that he attended school for several years; and that by reason of his defective condition he was in constant trouble, and was finally committed to the said asylum as aforesaid for imbecility. It is further averred in the answer that plaintiff's mental defect is chronic and incurable, and that he is what is commonly known as a feeble-minded person; that he is incapable of earning his own living, caring for himself, or keeping out of trouble, and that the probabilities are that he will never improve sufficiently to do so. The answer contains the following statement: "At the time of entering the asylum, plaintiff had arrived at the age of eighteen years, and after remaining therein as a patient for eight years, he was, pursuant to an urgent request and representation made by his mother to the effect that she could care for him at her home, delivered into her custody and by her taken to her home in the state of Michigan, on the fifteenth day of June, 1901. In the month of March, 1902, plaintiff was committed to the Michigan Hospital for the Insane at Kalamazoo, having become insane while in his mother's custody, and on May 2, 1902, by order of the Michigan authorities, he was returned to the Wyoming Hospital for the Insane, where he has since remained." The defendant further alleges that as superintendent of the State Hospital for the Insane he has at all times since the commitment of the plaintiff thereto exercised control and restraint over him, except the period during which he was absent from the said asylum as aforesaid, and that, because of plaintiff's mental condition, the said control and restraint continues up to the present time. It is further alleged that it has been the policy of the said institution of which the defendant is superintendent at all times to release and discharge patients therefrom, whenever a release and discharge is warranted by a proper degree of recovery, but that it would be contrary to plaintiff's best interests in consequence of his defective mental condition to release and discharge him at this time. It is also alleged that the statutes of this state provide a plain and specific remedy for the determination of cases of this character by a trial before a jury in the court from which the commitment was issued in the first instance, whereby the disability so imposed may be removed in all proper cases. Upon the filing of the answer and return, counsel for plaintiff filed and presented a motion for judgment upon the pleadings, and for the discharge of the plaintiff, for the reason that, upon the averments of the answer, it appeared that the plaintiff is held and restrained of his liberty by the defendant without authority or due process of law. Without deciding that motion at the time it was presented, it was taken under advisement, with the understanding that it should be considered in the final disposition of the case. A reply was thereupon filed, which is more in the nature of a demurrer, since it merely denies the sufficiency of the facts set forth in the answer to authorize plaintiff's restraint. Evidence was, however, produced and admitted on behalf of both parties with reference to plaintiff's mental condition, and his temporary absence from the asylum and the cause thereof, and the matter was taken under advisement upon the pleadings and the evidence for final determination.

1. It is contended on behalf of the defendant that when one having been lawfully committed to the State Hospital for the Insane claims to have been restored to his right mind, or to have recovered sufficiently to authorize his release, his remedy is not by habeas corpus, but by application for an inquiry into the facts before the court or judge before whom the proceedings were had resulting in the original commitment, pursuant to the provisions of sections 4894, 4895, Rev. St. 1899. And it appears that Judge Craig denied the writ upon the petition presented to him, on the ground that the proceeding authorized by those sections of the statute afforded a sufficient remedy, and that the restoration to his right mind of a legally committed inmate of the insane asylum was not therefore a matter that should be determined on habeas corpus. The sections referred to read as follows:

"Sec. 4894. If any person shall allege in writing, verified by oath or affirmation, that any person declared to be of unsound mind has been restored to his right mind, the court or judge by which the proceedings were had shall cause the facts to be inquired into by a jury; provided, that before such matter shall be submitted to a jury it shall be the duty of the court to ascertain and determine whether the proceeding mentioned in this section is instituted and prosecuted in the interest of the person so declared to be of unsound mind; and if found not to be so instituted and prosecuted, the court shall dismiss said proceeding at the cost of the person instituting the same; but if found to be in the interest of the person declared to be of unsound mind, the said matter shall be submitted to a jury, as in this chapter provided. In ascertaining and determining the interest as aforesaid, the court shall have power to examine under oath any and all persons, including the person declared to be of unsound mind.

"Sec. 4895. The court shall cause notice of the trial to be given to the guardian of the person so declared insane or incompetent, if there be a guardian, and to his or her husband or wife, if there be one, or to his or her father or mother, if living in the county. On the trial, the guardian or relative of the person so declared insane or incompetent, and, in the discretion of the court, any other person, may contest the right to the relief demanded. Witnesses may be required to appear and testify as in civil cases, and may be called and examined by the court on its own motion. If it be found that the person be of sound mind, and capable of taking care of himself and his property, his restoration to capacity shall be adjudged, and the guardianship of such person, if such person be not a minor, shall cease."

As previously stated the effect of these sections in relation to the right to the writ of habeas corpus was presented and considered at the preliminary hearing, and the question is again raised by the answer and return of the defendant. Notwithstanding the statutory proceeding thus provided for, we concluded, for reasons briefly and orally announced at the time, that the writ might be issued. We will now proceed to formally explain our opinion upon that matter.

It is argued by counsel for plaintiff that the purpose and effect of the sections aforesaid is to provide a remedy only for the restoration to capacity of one previously declared to be of unsound mind, and that they do not relate to the release or discharge from the hospital for the insane of a person committed thereto or confined therein. It must be conceded that there is some basis for that argument in the fact that restoration to capacity, and the discharge of the guardian, if any, is the only result expressly provided for. An order releasing the party whose condition of mind is involved from the asylum, if there confined, or from any other existing restraint, is not in terms authorized; nor is there a provision for notice to the superintendent or other official of the asylum, or other person who might have the party in custody. The sections are found in the chapter of the Code of Probate Procedure entitled "Guardians of Insane and Incompetent Persons, Lunatics and Drunkards," and in the original act enacted by the first state Legislature, the chapter related largely to proceedings and regulations respecting the guardianship of such persons, though it contained certain sections, constituting all that we have on the subject, providing the forum and the method for determining the insanity or incompetency of any person; and the act itself repealed all former statutory provisions covering that matter. In the Revision of 1899 some subsequent enactments with reference to insane or incompetent persons and their commitment to the asylum, or the Wyoming State Hospital for the Insane, as the institution is now named by statute, have been included in the aforesaid chapter of the Probate Code.

It is well known that the provisions of our Probate Code were generally taken from the statutes of California, though there are occasional differences between the statutes of the latter state and our Code upon the subject. The proceeding under the statute of California similar to the sections above referred to has been held in that state to be only applicable to persons adjudged insane or incompetent, and for whom guardians have been appointed under a related section of its Code of Civil Procedure. Kellogg v. Cochran, 87 Cal. 192, 25 Pac. 677, 12 L. R. A. 104; Aldrich v. Superior Court, 120 Cal. 140, 52 Pac. 148. But in that state it seems that there are ample and definite regulations in its Political Code for the commitment of insane and incompetent persons to the state asylum and their discharge therefrom; and in the case first above cited it was said, with reference to the proceeding similar to the one provided for by our statute above quoted, that to hold it to be applicable "to persons committed to the asylums would be utterly inconsistent with the government of those institutions according to the requirements and regulations of the Political Code." And it was further said: "After a person has been committed to either of the insane asylums on a charge of insanity, and received into the asylum, no court in this state is authorized to discharge him therefrom, or to restore him to the capacity of a sane person, under any circumstances, except upon writ of habeas corpus. The power to discharge him otherwise than upon habeas corpus is vested exclusively in the officers of the asylum." It appears that the Political Code of California provides expressly that insane persons received into the asylums must, upon recovery, be discharged therefrom, which is held, in the case cited, to imply power to determine whether or not the patient has recovered. And it seems also to be made the duty of the resident physician to discharge persons who may have been improperly committed. There is a further provision of their Political Code authorizing the kindred or friends of an inmate of an asylum to apply to the judge who committed him for an order to be directed to the trustees of the asylum for his removal to their custody, which may be issued upon their proving that they are capable and suited to take care of him. A still further provision requires the trustees to reject all other orders or applications for the release or removal of any insane person, except an order on proceedings in habeas corpus. Kellogg v. Cochran, supra. The construction of the California statute similar to that of this state by the California court is not therefore based entirely, if at all, upon the language thereof, or its relative position in the general statutes or the original act containing it, but quite largely, if not altogether, upon the effect of the provisions of a separate Code relating particularly to persons committed to an asylum. The sections of our statute under consideration were unquestionably suggested by the similar California statutes, and, in the main, the language of the latter is followed by our statute, yet there is some slight difference in that respect, and the statute here has been amended since its original adoption in a particular immaterial to the question now being discussed. The provisions of the Political Code of California, referred to in the decisions above cited, have not, however, been adopted in this state, and we have no statutory provisions similar thereto or to the same effect. It is apparent, therefore, that the California decisions construing their statute corresponding to our own cannot be regarded as controlling or even persuasive authority upon the effect or application of our statute and the proceeding thereby provided for.

We do not find any express provision of our statutes authorizing the discharge of a patient committed to the insane asylum, and, except by habeas corpus, there seems to be no remedy to enforce such discharge unless afforded by the statute in question. We entertain no doubt however of the power as well as the duty of the proper officers of the asylum to discharge a recovered patient, at least with the approval, or under the direction of the State Board of Charities and Reform, in whom is vested general supervision and control of that and all other charitable institutions supported by the state. Rev. St. 1899, §§ 633, 634. It is self-evident that the object of establishing the hospital for the insane was not the involuntary confinement of persons of sound and healthy minds, and that such hospital is not a proper place for the restraint of a person subject to no mental infirmity. And indeed the board and superintendent, as appears by the answer herein, and the evidence in this case, have exercised the power of discharge from time to time, by releasing such patients as were deemed to have reached a proper degree of recovery to warrant it. Nevertheless, the fact remains that there is no statute particularly regulating that matter which could affect the construction to be given the sections authorizing the proceeding, which is here suggested as a statutory remedy sufficient to justify, if not to require, the denial of the writ of habeas corpus in cases of this character.

In the California case of Kellogg v. Cochran, supra, an official discharge from the asylum pursuant to the statute was held to operate as a restoration to capacity of the person so discharged; and thus, the proceeding provided by their Civil Code would be unnecessary to obtain a restoration to capacity of one committed to an asylum but without guardian. Whether restoration to capacity of one without a guardian would follow a discharge by an official of the asylum in this state, in the absence of express statutory authority for such discharge, is not necessarily involved in this case, for here we have merely the question of the legality of the plaintiff's restraint to consider and determine. But it would seem that as our statute providing the proceeding referred to contains no exceptions, and is unaffected and unqualified by other statutory provisions, one who had been committed to the asylum, though without a guardian, might invoke it to have his restoration to capacity judicially declared. Indeed section 4895 seems to imply that the party whose restoration to capacity is sought may be without a guardian. Whether the proceeding may be instituted for the further purpose of procuring by judicial order a release from the insane hospital, or from any other restraint, is a more serious question, and we think may be subject to some doubt. We are of the opinion, however, that it is unnecessary to decide that question in this case. Our comments in relation to the matter have been for the purpose of suggesting to those interested the unsatisfactory, if not doubtful, condition of our statutes regarding the remedy for the discharge upon recovery of one committed to the hospital for the insane, since it is a subject that can be and clearly ought to be regulated by legislative enactment, within reasonable and constitutional restrictions. If it should be conceded that the legality of the confinement of a party in the asylum, whose sanity or soundness of mind is alleged, may be determined in the aforesaid statutory proceeding, and his release enforced thereby, we are of the opinion, nevertheless, that the courts and the judges thereof are not divested by the statute of their jurisdiction conferred by the Constitution to issue writs of habeas corpus on petition by or on behalf of any person in actual custody. Const. art. 5, §§ 3, 10. Moreover we observe nothing in the statute in question to indicate a legislative attempt to interfere with that jurisdiction. If the statute had clearly authorized an order for a party's release from custody by the proceeding provided for, it might, perhaps, have afforded a sufficient reason for requiring a resort to it before the issuance of a writ of habeas corpus; though in such event we are satisfied that the power would exist to issue the writ and determine the legality of the restraint without compelling a resort in the first instance to the statutory proceeding. But as there is some doubt as to the effect of the statute, and we have no doubt of the jurisdiction in habeas corpus, we were and are of the opinion that the writ ought to be issued upon the petition filed herein, and the legality of the restraint of plaintiff determined thereon. That a person unlawfully restrained of his liberty as an insane person is entitled to a writ of habeas corpus upon proper application, as well as a person illegally confined upon any other ground or excuse, is not, we think, open to question. 16 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. (2d Ed.) 598. In a Michigan case this principle was forcibly stated as follows: "The writ of habeas corpus penetrates the walls of insane asylums as fully and freely as any other place where persons are illegally restrained of their liberty." Palmer v. Circuit Judge, 83 Mich. 528, 47 N. W. 355.

2. In our statement of the case, the averment of the answer is quoted which relates to the release of the plaintiff from the asylum at his mother's request in June, 1901, and his again becoming an inmate thereof in May, 1902. It appears from the evidence respecting that circumstance that, at the solicitation of the mother, the defendant, as superintendent of the asylum, with the approval of the board of charities and reform, caused the plaintiff to be delivered into her custody, and he was taken to Michigan where the mother then resided, and an entry was made in the records of the institution to the effect that he had been discharged as improved. Within a short time after his commitment to the Michigan institution for the insane, the authorities of that state, having learned of his previous confinement in the asylum here, contended that he was a proper charge of this state, and insisted that he be received and taken care of by this state; whereupon, by the consent or order of the board of charities and reform, he was brought back and again placed in the hospital for the insane at Evanston, where he has since been restrained, without further commitment or further proceedings in this state to determine his mental condition.

The motion for the discharge of plaintiff upon the pleadings was based upon the allegation of the answer showing such release, and plaintiff's subsequent confinement without a new judicial inquiry; and the point suggested by the motion is also raised upon the evidence. So that, irrespective of the question whether the condition of plaintiff's mind is such as to constitute him a proper subject for restraint in a hospital for the insane, the sufficiency of the proceedings to authorize his present restraint is presented upon the above facts. The statute is somewhat indefinite respecting the commitment and discharge of insane persons or those affected with mental unsoundness, who are not accused or convicted of any offense against the criminal laws, and that is particularly noticeable as to the form and terms of the commitment, or the order therefor, and the authority to discharge one from custody who may have been committed to the hospital for the insane, as well as the condition or occasion which will authorize or require such a discharge. It is provided that the determination of the insanity or incompetency of any person shall be by a jury of six men before the district court, or, in vacation, before the judge, or the court commissioner or clerk of court. Rev. St. 1899, §§ 4879-4883. And the clerk is required to furnish the person to whom he issues the warrant a certified copy of the verdict and the physician's lunacy statement (which statement is required by section 4884), and the person to whom the warrant is issued is required to deliver such certified copies, with the commitment warrant, to the superintendent of the hospital at the time of commitment. Id. § 4886. Whenever a person is adjudged insane and ordered by the proper court to be committed to the hospital for the insane, the clerk of court is required to notify the superintendent of the hospital of such proceedings; and thereupon the superintendent is required, under such rules as shall have been provided by the state board, to conduct, or cause to be conducted, the person so declared to be insane to the hospital for the insane. Id. §§ 650-652. A section of the Revised Statutes of 1887 (section 3765) is not brought into the Revision of 1899, but is probably in force, as to its continuing provisions which have not been abrogated or repealed, by virtue of section 2714, Rev. St. 1899, which provides that "all acts or statutes in relation to public institutions of the state" in force at the time of the act providing for the last-named revision shall continue in force, or expire, according to their respective provisions or limitations, and shall not be construed as repealed by anything in the said revision contained, or the act providing therefor. Said section of the Revised Statutes of 1887 is found in the chapter devoted to the insane asylum—now the hospital for the insane—and provided for notice to the commissioners of the various counties of the completion and readiness for use of the asylum building whenever that should occur; whereupon it was further provided that, after the receipt of such notice, each board of county commissioners should cause all persons adjudged to be insane, and whose care shall have been thrown upon the county, to be sent as patients of the territory (state) to the insane asylum at Evanston, to be kept and cared for by the territory (state). That a discharge from the asylum or hospital upon discovery of the mental soundness of a patient or the recovery of one committed to it was contemplated by the Legislature is evident from the provisions of section 4888, Rev. St. 1899, which was enacted in 1897, imposing the duty upon the state to pay all expenses of returning recovered patients, and patients found not to be insane, to their respective homes or the county from which they were committed. But there seems to be no provision of the statutes expressly authorizing or requiring a discharge by the asylum authorities. Manifestly, an original judicial inquiry under the statute into a person's mental condition has reference to the condition of the person at the time of the hearing, and a verdict of insanity or incompetency will be based upon such condition at that time. In other words, if it be so found, the person is then declared to be of unsound mind, and as such the commitment to custody follows. But the hearing, verdict, order, and commitment will not necessarily adjudicate the condition of the party for all time. It is evident that, in many cases, recovery may occur. It would seem, therefore, that the commitment should require the restraint of the party only during the period that the insanity, unsoundness of mind, or incompetency shall continue, or until he shall be lawfully released.

In the absence of a statute making positive regulations for a voluntary discharge, must a patient, once committed to the asylum, be retained there until released upon habeas corpus, or by some other authorized judicial proceeding by which a release may be enforced; or, without a judicial investigation, may the officers in charge of the institution discharge one committed to it when they are able to determine that a proper degree of recovery has occurred to justify it, or upon the happening of any condition rendering the discharge in their judgment advisable? We are of the opinion that in the absence of a statute making contrary regulations or restrictions, or expressly or impliedly vesting exclusive authority in the premises elsewhere, the controlling authorities of the institution, to carry out the obvious purpose of its establishment, must be held to possess the power to voluntarily release a committed party upon his recovery; or, in the exercise of a reasonable discretion and acting in good faith, whenever the circumstances are deemed proper to justify such a course, to release a patient who may not have fully recovered, either unconditionally, or temporarily and upon expressed conditions. That the state board and the superintendent have found the exercise of such power to be necessary, in the present state of our statutes, is shown by the averments of the answer in this case. If that should be deemed too great a power to vest in the hospital authorities without restriction, it is a matter easily remedied by legislation. It is clearly not impossible or even improbable that in occasional cases the character of the mental disorder of an inmate may be such that his care out of the institution by relatives or friends willing to assume the burden thereof will be proper without endangering the welfare of the patient or the safety of the public.

In Rutter v. State, 38 Ohio St. 496, it appeared that a patient had been committed to the State Hospital for the Insane, and the superintendent of the institution, believing the same for the patient's welfare, permitted her temporary removal out of the state in the charge and custody of her sister. Such action was upheld, notwithstanding that there was no statute expressly authorizing it; and the court refused a mandamus at the suit of the patient's husband to compel her restoration to the asylum. The court said that "the power of the superintendent is measured, in no small degree, in matters of that sort, by the apparent welfare of the patient." The statutes of Ohio provided that a patient might be discharged on the application of the superintendent to one of the trustees, and order of such trustee; and that there might be a discharge at the request of friends of the patient upon giving a bond, if required by the superintendent, conditional upon the safekeeping of the patient. The removal of the patient in the case cited was not made pursuant to either of those provisions, but in the exercise of a general discretion for the best interest of the patient. See, also, Stratham v. Blackford, 89 Va. 771, 17 S. E. 233.

Having concluded that the authorities in control of the hospital for the insane may in good faith discharge a patient committed thereto, we are next to inquire into the effect of an unconditional discharge, such as occurred in 1901 by the discharge of the plaintiff in this case. We refer to that discharge as unconditional, for we think the circumstances show it to have been such. That any condition was attached to the discharge is not disclosed by the answer or the evidence. It may have been and probably was confidently expected that the patient would be kept out of the state, or at least safely in the mother's custody, but it does not appear that the release of plaintiff was conditioned upon that being done. In view of the matter heard and determined upon a lunacy inquisition under the statute providing therefor, and the effect of an order and commitment for the restraint of the party found upon such an inquisition to be of unsound mind or incompetent, the conclusion seems to be inevitable that the hearing and commitment will have served their purpose, and ceased to be effectual, after an unconditional discharge from the place of lawful restraint by competent authority. If circumstances thereafter should arise seeming to require or justify a renewal of the custody and restraint, in the interest of the person or the public, another hearing ought to be had to determine the question. Great injustice would often, if not generally, result from a different rule, even if the legal rights of the party to be personally affected were not to be considered. But a person charged with insanity or other mental infirmity has the same legal right as any other citizen to claim the benefit of constitutional and statutory provisions affecting his personal liberty.

In the case of In re Thorpe, 64 Vt. 398, 24 Atl. 991, the following facts were presented: The relator, an inmate of an asylum for the insane, was ordered discharged by two of the three supervisors of the insane, upon condition that, in case it should become necessary to return him to the asylum, it might be done by a revocation of their order by one of them. The relator was thereupon discharged from the asylum, and a few months afterward one of the two supervisors who had signed the discharge order revoked it, and an officer thereupon took the relator into custody for the purpose of returning him to the asylum. The laws of the state conferred upon the supervisors of the insane authority to discharge such incurable persons as may, in their judgment, be safely and properly cared for in the place from whence they were committed, but provided that persons so discharged should require for their recommitment to the asylum only the revocation of their discharge by the supervisors. Upon the facts and the law thus stated, it was held, in a habeas corpus proceeding brought by the relator, that the supervisors could impose only such conditions in discharging him as were authorized by the statute; that the power to revoke a discharge was not conferred upon one of their number, but upon a majority of them; that the question passed upon in discharging the relator concerned his personal liberty, and that, when a majority of the supervisors had once adjudged that he be discharged, he could not against be deprived of his liberty except in the manner pointed out in the statute. For those reasons the relator was held to be unlawfully deprived of his liberty, and it was ordered that he be discharged from the custody of the officer.

In Gresh's Case, 12 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 295, a petition in habeas corpus was presented by a brother of a party confined in the hospital for the insane, and, after a hearing, an order was made releasing him temporarily until a date therein stated, at which time he was required to again appear, and his wife and the hospital authorities were also required to then appear to show cause why there should not be a full discharge. The petition set up as a ground for release of the party in whose interest it was filed that he had been fully restored to his reason, and was not held for any criminal or supposed criminal matter. At the next hearing the evidence was somewhat conflicting as to the mental condition of the party whose liberty was sought, but the court felt satisfied of his soundness of mind and discharged him. The following remark of the court is pertinent to the inquiry here: "If the reason or judgment of the relator should again fail him to such an extent as to make it a dire necessity to interpose and control him, * * * the law governing the same may be resorted to and enforced, as in other cases." Although, in the present state of our statutes and as they existed in 1901, the asylum authorities may discharge an inmate, if that be deemed proper in their judgment, they are not vested with authority to commit a person thereto, nor to confine him there against his consent, without the inquiry provided by law, except, perhaps, temporarily, in the case of one violently or dangerously insane, until the necessary proceedings can be had, to avoid the injury which might be reasonably expected to occur if the party was allowed to be at large. Generally, it is permissible, without warrant or express authority, to confine temporarily a person disposed to do mischief to himself or another person, until the proper proceedings can be instituted to have the question of his sanity determined. In such a case the restraint becomes necessary and therefore proper, both for the safety of the party himself and for the preservation of the public peace. 16 Am. & Ency. L. (2d Ed.) 596.

The case before us does not come within the exception above noted. The restraint complained of appears not to have been undertaken in contemplation of the statutory proceeding for a commitment, but upon the order of the board in the exercise of a supposed duty without further proceedings. The act of the board and superintendent was no doubt in good faith in renewing their custody of the plaintiff; and it may be assumed that if he was a public charge, which seems probable, the burden thereof properly rested upon this state. There is nothing in the evidence before us to show that his relatives or any friend, at the time, was interposing in his behalf, or offering to undertake the responsibility of his support, and we understand that he had no means or estate of his own. We are of the opinion, however, that to justify his continued restraint without his consent a judicial inquiry pursuant to statute was and is required. According to the evidence the plaintiff is not vicious; and he is not insane in the sense that he is subject to delusions. His mental development appears to have been arrested during childhood, and his condition is best expressed, as stated by the superintendent, by the term "feeble-minded." That official testified that the plaintiff is unable to take care of himself, owing to such arrested development, resulting in his lack of knowledge, and inability to acquire knowledge about matters essential to his own interests if allowed to remain at large; and, in the superintendent's opinion, his mind is incapable of substantial improvement, though the party presenting the petition here seems to hold a contrary view. The plaintiff was not only present, but was examined as a witness in his own behalf. So far as he possessed information he answered intelligently; but he appeared to be deficient in a knowledge of numbers and money values, and seemed to have but little comprehension thereof. He admitted that in regard to the exchange of money he would require assistance. He expressed a desire and intention, if released, to take up a homestead and cultivate it near the residence of his friend who presented his petition; and he gave evidence of some understanding respecting the elementary requirements in the cultivation of the soil. He had, it appears, before his commitment to the asylum in 1893, worked at times for others in the city of Laramie, where he then lived; and at the asylum he has been intrusted with certain daily duties, but not calling for the exercise of much, if any, independent judgment. He has had a part in cultivating a garden upon the asylum premises and raising produce for the market upon his own account, in company, however, with another, who we understand took charge of the business features of the enterprise.

Plaintiff's restraint is therefore not a temporary necessity so as to be authorized without a warrant or commitment.

Inasmuch as our decision is based upon the insufficiency of the proceedings to authorize the retention of the plaintiff in the hospital for the insane, and that upon such ground he has a right to demand his release, we do not think it necessary or proper to consider the question whether his condition is such as would render his commitment justifiable upon proceedings instituted pursuant to law. The friend of the plaintiff, who has interceded in this case in the latter's behalf, has announced his willingness and desire to take charge of the plaintiff in case of his release, so far as the same may be necessary for his protection, and we assume that he will do so. There is no apparent reason therefore, even if it would be authorized in any case, to make any other order in the premises than for plaintiff's discharge. For the reasons above stated, we find that the plaintiff is unlawfully deprived of his liberty, and an order will be entered discharging him from custody.

BUTLER v. SUPREME COURT OF THE INDEPENDENT ORDER OF FORESTERS.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Dec. 20, 1907.)

INSURANCE — MUTUAL BENEFIT INSURANCE — FOREIGN COMPANIES — ACTIONS — VENUE.

Laws 1901, p. 360, c. 174, § 6, provides that foreign beneficiary societies shall appoint the commissioner of insurance their lawful attorney, upon whom all process in actions against them must be served. Held, that an action against such a society need not be brought in the county where the commissioner of insurance resides; Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. § 4854, requiring an action against a corporation to be brought in any county where the corporation has an office for business, or any person resides on whom process may be served, not being applicable.

Appeal from Superior Court, Spokane County; Wm. A. Huneke, Judge.

Action by Tena Butler against the Supreme Court of the Independent Order of Foresters. From a judgment of dismissal, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Belden & Losey, for appellant. M. C. King and Samuel R. Stern, for respondent.

DUNBAR, J. This action was brought by appellant to recover on a certain benefit certificate issued to one August Schneider, wherein appellant is named as the beneficiary. Service was made upon the defendant, a foreign corporation, on the 14th day of February, 1906, by leaving with M. C. King, the Deputy Supreme Chief Ranger and Financial Secretary, at Spokane, Wash., true copies of the summons and complaint. Afterwards service was made upon the commissioner of insurance, who, by the provisions of the statute of 1901 relative to beneficiary societies, is made the statutory agent for the purpose of service of process upon a foreign corporation or beneficiary society. The respondent appeared, and, by way of answer, set out as its plea in abatement the fact that the superior court of Spokane county had no jurisdiction of the case, for the reason that the service was had upon the commissioner of insurance in Thurston county, and that all actions against a foreign corporation must be brought in the county where the statutory agent resides. Upon such plea the court entered a judgment dismissing the complaint, for the reason that the superior court of Spokane county had no jurisdiction to try the cause, to which order appellant excepted, and this appeal is taken.

The respondent relies upon the case of Hammel v. Fidelity Mutual Aid Ass'n, 42 Wash. 448, 85 Pac. 35. There action was brought upon an accident insurance policy, and the suit was instituted in Snohomish county. The defendant was a foreign corporation. The summons was personally served upon one C. G. Helfner, who had been appointed statutory agent by the defendant, and who was served in King county. The defendant interposed a motion to dismiss the cause on the ground that it was a foreign corporation, that at the time of the service of summons it had no office for the transaction of business in Snohomish county, that no person resided in said county upon whom process against the defendant might be served, and that the court was therefore without jurisdiction. The motion was supported by affidavit showing that at the time of the service upon Mr. Helfner, the statutory agent of defendant, he was, and for a long time prior thereto had been continuously, a resident of Seattle, King county, and that he was then such a resident. This service was held bad by this court by reason of the doctrine announced in McMaster v. Advance Thresher Co., 10 Wash. 147, 38 Pac. 760, and such holding was a construction of section 4854, Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St., which provides that an action against a corporation may be brought in any county where the corporation has an office for the transaction of business, or any person resides upon whom process may be served against such corporation. But that statute is not involved in the case at bar. This is a special statute relating to beneficiary societies who are not authorized to appoint agents in counties where they do their principal business, but the law arbitrarily imposes upon them the duty of appointing the commissioner of insurance of this state, not as an agent to transact business, but as a person upon whom process may be served. His full duty is performed in this regard when he reports the service upon him to the corporation which is sued, and he is not recognized in any other respect as the representative of the company. Section 6, p. 360, c. 174, Laws 1901, is as follows: "Each such association now doing business or hereafter admitted to do business within this state and not having its principal office within this state, and not being organized under the laws of this state, shall appoint, in writing, the commissioner of insurance and his successors in office to be its true and lawful attorney, upon whom all lawful process in any action or proceeding against it must be served, and in such writing shall agree that any lawful process against it which is served on said attorney, shall be of the same legal force and validity as if served upon the association, and that the authority shall continue in force so long as any liability remains outstanding in this state." So that a different proposition is involved from that in a case where a corporation has an office in the county for the purpose of conducting business, and has appointed an agent with reference to that general business. In this character of cases the beneficiaries are not generally people of large means, and courts ought not to make it hard for them to obtain redress from foreign corporations. There is nothing in the statute to indicate that it was the intention of the Legislature to compel litigants of this character to commence their actions in Thurston county simply because the person who is arbitrarily mentioned by the statute as the person upon whom service could be made happens to reside in that county.

We think the superior court of Spokane county had jurisdiction of the action, and the judgment is reversed, with instructions to proceed with the trial of the cause.

WINDT v. COVERT. (S. F. 3,114.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 29, 1907.)

1. MORTGAGES — CONVEYANCE CONSTITUTING MORTGAGE—RIGHTS OF MORTGAGEE ON SATISFYING PRIOR LIEN.

Where the maker of a note purchased land incumbered by a mortgage, and caused the vendor to convey the same to the payee to secure the note, the payee held a legal title, subject to the resulting trust in favor of the maker, and was in equity, within Civ. Code, § 2924, a mortgagee, holding a special lien within sections 2875, 2876, and 2923, providing that, where the holder of a special lien is compelled to satisfy a prior lien for his own protection, he may enforce payment of the amount, etc.

2. SAME — JUNIOR MORTGAGEE — PAYMENT OF SENIOR MORTGAGE — ENFORCEMENT — LIMITATIONS.

Under Civ. Code, § 2876, providing that, where the holder of a special lien is compelled to satisfy a prior lien for his own protection, he may enforce payment of the amount as a part of the claim for which his own lien exists, a grantee in a conveyance operating as a mortgage, compelled to satisfy a prior lien for his own protection, may add the amount thereof to the amount for which the conveyance is security and enforce both in one action, within Code

Civ. Proc. § 726, and, so long as the right to foreclose his conveyance exists, the right to recover the amount paid to satisfy the prior lien is not barred by limitations.

3. SAME:

Where a junior mortgagee pays the debt secured by a senior mortgage after the commencement of an action to foreclose it, he is compelled to pay the senior mortgage for his own protection, within Civ. Code, § 2876, and he may enforce payment of the amount so paid as a part of the claim for which his own lien exists.

4. SAME—"SATISFY."

The word "satisfy," in Civ. Code, § 2876, providing that where the holder of a special lien is compelled to "satisfy" a prior lien, he may enforce payment of the amount thereof as a part of the claim for which his own lien exists, when considered in connection with section 2941, providing for a satisfaction of record, and declaring that it must be entered when any mortgage has been "satisfied," means payment or discharge, and a junior mortgagee who pays a senior mortgage satisfies it, though there is no formal release of record.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 7, pp. 6328-6334.]

5. SAME—FORECLOSURE—PERSONAL LIABILITY—DEFICIENCY JUDGMENT.

A junior mortgagee to whom mortgaged land, purchased by his debtor, has been conveyed by the vendor as security for the debt, who pays the senior mortgage, is not entitled by virtue of Civ. Code, § 2876, to a deficiency judgment against his debtor for the amount so paid, a personal liability depending on a promise to pay.

6. SAME—PROCEEDS OF SALE—APPLICATION.

The maker of a note purchased mortgaged land, and caused a conveyance thereof to be made to the payee to secure the note. The payee paid the existing mortgage and foreclosed his conveyance, treating it as a mortgage. Held, that the proceeds of the sale should be applied first to the discharge of the payee's claim for the payment of the existing mortgage, though Civ. Code, § 2876, entitles the payee to enforce payment of the amount so paid as a part of his claim.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; John Ellsworth, Judge.

Action by Morris Windt against Mary I. Covert. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Judgment modified and affirmed, and order denying a new trial affirmed.

Welles Whitmore and R. V. Whiting, for appellant. Mary I. Covert and Wallace A. Wise, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. On April 27, 1893, the defendant executed and delivered to plaintiff her promissory note in the sum of $2,200, payable six months after date. At the same time, and as security for the payment of said note, said defendant Mary I. Covert purchased from one Brown a parcel of land in the county of Alameda, and caused Brown to execute a conveyance thereof to the plaintiff. This action was commenced on the 25th day of October, 1897, and by his complaint the plaintiff, treating the conveyance of the land to himself as a mortgage, sought a decree of foreclosure. At the time of the execution and delivery of the deed by Brown to the plaintiff, there existed a mortgage on said premises made by Brown to one Hardy to secure a promissory note in the sum of $3,000, with interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum. The complaint alleges that on or about the 15th day of December, 1893, Hardy brought an action to foreclose his said mortgage, and that on or about the 25th day of May, 1894, the plaintiff herein paid, satisfied, and discharged said note and mortgage by paying and delivering to Lucius L. Solomons, to whom Hardy had assigned his note and mortgage, the sum of $3,483.46; that being the amount then due and owing thereon. It is alleged, further, that said sum of $3,483.46 was necessarily and properly expended by the plaintiff to protect and preserve his own lien. The complaint sets forth that the plaintiff had been in possession of the property and had collected rents, which he credited upon the interest due, and that he had allowed to the defendant a further credit of $915 on the principal of the promissory note executed by her. An answer was filed raising various issues, and after a trial the plaintiff had judgment of foreclosure adjudging that there was due him from the defendant Covert the sum of $375.25 on account of the note executed by said defendant, and the further sum of $4,378.25 on account of moneys paid by the plaintiff to Solomons to pay and satisfy the debt secured by the Hardy mortgage, directing a sale and providing for a deficiency judgment against the defendant Mary I. Covert in the event that the proceeds of such sale should prove insufficient to pay said sums and costs. The defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying her motion for a new trial.

It appears that at the time this action was commenced, October 25, 1897, an independent action to foreclose the mortgage given by Brown to Hardy, or a suit by plaintiff to be subrogated to Hardy's claim, would, if then begun, have been barred by the statute of limitations. In the answer of the defendant she relied upon the statute of limitations, so far as plaintiff's right to recover the amount paid on the Hardy note and mortgage was concerned, and it is now urged that the court erred in including the amount paid on said note and mortgage in the judgment herein. This contention is answered by the provisions of section 2876 of the Civil Code, which reads: "Where the holder of a special lien is compelled to satisfy a prior lien for his own protection, he may enforce payment of the amount so paid by him, as a part of the claim for which his own lien exists." That the conveyance of the property in question to the plaintiff, under the circumstances above set forth, constituted him the holder of a special lien within the meaning of the Civil Code (see section 2875), is not questioned. The plaintiff became the holder of the legal title, subject to a resulting trust in favor of the defendant, the real purchaser. But the fact that the title was conveyed as security gave the transaction, in equity, the additional character of a mortgage. Civ. Code, § 2924, "In such a case the grantee holds a double relation to the real purchaser; he is his trustee of the legal title to the land and his mortgagee for the money advanced for its purchase." Campbell v. Freeman, 99 Cal. 546, 548, 34 Pac. 113, 114; Woodard v. Hennegan, 128 Cal. 293, 60 Pac. 769; Banta v. Wise, 135 Cal. 277, 67 Pac. 129. And as such mortgagee he is the holder of a special lien, "unless otherwise expressly agreed." Civ. Code, § 2923. The effect of section 2876 is to give to the holder of a special lien, who is compelled to satisfy any prior lien for his own protection, the right to add the amount so paid to the amount for which his special lien was security and to enforce both together. "There can be but one action for the recovery of any debt * * * secured by mortgage." Code Civ. Proc. § 726. Such action, which is an action of foreclosure, affords the only method by which the plaintiff could enforce payment of the "claim for which his own lien exists." The only way in which he could enforce payment of the amount paid by him in satisfaction of a prior lien as a part of the claim which he already held was by including that amount in the action brought by him for foreclosure of his mortgage. So long as the right to foreclose his junior lien existed, the right to recover as a part of it the amounts paid by him to satisfy prior liens could not, consistently with the provisions of section 2876, be barred by the statute of limitations. Any other construction of this section might require the holder of a lien, who has been compelled to satisfy prior liens, to commence separate actions to recover the amounts paid on account of such prior liens before his own obligation became due. To compel him to commence such separate actions would be contrary to the plain provision of the statute, which allows him to enforce payment of the amounts so paid by him as a part of his own claim.

The payment of the Hardy mortgage by plaintiff was made after an action had been commenced by Hardy against Brown and the plaintiff herein to foreclose said mortgage, but before said action had gone to judgment. It is argued that a payment at this time was not within the rule of section 2876, above quoted, in that plaintiff was not "compelled" to pay said mortgage. The argument appears to be that a lienholder has no right under this section to satisfy a prior lien until a suit on such prior lien has been carried to judgment and sale has been had and the time for redemption is about to expire. This is an unreasonable construction of the section and one which would not benefit the debtor, since the delay insisted upon would result merely in adding costs and expenses to the amount which must ultimately be paid by such debtor. In Foster v. Furlong, 8 N. D. 282, 78 N. W. 987, the Supreme Court of North Dakota, in construing a statute identical with section 2876 of our Civil Code, says: "The compulsion with which one acts in paying a prior lien and which entitles him to add the amount so paid to his lien is merely an existing necessity to do so to protect his own interests under his lien after the party primarily liable to make the payments has defaulted in so doing." We think this is the proper construction of the language; and that where the holder of a lien upon property pays a prior mortgage thereon, after suit to foreclose such prior mortgage has been commenced or is threatened, he is, within the meaning of the section under discussion, compelled to pay such mortgage for his own protection. Upon the payment of the amount of the Hardy mortgage by plaintiff to Solomons (the assignee of Hardy), the suit to foreclose that mortgage was not dismissed, and said suit was still pending at the time of the trial of this case. Furthermore, there was no evidence that any formal release of the mortgage had been entered of record, and the court excluded evidence offered by the defendant to prove that such mortgage had not been satisfied of record. The point made in this regard is that the mere payment of a prior lien is not a compliance with the provisions of section 2876 which gives rights to one who has been compelled to satisfy a prior lien. It is argued that a formal satisfaction must be entered of record. We think there is no reason for giving this technical construction to the word "satisfy." Civ. Code, § 2941, which provides for a satisfaction of record, declares that it must be entered "when any mortgage has been satisfied." The word "satisfied," as here used, unquestionably means no more than paid or discharged, and the same meaning, which is the usual and ordinary one, should be given to it in section 2876.

The appellant attacks the findings of the court to the effect that the plaintiff went into possession by and with the consent of the defendant and that the net rents received by the plaintiff were $1,330.64. Without reviewing the evidence, we shall merely state that it was sufficient to support the findings.

Finally, the appellant claims that the judgment is erroneous in directing that, in case the property does not sell for sufficient to pay the plaintiff, a deficiency judgment be entered as against the defendant. So far as the judgment authorizes a personal judgment which shall include the amount paid by the plaintiff to satisfy the Hardy mortgage, we think this contention is sound, and must be sustained. The appellant executed a promissory note by which she agreed to pay the plaintiff $2,200. Of this amount the court finds that $375.25 is still due. This is the only amount which the appellant ever undertook to pay. While, by virtue of section 2876 of the Civil Code and of the general principles of equity, the property given as security by her for this claim is properly chargeable with the payment of any amounts which the lienholder was obliged to expend to protect his security, no reason is suggested, and none suggests itself to us, why the appellant should, in the event of a deficiency of security, be held to be personally liable to pay the amount due upon a note which she never executed and payment of which she never assumed. Section 2876 makes the amount paid to satisfy a prior lien a part of a secured claim of the party paying, but this is only for the purpose of enforcing payment out of the security. The lien is made to cover both amounts. But a personal liability does not result from the mere existence of a lien. Such liability depends on a promise to pay, and here there has been no such promise, express or implied. The defendant was not personally liable on the Hardy mortgage while it was held by Hardy or his assignee, and a personal liability to plaintiff could not arise from the mere fact that plaintiff for his own protection, and not at the request of the defendant, paid off the mortgage. While the defendant is not personally liable for the amount paid on account of the Hardy mortgage, it is proper that the proceeds of sale should be applied to the discharge of this claim before applying them to the payment of the amount due on the note signed by the defendant. The Hardy mortgage was, before plaintiff satisfied it, a prior lien, and, as such, entitled to priority in payment. The fact that plaintiff, on paying this prior lien, became entitled to enforce payment of the amount so paid as a part of his already existing claim (Civ. Code, § 2876), furnishes no reason why in equity the respective priorities of the liens, as theretofore existing, should be disturbed.

It was suggested at the oral argument that a sale of the property under the judgment had been had and that no deficiency had resulted, and that, therefore, the question of personal liability is of merely academic interest. But these facts do not appear of record, and, furthermore, the appellant, if she has succeeded in showing that the judgment appealed from was erroneous in any particular, is entitled to recover her costs of appeal. The error herein referred to will not, however, require a retrial of the case, nor will it, in case a sale has been had, require a vacation of that sale. Conformity to the views hereinabove expressed can be effected by adding to the decree a provision that the amount of any deficiency judgment shall not exceed the balance found due on the note executed by the defendant.

It is ordered that the judgment be modified by limiting the amount of any deficiency judgment to be entered against the defendant to $375.25, with interest at the legal rate from the date of judgment, and that, as so modified, the judgment be affirmed.

The order denying a new trial is affirmed.

LAUREL HILL CEMETERY v. CITY & COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al.
(S. F. 3,855.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 4, 1907.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—POLICE POWER—HEALTH.

Under Const. art. 11, § 11, empowering any county or city to enforce within its limits local, police, sanitary, and other regulations, not in conflict with the general laws, and under the charter of the city and county of San Francisco the supervisors thereof have power to pass ordinances placing such restriction on the use of property or the conduct of business as may be necessary for the public health, provided such ordinances bear a reasonable relation to the object sought to be attained, and are not arbitrary or unreasonable, and are not a cloak for an arbitrary interference with or suppression of a lawful business.

2. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—DETERMINATION OF QUESTIONS—JUDICIAL REVIEW.

The determination by a legislative body of what is a proper exercise of its police power, or the expediency or necessity of a restrictive measure, though primarily for the Legislature, is subject to judicial review.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 36, Municipal Corporations, §§ 1308, 1309.]

3. HEALTH—VALIDITY OF REGULATIONS—CEMETERIES.

Where a cemetery is located in a thickly settled community, further interments therein may be prohibited because the burial of dead bodies therein tends to endanger the public health; but where a cemetery is remote from human habitations, or is close to but few dwellings, the absolute prohibition of interments therein is an unreasonable restriction of a lawful business, not required for the preservation of the public health, and will not be sustained by the courts.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 25, Health, § 25; vol. 9, Cemeteries, §§ 1-3.]

4. SAME.

Where a city includes considerable tracts of uninhabited areas, interments anywhere within the limits of the city may not be prohibited merely because the territory involved is within the boundaries of the city.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 25, Health, §§ 24, 25; vol. 9, Cemeteries, §§ 1-3.]

5. SAME.

An ordinance of the city and county of San Francisco prohibiting the interment of dead bodies within the limits thereof, adopted after the passage of Pen. Code, § 297, prohibiting the burial of human remains within the corporate limits of San Francisco, excepting in existing cemeteries, or those subsequently established by the supervisors thereof, merely prohibits interment in existing cemeteries, in fact, situated within densely populated portions of the municipality, and is valid as a reasonable exercise of the police power.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 25, Health, §§ 24-26; vol. 9, Cemeteries, §§ 1-3.]

6. SAME.

Since the police power granted by the Constitution is not restricted to the suppression of nuisances, but includes the regulation of the conduct of business, to the end that the public health may not be endangered, an ordinance of the city and county of San Francisco prohibiting interments within the limits thereof is not unreasonable in its application to a cemetery, the soil of which is of such character that no disease breeding elements can be transmitted through the same; the question whether the danger from interments is to be averted by a prohibition of further burials being a question of legislative policy.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 25, Health, §§ 24-26; vol. 9, Cemeteries, §§ 1-3.]

7. SAME.

Even if a city expressly granted to a cemetery association the right to make interments in a cemetery in perpetuity, the city might exercise its police power and prohibit interments therein, since the police power cannot be contracted away, and since all rights and property are subject to it.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 25, Health, §§ 24-26; vol. 9, Cemeteries, §§ 1-3.]

8. SAME.

A cemetery at the time of its establishment was outside the limits of San Francisco, in unsettled territory. The municipality granted land for the cemetery, and acquiesced in the expenditure of money in improvements thereof. The city thereafter, by reason of its growth, included the cemetery within its limits, and the surrounding territory became thickly settled. Held, that the city was not estopped from exercising its police power by prohibiting further interments in the cemetery.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 25, Health, §§ 24-26, 35; vol. 9, Cemeteries, §§ 1-3.]

9. SAME.

After a cemetery, originally located one mile from any habitation, had become the center of thickly populated portions of San Francisco, the city adopted an ordinance, prohibiting further interments therein, which was not to be in force until nearly 18 months after its passage. Held, that the ordinance was a valid exercise of the police power.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 25, Health, §§ 24-26, 35; vol. 9, Cemeteries, §§ 1-3.]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by the Laurel Hill Cemetery against the city and county of San Francisco and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Lloyd & Wood and Haven & Haven, for appellant. William G. Burke and Percy V. Long, City Attys., John T. Williams, Asst. City Atty., John S. Partridge, William M. Sims, and Garret W. McEnerney, for respondents.

SLOSS, J. This action was brought to restrain the city and county of San Francisco and its officers from enforcing an ordinance prohibiting the interment of dead bodies within said city and county, and to obtain a decree declaring the ordinance void. The defendants answered and moved for judgment on the pleadings. Their motion was granted, and the plaintiff appeals from the judgment entered upon the order so made.

This court has already in Odd Fellows' Cemetery Association v. City and County of San Francisco, 140 Cal. 226, 73 Pac. 987, decided that the adoption of the ordinance in question was a valid exercise of the legislative power of the city and county. It is urged, however, by the appellant that the case here presented differs in some respects from that considered by the court in its former decisions. Furthermore, great reliance is placed upon two decisions—one of the Supreme Court of the United States, and the other of the United States Circuit Court for the Ninth Circuit of the Northern District of California—both rendered since the filing of the opinion in the Odd Fellows' Case, and both, it is claimed, inconsistent with the views there expressed by this court. The complaint in the case at bar is very voluminous, but its essential allegations do not, we think, differ materially from those set forth by the complainants in the earlier case. Briefly stated, it alleges the incorporation of plaintiff in 1867 as a cemetery association pursuant to the provisions of an act approved April 18, 1859, and entitled, "An act authorizing the incorporation of rural cemetery associations." St. 1859, p. 281, c. 267. It is averred that in 1853 one Nathaniel Gray, and others associated with him, were the owners of a tract of land then lying beyond the corporate limits of the city of San Francisco, containing about 160 acres, which said Gray and his associates determined to appropriate and devote to the purposes of a rural cemetery. They prepared the land for such purposes, clearing it of brush and laying out roads, and doing other work. On the 30th of May, 1854, said lands were publicly dedicated to the purposes aforesaid by the name of the Lone Mountain Cemetery; the dedication being made the occasion of a "solemn and impressive ceremony" in which the mayor of the city participated. The Lone Mountain Cemetery continued to be occupied by said association as a cemetery. In May, 1868, Gray and his associates conveyed to the plaintiff so much of the tract as had been appropriated for the purposes of a cemetery. The plaintiff entered into possession of the land, and has since continuously carried on and conducted there the business of a cemetery, under the name of Laurel Hill Cemetery. On June 23, 1871, the mayor of the city and county made a grant to plaintiff of said tract of land, in consideration of the sum of $24,139.79, paid by plaintiff to the treasurer of said city and county. Since the establishment of the cemetery and its dedication in the year 1854, plaintiff and its predecessors have sold and conveyed 40,000 lots or plots, a large proportion of which have been used for the purposes of burial, but many of them are capable of receiving a number of interments in addition to those already made therein. Over $2,000,000 have been expended by the owners of said lots and plots in preparing them for the burial of bodies and in the construction of monuments and tombs and the embellishment of their lots by landscape culture. The plaintiff association has also expended large sums of money in constructing roads, avenues, and paths through said cemetery, in constructing a system of waterworks, and erecting a lodge and walls. Of the area included in said cemetery the plaintiff has about seven acres unsold and ready for sale.

At the time of the establishment of the said cemetery, it was wholly outside the corporate limits of the then city of San Francisco, and was distant more than two miles in a direct line from the business part thereof, and at least one mile from the residence part thereof. No residence had then been built to the west of said cemetery, and the whole country between it and the Pacific Ocean was practically unoccupied. Plaintiff avers "that at no time since the establishment of said cemetery has it or any part thereof been, nor has it or any part thereof, become injurious to health, indecent, or offensive to the senses, or an obstruction to the free use of property so as to interfere with the comfortable enjoyment of life or property, or unlawfully obstruct the free passage or use in the customary manner of any public park, square, street, or highway; that the soil of said cemetery is sand, and the natural condition and character thereof is such that no dangerous or disease-breeding elements can be transmitted through the same from the decaying remains of bodies buried therein; that since the establishment of said cemetery many residences have been built in its neighborhood, and the same have been and are now occupied with families, and yet it has not been proven that the district embracing said cemetery and said residences was unhealthy and subject to epidemics, but, on the contrary, said district has always been, and is now regarded, as particularly healthy and free from the diseases which prevail in other parts of said city and county." There have never been any wells excavated in the neighborhood of said cemetery "for the purpose of supplying water to any residences of families residing therein, or for any consumption of human beings." It is further alleged that there are within the corporate limits of the city and county of San Francisco several large tracts of land, some of which consist of barren sand hills and are entirely unoccupied, and some of which are used solely for farming purposes; that some of said tracts of land contain several hundred acres, and interments of dead bodies could be made on several of said tracts of land, and within the corporate limits of the city and county of San Francisco, which would be more than a mile distant from any human inhabitant or public thoroughfare.

The ordinance complained of was passed on the 26th day of March, 1900, and provides that after the 1st day of August, 1901, it shall be unlawful for any person, association, or corporation to bury, or inter, or cause to be interred or buried, the dead body of any person in any cemetery, graveyard, or other place within the city and county of San Francisco, exclusive of those portions thereof which belong to the United States, or are within its exclusive jurisdiction. The violation of the ordinance is made a misdemeanor. This ordinance is assailed by plaintiff upon the grounds that it deprives plaintiff of its property without due process of law, and impairs the obligation of a contract; and that it is unreasonable, in that it prohibits acts which are in no way dangerous to life, or detrimental to the public health. It is also claimed that the city and county is estopped by its acts and conduct to assert or exercise the right of making it unlawful to continue to bury the dead bodies of persons in the cemetery of the plaintiff. The ordinance contains a recital that "the burial of the dead within the city and county of San Francisco is dangerous to life and detrimental to public health." It purports to be passed in pursuance of what is generally known as the "police power" of the state, and of that branch of the police power which has to do with the preservation and protection of the public health. Under the charter of the city and county, read in connection with the state Constitution (article 11, § 11), the supervisors have power to pass ordinances placing such restrictions upon the use of any property or the conduct of any business as may be necessary for the public health. Odd Fellows' Cemetery Association v. City and County, supra. Such ordinances must, of course, bear a rational relation to the object sought to be attained. They may not be arbitrary or unreasonable. The exercise of the police power cannot be made a mere cloak for the arbitrary interference with or suppression of a lawful business. Holden v. Hardy, 169 U. S. 366, 18 Sup. Ct. 383, 42 L. Ed. 780. In re Smith, 143 Cal. 368, 77 Pac. 180. "The Legislature may not, under the guise of protecting the public interests, arbitrarily interfere with private business, or impose unusual and unnecessary restrictions upon lawful occupations. In other words, its determination as to what is a proper exercise of its police powers is not final or conclusive, but is subject to the supervision of the courts." Lawton v. Steele, 152 U. S. 133, 14 Sup. Ct. 499, 38 L. Ed. 385. But, while the action of a legislative body in assuming to exercise the police power is always subject to review by the courts, the question of the expediency or necessity of a proposed restriction is primarily for the Legislature, and the courts will not interfere with the exercise of the legislative discretion unless it clearly appears that such discretion has been arbitrarily or unreasonably exercised. Ex parte Whitwell, 98 Cal. 73, 32 Pac. 870, 19 L. R. A. 727, 35 Am. St. Rep. 152; County of Plumas v. Wheeler, 149 Cal. 758, 87 Pac. 909.

There is ample authority defining the limits of the power of legislative bodies in restricting the right of interment of dead bodies. That the interment of such bodies in the midst of thickly populated districts is likely to prove a danger to the health of the surrounding population, and as such may properly be prohibited, seems to be settled by a number of well-considered cases, cited in the opinion in the Odd Fellows' Cemetery Case. People v. Pratt, 129 N. Y. 68, 29 N. E. 7; Presbyterian Church v. Mayor, 5 Cow. (N. Y.) 588; Coates v. Mayor, 7 Cow. (N. Y.) 585; Kincald's Appeal, 66 Pa. 411, 5 Am. Rep. 377; Sohler v. Trinity Church, 109 Mass. 1; City Council v. Wentworth St. Baptist Church, 4 Strob. (S. C.) 309; Humphrey v. Front St. Methodist Church, 109 N. C. 132, 13 S. E. 793. On the other hand, it is equally well settled that the interment of the bodies of the dead is proper, indeed necessary, and that the Legislature may not prohibit such interments in places where no possible danger to human life or health could result. Thus, it has been declared by this court that an ordinance prohibiting the establishment of a cemetery within the limits of the county of Los Angeles without the permission of the board of supervisors was unreasonable and void. Los Angeles v. Hollywood Cemetery Ass'n, 124 Cal. 344, 57 Pac. 153, 71 Am. St. Rep. 75. This went on the ground, as was pointed out in the Odd Fellows' Cemetery Case, that the county of Los Angeles "has within its limits many square miles of territory which are not only not thickly populated, but in which there are scarcely any inhabitants at all." In the Odd Fellows' Cemetery Case some of the justices intimated that the line of demarcation is that separating cities from counties; i. e., that interments may be prohibited in cities, but may not be prohibited in counties. This is perhaps too broad and general a statement of the rule. The right to prohibit interments in a given territory rests upon the conditions existing in that territory. Where a cemetery in which it is proposed to make interments is located in a thickly settled community, further interments there may be prohibited because the burial of dead bodies in close proximity to the habitations of the living has a tendency to endanger the health of large numbers of persons. Where, however, the place in which it is proposed to bury the dead is remote from human habitations, or is close to but few dwellings, the absolute prohibition of interments is an unreasonable restriction of a lawful business, not fairly justified or required for the preservation of the public health, and will not be sustained by the courts. Ordinarily, cities are thickly populated, whereas the portions of counties lying outside of cities are not. In view of this, it may be properly said as a general rule that interments in cities may be prohibited. It must be borne in mind, however, that the limits of many cities include large uninhabited areas; that oftentimes cities include extensive tracts of land which are not actually occupied by dwellings, and are not likely to be for many years to come. Where a city includes considerable tracts of this character, it will not be said that interments anywhere within the corporate limits may be prohibited merely because the territory involved is all included within the boundaries of a city. Thus, in Wygant v. McLauchlan, 39 Or. 429, 64 Pac. 867, 54 L. R. A. 636, 87 Am. St. Rep. 673, an ordinance, prohibiting burials within the city of Portland was held invalid; it appearing that there were within the city limits considerable tracts of land which were sparsely inhabited. This case is criticised to some extent by this court in Odd Fellows' Cemetery Association v. City and County; but whether or not it was rightly decided on the facts appearing we do not question the correctness of the principle that such circumstances may be shown as would make it unreasonable, even in a city, to absolutely prohibit burial anywhere within the city limits. In Lakeview v. Rose Hill Cemetery Company, 70 Ill. 191, 22 Am. Rep. 71, an ordinance prohibiting further interments in the town of Lakeview was, by a divided court, held unreasonable and invalid. It there appeared that the town of Lakeview contained 8,400 acres of land, and but 1,500 inhabitants, and that, as is stated in the opinion of the court, the lands of the company owning the cemetery "are well selected and are situated at a proper distance from the populous part of the city, in a sparsely settled community, there being but few dwellings in the immediate vicinity." This case, therefore, is no authority for the proposition that a municipality may not properly prohibit further interments in populous parts of its territory, or anywhere within the municipality, if all of it be, or may soon be, thickly settled. In the case at bar it is true that the complaint alleges that there are within the corporate limits of the city and county several large tracts of land, some of which contain several hundred acres, and that interment of dead bodies could be made on several of said tracts of land at points which would be more than a mile distant from any human inhabitant or public thoroughfare. If the ordinance did in effect prohibit the interment of dead bodies upon any such tracts of land, it may be that it would be to that extent unreasonable, or at least that this allegation would tender an issue which would require the trial court to take proof to determine whether or not under all the circumstances the ordinance was unreasonable. But at the time this ordinance was adopted, and for many years theretofore, the Penal Code of this state contained a provision (section 297) making it a misdemeanor to bury or inter, or cause to be buried, any human remains in any place within the corporate limits of any city or town in this state, or within the corporate limits of the city and county of San Francisco, "except in a cemetery or place of burial now existing under the laws of this state and in which interments have been made, or that is now or may hereafter be established or organized by the board of supervisors of the county or city and county in which such city or town or city and county is situate." By reason of the existence of this statute, it was already, at the time of the passage of the ordinance in question, a misdemeanor to inter any dead body in any place within the city and county of San Francisco outside of the existing cemeteries, or those to be authorized by the supervisors. There is no suggestion that the establishment of new cemeteries was contemplated. The ordinance, therefore, in effect merely prohibited the interment of bodies in existing cemeteries. It is not alleged that any such cemeteries did, in fact, exist upon any of the vacant tracts of land referred to in the complaint. Indeed, the only cemetery described by the plaintiff is its own, and that, as is shown by the allegations of the complaint itself, is situated in the midst of a thickly settled district. As is alleged, "many residences have been built in its neighborhood, and the same have been and are now occupied with families." As no presumptions are to be indulged in support of the pleading, it may be assumed that all the cemeteries existing in San Francisco at the date of the passage of the ordinance were similarly situated. The effect of the prohibition, therefore, was merely to prevent further interments in cemeteries situated within densely populated portions of the municipality. That such prohibition is a reasonable exercise of the police power vested in the board of supervisors clearly appears from the authorities above cited.

It is, however, claimed that the ordinance is unreasonable in its operation upon plaintiff's cemetery, considered by itself, and this contention is based upon the allegations of the complaint to the effect that the soil of the cemetery is of such character that no disease-breeding elements can be transmitted through the same, that the district in which it is has not been proven to be unhealthy or subject to epidemics, and that the cemetery does not possess the characteristics necessary to constitute it a nuisance within the definition of the Code. Civ. Code, § 3479. It is argued that no legislative body can by its mere assertion make that a nuisance which is not in fact a nuisance. This is undoubtedly true, but the ordinance in question does not proceed upon the basis that further interments are to be prohibited because the cemeteries in which such interments are sought to be made are in fact nuisances under the general law. The police power granted by the Constitution is not restricted to the suppression of nuisances. It includes the regulation of the conduct of business, or the use of property, to the end that the public health or morals may not be impaired or endangered. As was said by this court in the Odd Fellows' Cemetery Case, at page 231 of 140 Cal., page 988 of 73 Pac.: "Whenever a thing or act is of such a nature that it may become a nuisance, or may be injurious to the public health if not suppressed or regulated, the legislative body may, in the exercise of its police powers, make and enforce ordinances to regulate or prohibit such act or thing, although it may never have been offensive or injurious in the past." "The exercise of this power is not limited to the regulation of such things as have already become nuisances or have been declared to be such by the judgment of a court." Id. The question is whether in the exercise of a reasonable discretion the board may conclude that the thing prohibited is dangerous to the public health. The views already expressed make it clear that this decision may properly be reached with regard to the interment of dead bodies in thickly settled communities. Whether the danger to be apprehended from such interment is to be best averted by a prohibition of further burials is a question of policy to be decided by the legislative body. The court is not to substitute its judgment for that of the board of supervisors. Any evidence that might be introduced tending to show that, as a matter of fact, a particular cemetery had not proven or might not prove detrimental to the public health, would not alter the fact, of which courts take judicial notice, that cemeteries situated as this one is are likely to cause such injury, and are therefore, as to further use, within the control of the legislative authority.

Much stress is laid by the appellant upon the facts that a grant of this land was made to it by the city and county of San Francisco for the purposes of a cemetery, and that the establishment and existence of the cemetery were known for many years to the city and county and acquiesced in by it. From these facts it is argued that the city is estopped to now prevent the further use of the premises for the purposes of interment of the dead. There is no force in this position. Even if the city and county had made an express contract granting to the plaintiff the right to make interments in this ground in perpetuity, such contract would have no force as against a future exercise by the legislative branch of the government of its police power. Brick Presbyterian Church v. Mayor, supra. This power cannot be bargained or contracted away, and all rights and property are held subject to it. Boston Beer Co. v. Mass., 97 U. S. 25, 24 L. Ed. 989; Butchers' Union v. Crescent City Co., 111 U. S. 746, 4 Sup. Ct. 652, 28 L. Ed. 589; New Orleans Gas Co. v. Louisiana Light, etc., Co., 115 U. S. 650, 6 Sup. Ct. 252, 29 L. Ed. 516. The alleged estoppel relied on can have no greater force than would a contract such as the one supposed. But, in fact, there is nothing upon which to base the claim of estoppel. As appears from the complaint, this cemetery, at the time of its establishment, was outside the limits of the city of San Francisco, in a then unsettled district, more than a mile distant from the nearest residence section. If, as is claimed, the city acquiesced in the establishment of this cemetery and in the expenditure of large sums of money in its improvement, such acquiescence was based upon the conditions as they then existed. Since that time the city (or its successor, the city and county) has grown until it has surrounded the cemetery in question. This change of conditions altered what was before a harmless and beneficial enterprise into one fraught with danger to the community. There is no ground for the claim that, because the city in 1854 considered the location in question a proper one for a cemetery, it was bound to continue to so regard it half a century later, when the situation of the cemetery with relation to the city had entirely changed.

Apart from this claim of estoppel, the case does not differ materially from that made by the plaintiffs in the Odd Fellows' Cemetery Case. The decision in that case, apart from what we have here said, sufficiently answers the contention of appellant that its incorporation under the act of 1859, and its purchase of the land in question, constituted a contract, which is violated by the ordinance in question. Indeed, on all the questions raised in the earlier case, we should have rested our rulings upon a mere reference to the former decision, but for the fact that the plaintiff, as has been said, relies upon two decisions of federal courts as being in conflict with our views. In Hume v. Laurel Hill Cemetery (C. C.) 142 Fed. 552, the United States Circuit Court for the Northern District of California did hold upon a complaint not essentially different from that here presented, that the ordinance in question was void. While we have the highest respect for the opinion of the learned judge who rendered this decision, we cannot, for the reasons above stated, concur in it. It is claimed, further, that the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Dobbins v. Los Angeles, 195 U. S. 223, 25 Sup. Ct. 18, 49 L. Ed. 169, compels the conclusion that the ordinance in question is void, as depriving the plaintiff of property without due process of law. In any case, we should feel strongly inclined to follow the decision of this high tribunal, and, in a case involving a claim of right under the Constitution of the United States, we should, if that decision had been rendered in a parallel case, be bound to follow it. But we think the Dobbins Case is very different from the one before us. There the city council of Los Angeles had in August, 1901, adopted an ordinance making it unlawful to erect and maintain gas works outside of a certain district. In September the plaintiff purchased lands and made a contract for the erection of gas works upon territory which was not within the prohibited zone. After the work had been commenced, the city council on November 25, 1901, passed a second ordinance so changing the boundaries of the territory within which the erection of gas works was permitted as to include the plaintiff's land within the prohibited territory. It was alleged that the second ordinance was adopted at the instigation of a corporation which was engaged in manufacturing gas and for the purpose of preserving a monopoly by said corporation, and that the territory which was added to the prohibited territory by the second ordinance was devoted almost exclusively to manufacturing enterprises. It was held that the ordinance was void upon the ground that the facts as to the situation and conditions were such as to establish the exercise of the police power in such manner as to comprise a discrimination against the plaintiff, the court saying: "We think the allegations of the bill disclose such character of territory, such sudden and unexplained change of its limits after the plaintiff in error had purchased the property and gone forward with the erection of the works, as to bring it within that class of cases wherein the court may restrain the arbitrary and discriminatory exercise of the police power, which amounts to the taking of property without due process of law, and an impairment of property rights protected by the fourteenth amendment of the federal Constitution." It appeared there that within four months after the city council had fixed the limits within which the business of manufacturing gas could be conducted, and after the plaintiff had, in reliance upon this action, purchased land within the permitted limits and gone to expense in preparing to manufacture gas, the council had, without any apparent change of conditions requiring such action, altered the limits so as to make unlawful that which but shortly before they had, in effect, declared to be lawful. This the court characterized as a "sudden and unexplained change of limits," indicating an intent to discriminate against the plaintiff, and, following its settled rule, it held that the police power could not be made a pretext for such discrimination. But these considerations do not apply to the case at bar. Here there was no change that was either sudden or unexplained. By the ordinance itself a period of almost 18 months was given to those affected by it to prepare for the change. The ordinance, passed in March, 1900, was not to be effective until August, 1901. Furthermore, ample cause for the change was shown. The land affected by it was, when originally dedicated as a cemetery, one mile from any habitation. At the time the ordinance was adopted it had become the center of a thickly populated residence district. These circumstances, which appear from the complaint itself, afford at once the justification for the exercise of the police power, and the refutation of the claim that the exercise of that power was a mere pretense for the spoliation of private rights. On the facts alleged it cannot be claimed that there was no reasonable justification for the action of the board, and there is no claim that the ordinance was passed for the purpose of discriminating against the plaintiff by imposing upon it any onerous burdens which were not imposed upon others similarly situated. We think the appellant has shown no reason why the ordinance in question was not a valid exercise of the legislative power of the city and county.

The judgment is affirmed.

BECHTEL v. WIER. (L. A. 1841.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 2, 1907.
Rehearing Denied Dec. 30, 1907.)

1. MORTGAGES — FORECLOSURE — VOIDABLE SALES—COLLATERAL ATTACK.

A voidable sale under a mortgage foreclosure decree cannot be overthrown in a collateral proceeding brought after the expiration of five years from the sale.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 35, Mortgages, §§ 1470, 1541.]

2. SAME—MODE OF SALE.

A sale under execution or foreclosure decree is void only if conducted in a manner prohibited by statute, or in a manner which would not have been in the power of the court in the first instance to authorize.

3. JUDICIAL SALES—VALIDITY—IRREGULARITY—VACATING.

Whether a motion to vacate a sale in execution of a judgment on account of irregularity of the officer making the sale should be granted rests in the discretion of the court; and it is immaterial whether the irregularity consists in disregarding the provisions of the statute or in failing to observe the directions in the judgment.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 31, Judicial Sales, § 72.]

4. SAME—CONFIRMATION—EFFECT.

To invoke the rule that a departure from the directions in a decree directing a sale renders the sale void, the departure must be of a material character; and, where an officer in making a sale departs from the directions of the decree, the court may, by confirming the sale, ratify it, provided the terms so ratified are within the power of the court to impose in the first instance.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 31, Judicial Sales, § 66.]

5. EQUITY—JURISDICTION—DECREES.

The powers of equity dealing with subject-matters within its jurisdiction are not confined by the rules of law, but a wide play is left to the chancellor in formulating decrees so as to be capable of dealing with the conditions presented.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 19, Equity, §§ 986-992.]

6. MORTGAGES — FORECLOSURE — SALES — VALIDITY.

A mortgage of one parcel given by a debtor to secure a debt, and a mortgage of another parcel given by a third person as additional security for the payment of the same debt, were foreclosed by a decree directing a sale of the debtor's parcel first and the sale of the third person's parcel in case of a deficiency. The officer, on being unable to sell the parcels separately, sold them en masse. Held, that the sale was at most only voidable on account of the irregularity, and was good until set aside by a direct proceeding, and could not be collaterally attacked.

7. EXECUTION—SALES—VALIDITY.

A sale en masse under an execution of distinct parcels directed to be sold separately establishes only an irregularity, and is not void, but voidable on a proper application of the judgment debtor.

8. MORTGAGES—FORECLOSURE—SALES.

Where separate parcels are offered for sale separately at a foreclosure sale, and no bid is made, the property may be sold in one parcel.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 35, Mortgages, § 1515.]

9. SAME.

Where a mortgage of one parcel given by a debtor to secure a debt, and a mortgage of another tract given by a third person as additional security for the payment of the same debt, were foreclosed by a decree directing the sale of the debtor's parcel first, and the third person's parcel in case of a deficiency, a sale of both parcels as one tract, after a failure to sell the parcels separately, was valid as against the objection that the sale imposed on the third person the whole burden of the debt, and as against the objection that a sale of the debtor's property must be made before recourse could be had to the third person's property.

10. SUBROGATION—PAYMENT BY SURETY—EFFECT.

Under Civ. Code, § 2848, and Code Civ. Proc. § 709, authorizing a surety satisfying the obligation of the principal to enforce the remedies of the creditor against the principal, etc., a mortgagor in a mortgage given to secure a debt due from a third person is, on a sale of the premises under foreclosure, entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the creditor.

Beatty, C. J., dissenting.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; N. P. Conrey, Judge. Action by L. D. Bechtel against L. Wier. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Herbert Cutler Brown, George H. Moore and E. W. Freeman, for appellant. L. D. Bechtel and Dunnigan & Dunnigan, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff Bechtel and one Lena B. Mattern each gave a mortgage to secure the debt of the latter. The mortgages were on separate pieces of property. Bechtel's mortgage was given as additional security for the Mattern debt. The mortgage declared that it was given "as security for the payment of one promissory note according to its terms," and declared, further, that, if she shall fail to pay or cause to be paid any part of the debt secured when due, the whole debt secured shall, at the option of the mortgagee or assigns, become due and collectible. A foreclosure was had of these mortgages. The decree and order of sale directed that the parcel of land mortgaged by Lena Mattern be first sold at public auction; that, if the moneys arising from the sale of this property was not sufficient to satisfy the judgment, then, for any deficiency remaining, the parcel mortgaged by Bechtel be sold. The sheriff sold the property, and issued to the purchaser his certificate of sale in due form. His return shows that he first offered the parcel mortgaged by Mattern for sale, and received therefor no bid. He then offered the Bechtel property for sale, and received therefor no bid. Thereupon he offered both parcels for sale in one lot, and effected a sale for an amount sufficient to satisfy the judgment. After the sale, which was on April 25, 1901, Bechtel leased his land so sold to the defendant in this action at the monthly rental of $20. Subsequently, upon defendant's refusal to pay rent, plaintiff brought his action in a justice's court for unlawful detainer. The answer pleaded by way of defense the sale of the land, and alleged that the defendant had paid the rent sued for to the purchaser, a fact uncontradicted. Defendant recovered judgment in the justice's court, plaintiff appealed to the superior court, and there recovered judgment, from which this appeal is taken. In the superior court the certificate of sale offered by defendant was excluded upon the ground that the sale itself was void because made contrary to the directions of the decree. Upon the other legal questions involved the attorneys for plaintiff and defendant are in accord. The single proposition to be determined in the case is whether or not the sale was in fact void. If voidable merely, then, owing to the great lapse of time—some five years—and to the fact that this is but a collateral attack and not a direct proceeding to vacate the sale, it could not be overthrown in this action for irregularity. Respondent's position may be thus stated: The terms of the decree ordering sale are controlling. By those terms the Mattern property was to be first sold, and the Bechtel property was to be sold only in the event of and to make good any deficiency which might exist after the sale of the Mattern property; that the right to sell the Bechtel property existed and arose only after the sale of the Mattern property, and the sale of the two parcels in gross was a violation of the terms of the decree and therefore void.

1. Coming to the consideration of this proposition, it is to be remembered that a sale under execution or under foreclosure decree is void only if conducted in a manner prohibited by statute, or in a manner which would not have been in the power of the court in the first instance to have authorized. And in this regard it matters not whether the departure was from the statutory mode or from the directions of the decree. Thus it is said by this court in Humboldt Society v. March, 136 Cal. 321, 68 Pac. 968: "Whether a motion to vacate a sale of property, made in execution of a judgment on account of some irregularity on the part of the officer making the sale, should be granted rests very largely in the discretion of the court before which the motion is made; and it is immaterial whether such irregularity consists in disregarding the provisions of the statute for making the sale, or in failing to observe and follow some express direction in the judgment. A party to an action cannot claim an absolute right to have such sale vacated, unless he shall show that he has sustained some injury by reason of the irregularity." And, says Freeman on Void Judicial Sales, § 21: "It is sometimes said that a sale under a decree must pursue the direction therein contained, that a departure from these directions renders the sale void. But to invoke this rule the departure must be of a very material character. * * * In truth, the court is not absolutely bound by the terms of its order or decree respecting the mode of the sale. * * * If the court had the power to direct the terms of the sale in the first instance, it may change them afterwards, and, if an officer or any other agent of the law, or of the court in making a sale, departs from the directions of the decree, the court may nevertheless, by confirming the sale, ratify his action, provided always that the terms so ratified are such as the court had power to impose in the first instance." Farmers' L. Co. v. Oregon P. R. R. Co., 28 Or. 44, 40 Pac. 1089; Emery v. Vroman, 19 Wis. 689, 88 Am. Dec. 726.

The question which thus arises is: Could the court in its direction for sale have provided for the sale as here actually conducted en masse to meet the contingency which actually arose, namely, that no bid was obtained for either of the parcels when separately offered? We entertain no doubt that it could. The powers of a court of equity, dealing with the subject-matters within its jurisdiction, are not cribbed or confined by the rigid rules of law. From the very nature of equity a wide play is left to the conscience of the chancellor in formulating his decrees, that justice may be effectually carried out. It is of the very essence of equity that its powers should be so broad as to be capable of dealing with novel conditions. S. P. Co. v. Robinson, 132 Cal. 408, 64 Pac. 572. The mortgage contract of the surety in this instance was the agreement that his property should be subject to the payment of the whole debt due from Mattern. His principal right was that the Mattern property should first be exhausted toward the payment of that debt before recourse was had against his property. But his obligation was none the less the payment of the whole debt. If, for any reason, the security of the principal debtor had failed utterly, no doubt can be entertained but that all of Bechtel's property could have been subjected to sale for the payment of all of the Mattern debt. No doubt, therefore, can be entertained but that it would have been within the power of the court, if it had anticipated a failure to derive any money from the sale of the Mattern property, if, in other words, it had become valueless as security, or if, as here, after fully preserving the rights of the surety by ordering first a sale of the principal debtor's property, the court had further decreed that, in case of failure to effectuate the sale, both pieces of property might be offered and sold in gross. And, in the absence of fraud or unfair advantage taken (and it is to be noted that there is no attack upon the sale for any such reason), it would be assumed, from the fact that the sheriff was unable to sell the parcels of land separately and could only sell them as a whole, that the lands were more valuable taken together than separately. Hibernia S. & L. Society v. Behnke, 121 Cal. 339, 53 Pac. 812. Thus we find that it has been consistently held in this state since Nagle v. Macy, 9 Cal. 426, that a sale irregularly made is not void, but voidable merely, and is good until regularly set aside. The title of a purchaser at such sale cannot be impeached in a collateral action for any such irregularity. Moreover, it is held that a sale en masse, instead of by separate parcels, even if not authorized, establishes only an irregularity and not a lack of power, and is not void. Thus in Vigorous v. Murphy, 54 Cal. 346, it is said: "There is no doubt that a sale en masse under a writ of execution of several known and distinct parcels, at a price greatly below the actual value of the property, cannot be sustained against the objection of the judgment debtor. Such sales are not void, but are voidable, and will be set aside upon a proper application of the judgment debtor when made in a reasonable time after such sale, where there is no ground in reason for belief that it was less beneficial to the judgment creditor or debtor than it would have been had the sale been made of the separate parcels"—citing San Francisco v. Pixley, 21 Cal. 57; Page v. Randall, 6 Cal. 32. And in Hudepohl v. Liberty Hill, etc., Co., 94 Cal. 588, 29 Pac. 1025, 28 Am. St. Rep. 149, an appeal from a proceeding instituted to set aside an execution of sale of several distinct lots of land because they were sold in gross, this court said: "It is not sufficient to allege merely that several separate tracts were sold in a lump by the sheriff. Riddell v. Harrell, 71 Cal. 262, 12 Pac. 67. Such cases are voidable, not void; and one who seeks to have a sale en masse set aside should show that none of the conditions which would authorize the sale of all the parcels together existed at the time of the sale." And Freeman on Executions, § 1711, says: "The decided preponderance of the authorities on this subject shows that a third person cannot object to a sale en masse; and that, when the person entitled to complain does not do so by some appropriate proceedings, the sale is impregnable to any collateral assault, and must be treated as valid."

2. We have so far considered the question of the sale to the extent of determining that, at the worst, it was not void, but voidable merely, and that respondent's remedy was by direct proceedings within a reasonable time to vacate the sale, proceedings which were never taken. But equally demonstrable is the proposition that, in the absence of fraud and injury shown, the sale en masse of the two parcels of land, under the circumstances indicated by the sheriff's return, was not even irregular, but was a perfectly valid exercise of power. Marston v. White, 91 Cal. 40, 27 Pac. 588, quotes Freeman on Executions to the following effect: "The rule applicable to such cases is stated, and we think correctly, in Freeman on Executions, § 296, as follows: 'The rule that distinct parcels should be separately sold is not generally enforced to the extent of denying the right to sell when the sale can be made in no other way. Hence the officer, after offering the parcels separately and in various combinations, without receiving any bids, may then offer and sell them en masse.' * * * Here the lots were offered separately, as directed by the appellant, and the only ground urged for setting aside the sale was that they were sold together. This, as we have seen, was not a valid ground. * * *" So, also, in Connick v. Hill, 127 Cal. 164, 59 Pac. 832, it is said: "It is now the settled rule in this state that whenever separate known parcels of land are offered for sale separately in foreclosure proceedings, and no offer or bid made for either parcel, then the property may be offered and sold in one parcel. Marston v. White, 91 Cal. 40, 27 Pac. 588; Hibernia, etc., Society v. Behnke, 121 Cal. 341, 53 Pac. 812. The same rule is laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States. White v. Crow, 110 U. S. 190, 4 Sup. Ct. 71, 28 L. Ed. 113. The rule is to consider every sale made by an officer of court under the mandate thereof as final. Hopkins v. Wiard, 72 Cal. 262, 13 Pac. 687." See, also, Anglo-California Bank v. Cerf, 142 Cal. 304, 75 Pac. 902. Nor can it matter, as argued by respondent, that the effect of such sale is to impose the whole burden of the debt upon his land, and at the same time to force him in redeeming to redeem also the land of the principal debtor.

By his contract he imposed the burden of the whole debt upon his land, if, for any reason, the security of the principal debtor should fail. He is entitled to be subrogated to all the rights and remedies of the judgment creditor, and this is all he may justly ask. Civ. Code, § 2848; Code Civ. Proc. § 709. Respondent's contention that the direction was for a sale of the principal debtor's property before recourse could be had to the property of the surety, and that nothing can fill the measure of this requirement but an actual sale, presents altogether too narrow a view of the matter, and one not at all agreeable to equity. In this view, if an actual sale of the property of the principal debtor is a prerequisite to the subjection of the surety's property to the payment of the debt, it would amount to a confiscation of the creditor's security to the extent of his lien against the surety's property, in case an actual sale of the property of the principal debtor could not be effected. The reasonable and equitable view of the matter we take to be that adopted and expounded by the Supreme Court of Iowa. According to the statutes of that state concerning the homestead of the judgment debtor, it is provided that such homestead should not be sold except to supply the deficiency remaining after exhausting other property of the debtor also liable to execution. In Burmester v. Dewey, 27 Iowa, 468, there had been a foreclosure upon real property, including the homestead of the judgment debtor. At the execution sale the property was offered in two parcels so as to exclude the homestead, and no bid was received therefor. Thereupon it was offered in gross, including the homestead, and sold. It was there argued, as here, that the law required a sale of the other property, and permitted a sale of the homestead only to supply a deficiency. The court said: "But was the other property named in the writ exhausted? I say it was when it was all offered in the smallest legal subdivisions, and not sold for want of bidders. If, after being thus offered, the other 200 acres had been offered in a body and not sold, and the 240 had been offered and sold, it would to my mind be the merest talk to say that the other property was not exhausted, and therefore the homestead could not be sold; that an offer of the other property, without selling it, is not exhausting it within the meaning of the law. The power to sell, the duty to sell, would, in my judgment, beyond doubt arise after the offer of the 200 in gross, whether sold or not. If this is not so, then the sheriff might be required to perform, in some instances, an impossibility before the homestead could be sold."

With this view we are in full accord, and upon both of the grounds above mentioned the judgment must be reversed and the cause remanded.

We concur: ANGELLOTTI, J.; LORIGAN, J.; McFARLAND, J.

I dissent: BEATTY, C. J.

SHAW, J. I concur in the judgment upon the grounds stated in part 1 of the foregoing opinion. As to the second ground, it appears that the appellant was a surety only, and the provision of the decree requiring a separate sale was for his benefit. I am not prepared to say that he should not have the irregular sale set aside in a direct proceeding for that purpose.

GLENN et al. v. BECHTEL. (L. A. 1,853.) (Supreme Court of California. Dec. 2, 1907. Rehearing Denied Dec. 30, 1907.)

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; N. P. Conrey, Judge.

Action by L. W. Glenn and others against L. D. Bechtel. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Herbert Cutler Brown, George H. Moore, and E. W. Freeman, for appellant. L. D. Bechtel and Dunnigan & Dunnigan, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This was an action to quiet title brought by the grantee of the purchaser at foreclosure sale of the property of the defendant Bechtel. The defense was that the sale was void. Judgment passed for plaintiff. The sale being the same sale as that considered in Bechtel v. Wier (L. A. 1,841, this day decided) 93 Pac. 75, and the validity of the sale there having been upheld, the judgment in this case is affirmed.

Where decedent "granted, bargained, sold, and conveyed" land to her daughters, all her legal and equitable interest therein, together with all that was appurtenant or incident to it or beneficial for its enjoyment passed; and her estate has no interest authorizing her administratrix to sue to set aside deeds to water rights and riparian rights appurtenant to the land made by decedent to defendants before the conveyances to her daughters and to quiet title to such rights, on the ground of fraud in procuring the deeds.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 48, Waters and Water Courses, §§ 167-172.]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Cruz County; Lucas F. Smith, Judge.

Action by Ellen Rianda, administratrix, against the Watsonville Water & Light Company and others. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Reversed and dismissal of action directed.

Wyckoff & Gardner and Charles A. Shurtleff, for appellants. Geo. P. Burke and Dickerman & Torchiana, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. This appeal is prosecuted by the defendants from a judgment in favor of plaintiff and from an order denying their motion for a new trial. The action was brought to quiet title to certain riparian and other water rights in Santa Cruz county, and to set aside two certain deeds made by plaintiff in this action to the defendants Smith and Montague on the ground of fraud in their procurement.

Referring generally to the pleadings, it is alleged in the complaint that Carmen A. de McKinlay died on October 6, 1901, and that plaintiff was duly appointed and qualified as administratrix of her estate; that on September 27, 1884, said Carmen A. de McKinlay was the owner in fee simple of a tract of land in Santa Cruz county, being lot 1 of the Rancho Los Corralitos, containing 855 acres, which land embraced part of a certain lake known as "Pinto Lake," and part of a certain creek known as "Corralitos creek," in the waters of both of which she had riparian rights appurtenant to her said land; that on said September 27, 1884, and on June 27, 1885, said Carmen A. de McKinlay made and executed in favor of said Smith and Montague deeds in which she granted to them "all and singular the water and riparian rights and privileges of every kind and description which belong or in any manner pertain to" the land described in the complaint, together with a right to have, take, and use the flow of the waters of "Corralitos" creek, and to enter and lay down pipes or flumes on the lands of the grantor "for the convenient use and management and appropriation of said water, water rights, and riparian rights as aforesaid," with a covenant on the part of the grantees as to a given quantity of water from said Corralitos creek which the grantor was entitled to take for usual household, culinary, and domestic purposes, including the watering of stock on her premises, from any pipe or flume laid by said grantees, and which, on her demand, they would supply her from any point on the pipe or flume line she might designate.

It was further alleged that, when Mrs. McKinlay executed said deeds, she did not understand English, and had no independent advice relative to the transactions evidenced by them; that, when the grantees presented said deeds for execution, the portion thereof purporting to convey water, water rights, and riparian rights was not read or explained to her; that, on the contrary, said grantees informed her that the deeds effected simply the transfer by her of a right to enter her lands for the purpose of laying pipes and flumes to take water from the Corralitos creek; that she did not know that said deeds contained anything purporting to convey water, water rights, and riparian rights other than pertained to the waters of said Corralitos creek; that she did not know that she had conveyed her water rights and riparian rights in either of said deeds, and did not discover the contents of them, or the legal effect of said deeds until December, 1900, when she immediately took steps to institute suit to set said deeds aside, but before she was able to do so died.

In another count it is alleged that there was no consideration for the deeds; that the covenant therein by the grantees to furnish her water from the pipes or flumes had never been fulfilled; and that, when the covenant in that regard was made by them in said deed, it was made without any intention on the part of either of them of performing it.

The last count set up a claim of adverse possession to all said water and water rights by Mrs. McKinlay from the date of said deeds to the time of her death. It appears from the deeds, which are attached to the complaint, that the one executed by Mrs. McKinlay September 27, 1884, was recorded January 4, 1901, and the one executed June 27, 1885, was recorded on July 10, 1885. An inspection of the deeds shows that the only difference in their contents is that the last deed specifies the size of the service pipe through which Mrs. McKinlay might take water from the pipe or flume of the grantees, with the provision that she should furnish the pipe for that purpose.

It is further alleged that Smith and Montague in 1897 conveyed to the defendant, the Watsonville Water & Light Company, all the riparian rights and privileges acquired by them under said deeds, but with notice that, when Mrs. McKinlay executed them, she did not know there was anything in them purporting to carry any water or water rights whatever. The prayer was for a decree adjudging that the estate of said Carmen A. de McKinlay, deceased, is the owner of all the water, water rights, and riparian rights and privileges of every kind belonging or pertaining to the land described in the complaint.

A demurrer, general and special, to the complaint having been overruled, the defendants jointly answered, denying all the allegations of the complaint, except the execution of the deeds sought to be set aside and set up as a further and separate defense, that on August 6, 1901, the said Carmen A. de McKinlay, by deed of gift, granted and conveyed a portion of the property described in the complaint to her daughter Flora McKinlay Duckworth, and on the same date, by similar deed, conveyed to her daughter Ellen McKinlay Rlandi another portion of said property, reserving, however, to herself in the whole of said land so separately conveyed a life estate. The said two conveyances to said daughters comprised and embraced all the property described in the complaint. It was then averred that said Carmen A. de McKinlay subsequent to said conveyances to her daughters, and on October 6, 1901, died, and that after that date neither she nor her estate, nor the administratrix thereof, had or possessed any right, title, or interest in and to the land described in the complaint, or in any of the hereditaments or appurtenances thereunto appertaining or belonging; that said estate has no interest in the subject-matter of the action, and is not the real party in interest. Both deeds from Mrs. McKinlay to her daughters were set forth at length as exhibits to the answer and made a part thereof.

We have stated the contents of the pleadings in this general way as sufficiently presenting the point upon which this appeal is to be determined.

While many grounds are urged by appellants for a reversal of the judgment and the order denying a new trial—that the court erred in overruling the demurrer to the complaint, insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings and errors alleged to have been committed in the admission of evidence and in other respects—the view we take upon another point presented by appellants makes it unnecessary to enter into a consideration of these matters at all. This point is addressed to the right of the plaintiff as administratrix of the estate of Carmen A. de McKinlay, deceased, to maintain this action. In that regard it is urged by appellants that, as it is admitted by the pleadings that Mrs. McKinlay had before her death conveyed by deeds of grant all the property described in the complaint to her two daughters, such conveyances carried with them as the legal effect thereof all interest, legal or equitable, she had in the property, including all water or riparian rights pertaining or appurtenant to said lands; and hence the estate of Mrs. McKinlay had no interest whatever in the lands described or in the water or riparian rights appurtenant or incident thereto. In considering this point, it will be observed that in the answer of defendants, to which we have called attention, the conveyances to her daughters by Mrs. McKinlay of the land described are set forth in full and made part of that pleading. There was no affidavit filed by plaintiff denying their genuineness and due execution, and hence under section 448 of the Code of Civil Procedure these matters were deemed admitted. This being so, the question then is squarely presented as to the effect of such conveyances upon the right of the representative of the estate of Mrs. McKinlay, or her estate, to maintain the action. We think that in view of such conveyances no such right exists. The terms of conveyance used in the deeds to the daughters are "grant, bargain, sell, and convey," which are of sufficient recognized legal effect to carry all legal or equitable interests she may have had in the land, together with all that was appurtenant or incident to it or beneficial for its enjoyment, and the effect of their use in the conveyances of the land in question was to divest the grantor, Mrs. McKinlay, of any interest whatever she possessed or might have in and to the water rights or riparian rights appurtenant thereto.

Counsel for respondent seem to take the position that, because Mrs. McKinlay had prior to her conveyances to her daughters conveyed these riparian rights to Smith and Montague, therefore they were severed from the lands to which they were appurtenant, and did not pass under the conveyances to her daughters of such lands. There is certainly no reservation as to such rights in the deeds to her daughters, nor anything pretending to accomplish it, and the deeds themselves stand unassailed. As to a severance of the riparian rights in the lands to which they were appurtenant, the very theory of this case is that nothing of the kind was ever accomplished. If the allegations of the complaint were true that the purported conveyances of the water and water rights by Mrs. McKinlay to Smith and Montague were obtained by fraud—the Watsonville Light & Water Company taking with notice thereof—then at least as between these parties Mrs. McKinlay had never parted with her title to them. There then never was a severance effected in either law or equity as against Mrs. McKinlay, and under the deeds to her daughters by virtue of the comprehensive language of conveyance used in them all her interest, of whatever character, passed with the conveyances of the lands to which they were appurtenant. Either these riparian rights were appurtenant to the land conveyed to the daughters at the time the conveyances to them were made or they were not. If they were not, it was because they had previously been severed by a valid conveyance of them to Smith and Montague, and hence, therefore, neither Mrs. McKinlay during her lifetime, or her estate at her death, had any interest in them. If, on the other hand, the conveyances to Smith and Montague were void, then in legal contemplation these rights as between Mrs. McKinlay and her daughters as grantees had never been severed from the lands, and passed under the conveyances of it from her to them, the granting clause of which we have seen was ample to convey them. In neither view could Mrs. McKinlay or her estate have any claim to such riparian rights subsequent to the last deeds—those to her daughters. Let us concede, for the purpose of illustration, that the deeds to Smith and Montague were void, and that prior to making the conveyances to her daughters Mrs. McKinlay had successfully maintained an action against the defendants here, and had succeeded in having the deeds to the defendants set aside for fraud. The effect of such successful effort would not be to re-vest in Mrs. McKinlay the riparian rights purporting to have been conveyed to Smith and Montague as severed and distinct from the lands to which they had been riparian when such conveyances were made. The legal effect would be to declare that such rights had not been severed as appurtenant to the lands if an invalid attempt had been made to sever them, and it could not for a moment be contended that the subsequent deeds to her daughters, such as she made of the lands described in the complaint, did not carry such water rights and riparian rights as appurtenant to them. The same result would follow if the conveyances to the defendants were nullified in the present action of the administratrix. If the attempted severance by the conveyance to Smith and Montague of such riparian rights from the lands to which they were appurtenant should now be declared void, the legal effect would be to restore or attach them as appurtenant to the lands conveyed to the daughters. And, even if as claimed, in one of the counts of the complaint, Mrs. McKinlay had acquired title by adverse possession to these riparian rights subsequent to the deeds to Smith and Montague, unquestionably whatever right she so acquired passed under her deed to her daughters. In fact, as far as any interest which she had in said water or riparian rights is concerned, the comprehensive terms of the conveyances to her daughters of the lands to which they were appurtenant carried them, and she and her estate would be estopped from asserting that they did not. The estate could not in any view have any interest in them.

Little authority is cited on either side as to the effect of the conveyances to the daughters of the riparian rights involved here. The appellants insist, and we think correctly, that the rule is so clear that they did pass under them; and hence that the estate of the grantor thereof had no interest in them, as to make such citations unnecessary. Counsel for respondent rely on the cases of Kimball v. Gearhart, 12 Cal. 28, and Collins v. O'Laverty, 136 Cal. 31, 68 Pac. 327, as sustaining their position. But the cases cited lend no support to their claim. The Kimball Case simply declares that, while a deed carried the property and future use of water, it did not retroact to carry a right of damages for the past illegal use of it. This case does not support in any particular the position of respondent. The Collins Case was an action by the administrator of the estate of Collins to set aside two conveyances of land made by his intestate a few days before his death. The result of such an action, if successful, would have been to vest the property in the estate of Collins. There is no analogy between the Collins Case and the one at bar. If, after making the alleged void deed, Collins had conveyed the property to third parties, the case would be analogous to the one under consideration. The fact that Mrs. McKinlay did, and Collins did not, make such a subsequent conveyance differentiates the two cases. In the Collins Case the property involved in the fraudulent deed, if such deed were set aside, would inure to the estate of Collins. In the present case, if the claim of plaintiff's intestate was sustained, and the deeds to Smith and Montague set aside, the estate of Mrs. McKinlay would not get the property involved—the riparian rights—because the title and right asserted thereto had passed from decedent in her lifetime by the conveyances to her daughters of the lands to which they were appurtenant. In the Collins Case this court said: "The sole test of the administrator's right of action is the right of the estate to the property." When we apply this test to the matter under review, it is evident that the plaintiff cannot recover because the administratrix has no right to the property involved in the action and the estate no interest in it. No further elaboration of the proposition is necessary.

Therefore, in the view we take, the judgment and order must be and is, reversed, and, as the plaintiff has no interest in the subject-matter of the action and is without right to maintain it, the lower court is directed to dismiss it.

HOUGHTON et al. v. LOMA PRIETA LUMBER CO. (S. F. 3,837, 3,920.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 6, 1907.)

1. APPEAL—VERDICT—CONCLUSIVENESS.

A verdict on conflicting evidence contrary to strong evidence, but not wholly unwarranted by the evidence, will not be disturbed on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 3935-3937.]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT—WORK OF INDEPENDENT CONTRACTOR—NATURAL CONSEQUENCES OF WORK—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where, in an action for injuries from blasting while constructing a road, the evidence showed that the road was being constructed through an uninhabited and practically untraveled region, instructions authorizing the jury to apply the doctrine that, though the work was being done for defendant by an independent contractor, yet defendant was liable if the work done would necessarily produce wrongful consequences, without reference to negligent acts by the contractor, or was intrinsically dangerous and constituted ipso facto a nuisance, were improper.

3. NUISANCE—ELEMENTS—BLASTING.

Without reference to the particular locality in which it is carried on, blasting is not so intrinsically dangerous as to be ipso facto a nuisance, so that the blaster will be liable for injury caused by it irrespective of his negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 37, Nuisance, §§ 15, 23.]

4. MASTER AND SERVANT—INDEPENDENT CONTRACTOR—LIABILITY OF MASTER.

Where liability depends on negligence, an independent contractor is liable for the negligence, and not the employer.

5. SAME.

An employer contracting with an independent contractor to construct a wagon road through an uninhabited and substantially untraveled region is not liable for injury happening to some one injured by the blowing out of a stump in the road, though the blasting was done without notice; the chance of injury being remote, and the failure to give notice being the negligence of the independent contractor, and not of the employer.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Cruz County; Lucas F. Smith, Judge.

Action by Harriet E. Houghton and others against the Loma Prieta Lumber Company. From a judgment for plaintiff and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Bishop, Wheeler & Hoefler and William Rix (Alfred J. Harwood, of counsel), for appellant. Sullivan & Sullivan, Theo. J. Roche, and Chas. M. Cassin, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. These appeals both arise out of an action in the superior court entitled "Harriet E. Houghton et al. v. Loma Prieta Lumber Co." (a corporation). That action was brought by the widow and minor children of Herbert E. Houghton, deceased, to recover damages for his death, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant. The verdict and judgment were for plaintiff, and from the judgment and from an order denying a motion for a new trial the defendant appeals. The appeal from the order denying a new trial is presented in transcript S. F. No. 3,920, and the appeal from the judgment is presented in transcript, S. F. No. 3,837. The two appeals were heard together and will be determined in one opinion.

The injury which caused the death of the deceased occurred in this way: On February 2, 1901, a road was being constructed along a wooded and mountainous region, and about noon of that day a stump which stood in the course of the projected road was exploded. At the time of such explosion the deceased was walking along the course of the said road that was thus being constructed, and was in the close vicinity of said stump, and received such injuries from the consequences of the explosion as caused his death a few days after. It is contended by appellant that the persons who were actually engaged in the construction of the road had given ample notice of the coming explosion, and were not guilty of any negligence in the premises, and that the injuries of deceased were caused by his own contributory negligence; but, while there was strong evidence sustaining this contention, still there was some conflicting evidence on these points, and we cannot say that the finding of the jury against the contention of appellant as against these matters was wholly unwarranted.

The point in the case which requires the most attention, and about the only one that need be discussed in detail, arises out of the contention of the appellant that the road in question was being constructed by one A. W. Wyman as an independent contractor under a contract with appellant, by which Wyman was to have full control and direction of the construction of the road, and was to construct the same for a certain named sum of money; that the explosion was caused by Wyman; that, if there was any negligence in handling the explosion, it was the negligence of Wyman and his employés; and that, therefore, the appellant is not liable for the death of the deceased under the rule of respondent superior. The evidence was quite clear and strong that the road was being constructed by Wyman as an independent contractor, but respondents contend that there was some evidence which should be considered as conflicting with appellant's evidence on this subject to such an extent as to have warranted the jury in finding that Wyman was not an independent contractor. It is not necessary, however, for us to pass upon this question; for, even if the jury had found that the road was being constructed by Wyman as an independent contractor, still they would have been authorized to find appellant liable, under certain instructions of the court which were erroneous. These instructions occur in several forms, but the point is sufficiently presented in instructions numbers 25 and 27. Instruction 25 as asked by appellant is as follows: "I instruct you as a matter of law that where work is contracted to be done by an independent contractor, the owner or employer retaining or exercising no management or control over the doing of the work, then the employer is not liable for injuries or death resulting from the negligence of the contractor." The court refused to give this instruction as asked; but of its own motion gave it with the following addition: "But this rule, however, is subject to some very important exceptions, among which are the following: If the performance of the work will necessarily bring wrongful consequences to pass unless guarded against, the law will hold the employer answerable for negligence in the performance of the work. If the work contracted for is of such a character that it is intrinsically dangerous or will probably result in injury to a third person, the one directing to have it done is liable for such injury, although the injury may be avoided if the contractor take proper precaution." Instruction No. 27 as asked by appellant is as follows: "I further instruct you that if you find from the evidence that said Herbert E. Houghton was killed by a blast exploded in the course of construction of the road referred to in the complaint, and that such blasting was done by a person or persons hired or employed by A. W. Wyman, and that the said A. W. Wyman was engaged in the construction of said road for the Loma Prieta Lumber Company, under an agreement or contract to construct said road for a specific sum of money, and that in and by such contract the right of selection or control of the persons employed by said A. W. Wyman was not reserved by the Loma Prieta Lumber Company, then said Loma Prieta Lumber Company would not be liable for the death of said Herbert E. Houghton, even though you should find that the persons who did the blasting which resulted in the death of the said Houghton did said blasting in a negligent manner." The court refused to give the instruction as asked, but gave it with the following amendment made by the court of its own motion: "Unless you believe from the evidence that the work contracted to be done would necessarily bring wrongful consequences to pass unless guarded against, or unless you believe that the work contracted to be done was of such a character that it was intrinsically dangerous and would probably result in injury to a third person."

By these instructions the jury were told that in this case they might apply the doctrine that, although the work was being done by an independent contractor, still the appellant was liable for any injury caused thereby if the work being done would necessarily produce the wrongful consequences, without reference to the negligent acts by the independent contractor, or was intrinsically dangerous and constituted ipso facto a nuisance; but the evidence and the facts in the case did not warrant such instruction. The road was being constructed on land owned by one George Olive through a wild, mountainous, uninhabited, and practically untraveled region. It was called the "Spignet Gulch Road." The nearest house was about one-half mile away from the point of explosion. Near a part of the course of the road there was an old trail about one-half or three-quarters of a mile long made many years ago by said Olive, for the hauling of wood upon a one-horse sled. It had not been used for that purpose for many years, and in places was so obstructed by brush and undergrowth that it could scarcely be traveled by pedestrians. There was a place somewhere in that general region of the country called "Olive Springs," which was in the summer months visited to some extent by campers; but it does not appear that even in those months any considerable number of those campers traveled this trail. At the time of the explosion in the month of February it was practically unused. James Olive, a witness for the plaintiff, testified as follows: "When this Spignet Gulch Road was being built, there were no campers there. There were no guests at the Springs at that time. There were no campers in January or February, 1901." George Olive, one of the witnesses for the plaintiff, testified substantially to the same thing. Speaking of this trail, he said: "It was almost impassable in February, 1901. * * * In building the wagon road up to the Spignet Gulch, they even had to brush out the sled road. In February, 1901, it was impassable for a man. Part of the time it was pretty well grown up with brush. The purpose for which that sled road was built was for getting out wood, etc., on a sled. It was what is called a 'gulching road.' It got all covered with brush because it was not used. A lot of brush grew over it. It was never a thoroughfare." Oscar Chase, another witness for plaintiff, said of this trail: "We had to crawl through the brush over part of it. There was considerable of it was brush. The trail was very little frequented so that it was all grown over." Apart from this old trail, in the condition above described, there was in the vicinity of the road that was being built no thoroughfare or traveled road near enough to be affected by an explosion, and no residences or people engaged in work or business of any kind. It is difficult to imagine a more isolated place, or one at which an ordinary blast would be less likely to cause any injury to person or property. Under these circumstances, it would be a rare thing for a blast there to do injury to any one even if carelessly exploded and without any warning; and yet the jury were told they might hold the defendant liable for injury caused by the blowing out of a stump at such a place, even though the work was being done by an independent contractor. We are satisfied that this view of the case was erroneous, that there was no warrant for the jury finding that the work was done by Wyman as an independent contractor, and still finding that the appellant was liable; and for this reason the judgment and order must be reversed.

Counsel on both sides have cited many authorities touching the question above determined, but we do not deem it necessary to minutely examine and discuss these authorities. The weight of authority seems to be that blasting, without reference to the particular locality in which it is carried on, is not so intrinsically dangerous as to be ipso facto a nuisance, so that the blaster would be liable for the injury caused by it whether or not he was guilty of any negligence in the manner in which the blasting was done; but that the question of his liability would depend upon whether or not he was guilty of any negligence. See French v. Vix, 21 N. Y. Supp. 1016, 2 Misc. Rep. 312, and the many cases there cited. In the said case of French v. Vix it is said: "The later decisions all tend to hold that blasting is not dangerous in itself, and we think that view is now firmly established by the courts of this state." Quotation is made from Herrington v. Village of Lansingburgh, 110 N. Y. 145, 17 N. E. 728, 6 Am. St. Rep. 348, in which case the court says: "If there was any culpable negligence which caused the injury to plaintiff, it was that of the contractors. They had entire control of the work and the manner of its performance. They could choose their own time for firing the blast, and select their own agents and instrumentalities. They could make the charges of powder large or small, and they could in some degree smother the blasts, so as to prevent falling rocks and much of the noise of explosion, or they could carelessly omit all precautions, and for the consequences of their negligence they alone would be responsible. If it were a prudent thing to notify persons in the vicinity of the blast before it was fired, then the contractors should have given notice, but the duty to give it did not devolve upon the village." It is not necessary, however, in the case at bar, to discuss the question whether blasting in the heart of a city or in a thickly populated place in close proximity to buildings and traveled streets and highways is so necessarily dangerous that one could not be relieved from injurious consequences by giving the work to an independent contractor. In considering questions similar to the one here under discussion, this court has recognized the distinction between acts done in secluded places and acts done in thickly populated places. In Kleebauer v. Western Fuse Co., 138 Cal. 497, 71 Pac. 617, 60 L. R. A. 377, 94 Am. St. Rep. 62, where the action was for damages caused by the explosion of powder stored by the defendant, the court said (we quote from the syllabus which correctly states the decision) as follows: "The storage of gunpowder in a powder magazine for use in the manufacture of fuses, in a place properly selected, is not a nuisance per se; and in an action for damages for explosion of the gunpowder so stored by defendant, where no negligence was shown, it was error to give an instruction to the jury making no distinction between the use and manufacture of powder, nor any exception to the rule where a secluded situation was selected, and others were afterwards attracted to the locality, and making the defendant liable, notwithstanding the exercise of the greatest care and notwithstanding the explosion and damage were caused by the unlawful act of a third person entirely beyond the control of defendant. In such a case the defendant is not responsible." And, of course, where liability depends upon negligence, the independent contractor is liable for the negligence, and not the party who lets the contract. To hold that a party cannot contract with an independent contractor to construct a wagon road through a uninhabited and substantially untraveled, wild, mountainous region, without being liable for injury that possibly might happen to some one by blowing out a stump on the course of the road, would be substantially to hold that in no case where there is an independent contractor can the letter of the contract escape the rule of respondeat superior. In the case at bar the chance of injury from the blasting of a stump, even when done without notice, was most remote, and the failure to give notice, if there was such failure, was the negligence of the independent contractor and not of the appellant. There is nothing in the contention of respondents that appellant was a trespasser on the land on which the road was to be built. It abundantly appears in the evidence that the road was constructed with the knowledge and consent of the owner of the land, and that he was paid by appellant for the privilege of constructing it.

Quite a number of other points are made by appellant, but we do not deem it necessary to notice them in detail. Most of them are unimportant, and others may not arise upon a new trial. In Harriet E. Houghton et al., Plaintiffs and Respondents, v. Loma Prieta Lumber Company, a Corporation, Defendant and Appellant, S. F. No. 3,837, the judgment appealed from is reversed; and in Harriet E. Houghton et al., Plaintiffs and Respondents, v. Loma Prieta Lumber Co., a Corporation, Defendant and Appellant, S. F. No. 3,920, the order denying a new trial is reversed.

RISSEY v. SUPERIOR COURT OF COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO et al. (S. F. 4,925.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 9, 1907.)

HOLIDAYS—SPECIAL HOLIDAYS—JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS.

One charged with felony cannot complain because his case is set down for trial on a day declared by the Governor a special holiday, under Act Nov. 23, 1907, on the theory that the Legislature can only provide for a general holiday, and that the provision that the superior courts may act on special holidays is void; for, if the law providing for special holidays is void, the proclamation declaring a day a special holiday is without force.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento, County; J. W. Hughes, Judge.

Application for writ of prohibition by Albert Rissey against the superior court of county of Sacramento and another. Denied.

Grove L. Johnson, A. L. Shinn, C. E. McLaughlin, C. O. Busick, and C. B. Harris, for petitioner. L. T. Hatfield, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The petitioner being under a charge of felony in the superior court of Sacramento county, his case was set down for trial on a day which has been declared a "special holiday" by the Governor, under the laws enacted at the special session of the Legislature lately convened, and approved November 23, 1907, amending sections 10 and 135 of the Code of Civil Procedure. He applies for a writ of prohibition to prevent the superior court from proceeding with the trial of his case on a special holiday. His theory is that the Legislature cannot provide for the creation of a holiday other than a general and full holiday; that the provisions of the aforesaid statutes designating special holidays and declaring that the superior courts may act on special holidays in certain classes of cases are void; and that the effect is that the days which are declared special holidays under that law are really general holidays, on which, as he contends, the court cannot be open.

If the law providing for special holidays is void, the effect would not be to make days so designated full general holidays. In that case the proclamation declaring them special holidays would be without authority of law and of no force. They would, in that event, be no holidays at all, and the superior court could proceed. In any case, therefore, the trial would be lawful.

The application is denied.

PACIFIC VINEGAR & PICKLE WORKS v. SMITH. (S. F. 4,319.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 6, 1907.)

1. CORPORATIONS—AUTHORITY OF OFFICERS—UNAUTHORIZED ACTS—RATIFICATION.

A corporation did not ratify its president's unauthorized act in receiving notes, so as to exculpate him from liability to it by presenting the notes in bankruptcy proceedings against the maker and receiving part payment of the amount due thereon, where it first learned of the unauthorized acts on the maker's failure; it being the corporation's duty to realize as much as it could upon the notes improperly taken so that his liability could be accurately estimated, and the general rule that a ratification of an agent's unauthorized act is an acceptance by the principal of the responsibilities of the act and the substitution of himself for the agent being applied to innocent third persons, and to relieve the agent where the principal could have disaffirmed or rescinded as against the innocent third party.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 12, Corporations, §§ 1713-1719.]

2. NONSUIT—MOTION—SEVERAL CAUSES OF ACTION.

A motion for a nonsuit directed to all the causes of action sued on is not sustainable as to one cause of action only.

3. APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—REFUSAL OF NONSUIT.

Any error in refusing a nonsuit as to a cause of action is harmless where the court instructed the jury to find for defendant thereon.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 4209-4211.]

4. CORPORATIONS—BOOKS—IMPUTED KNOWLEDGE OF CONTENTS—UNAUTHORIZED ACTS OF PRESIDENT.

The rule that directors are presumed to know facts disclosed by the corporation's books is designed for the protection of third persons and stockholders, and cannot be applied against a corporation to defeat the liability of its president to it for unauthorized acts.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank H. Kerrigan, Judge.

Action by the Pacific Vinegar & Pickle Works against Elizabeth E. Smith, executrix. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

See 78 Pac. 550.

Carter P. Pomeroy, for appellant. Campbell, Metson & Campbell (Thomas H. Breeze, of counsel), for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Sidney M. Smith in his lifetime was the president of the plaintiff corporation. This action was brought against his estate to recover as damages the balance remaining due on certain promissory notes executed by the California Packing Company to plaintiff corporation, which were accepted and received by Sidney M. Smith as president of the corporation without authority so to do and against the express instruction of plaintiff's board of directors. Trial was had before a jury, whose verdict passed for plaintiff. From the judgment which followed and from the order denying the motion for a new trial, defendant appeals.

Upon the appeal she first contends that the acts of Smith were ratified by plaintiff corporation. This ratification, it is contended, was established by the acts of plaintiff. The notes made by the California Packing Company were indorsed by A. B. Patrick and presented nominally to plaintiff corporation, but, in fact, to its president Smith, by whom there was placed upon the notes the indorsement of the plaintiff corporation, after which some of these notes were discounted in the banks, some by the president himself, while others remained the property of the plaintiff corporation. Subsequently the California Packing Company and its accommodation indorser, A. B. Patrick, both became insolvent. In the bankruptcy proceedings which followed the plaintiff corporation participated by presenting these notes and received from the bankrupts' estates part payment of the amount due thereon. It is urged that these acts amounted to a ratification, and relieved Mr. Smith and his estate from all liability to the Pacific Vinegar & Pickle Works. For the correct determination of this proposition, other facts than those thus stated are necessary for consideration. Some of those facts will be found set forth in Pacific Vinegar & Pickle Works v. Sidney M. Smith, 145 Cal. 352, 78 Pac. 550, 104 Am. St. Rep. 42. Others are as follows: The California Packing Company, under an agreement to purchase certain of its supplies from plaintiff corporation, promised to make its settlements on the first collection day of each month for all goods purchased for the calendar month preceding. Afterward Mr. Smith, as president of the corporation, requested of his board of directors that he be allowed to extend credit to the packing company, stating that the latter company could secure the indorsement of A. B. Patrick to its notes; it being understood that A. B. Patrick was financially responsible. The directors authorized Mr. Smith to extend credit to the company not exceeding $15,000. Under this agreement the sales continued to the packing company, and, in turn, its promissory notes bearing 7 per cent. interest per annum were taken. These notes were discounted by the plaintiff corporation from time to time as money was required. The notes were three-month notes. At first they were paid promptly at maturity, but within a short time the packing company became financially embarrassed. Mr. Cote, its manager, explained the situation to plaintiff's president, and an arrangement was entered into between them whereby, when a note of the packing company became due, Mr. Smith gave to Mr. Cote the check of the plaintiff corporation to pay the note, and in return took the defendant packing company's note—in effect a renewal note for the same amount. Not only did Mr. Smith thus use the money of the plaintiff corporation, but he charged the packing company a brokerage commission of 1 per cent. for so doing, and in some instances took a bonus in addition thereto. These transactions were concealed from the directors of the plaintiff corporation, to whom at their meetings Mr. Smith represented that the obligations of the packing company were being promptly met, and that the outstanding notes to the plaintiff, which notes it either held or had discounted, amounted to about the sum for which he was authorized to extend credit. When, however, the failure of the packing company came, plaintiff was first apprised that there were of the packing company notes held by it or indorsed in its name by its president Smith, and discounted, either to Smith himself or to the Bank of British Columbia, an aggregate of $60,000, about $23,000 of which was held by the bank and about $21,000 by Smith himself. The cases of Pacific Vinegar & Pickle Works v. Smith and Smith v. Pacific Vinegar & Pickle Works, 145 Cal. 352, 78 Pac. 550, 104 Am. St. Rep. 42, were cross-actions wherein Smith sought to recover upon the packing company's notes which had been indorsed by him in the name of the plaintiff corporation, and without its knowledge and which were by him held. The determination of that litigation was against Smith's contention, and the facts there brought forth were held not to constitute a ratification.

Nor in this case can it be successfully contended that the acts of the plaintiff amounted to a ratification which would exculpate its agent. The general rule undoubtedly is that the ratification of an unauthorized act of an agent is an acceptance by the principal of the responsibilities of the act and the substitution of himself for the agent. In general, the rule is applied for the protection of innocent third persons, those who have dealt with the agent upon the strength of his apparent or ostensible authority. As to such persons, such a rule is essential for the preservation of their rights; and it is therefore enforced to the fullest extent. It is declared to be the duty of the principal to act immediately after knowledge; and his passivity or silence will be construed into an acquiescence or ratification so as to protect the innocent third party. In general, also, the same rule is applied to relieve the agent where the principal could have disaffirmed or rescinded as against the innocent third party and has failed to do so, and this upon the very logical theory that having accepted the contract as to the third party with knowledge of its terms, and with ability to rescind he has thus affirmed the act as to his agent. But, upon a moment's reflection, it will become apparent that the reason for applying the rule in all its liberality to innocent third persons does not exist in the same broad and benignant sense to the unwarranted and perhaps unlawful act of the agent. Thus, in many instances, the transaction is one which the principal could not rescind, because of the ostensible power of his agent. The innocent third party is thus fully protected. But can it with reason or justice be said that, because the principal is thus compelled to accept the consideration from the innocent third party, the agent himself must of necessity be held harmless for his violation of duty and breach of trust? If an agent with ostensible authority to sell his principal's wheat, but under instructions to sell it for not less than $1 a bushel, shall sell and deliver it for 50 cents a bushel, there is no power in the principal to rescind the sale. Shall the principal by accepting the 50 cents be held to have exonerated his agent from liability for the other 50 cents per bushel? Such a doctrine certainly does not commend itself, and is not sustained. It is limited, so far as the agent is concerned, to those cases where there remains with the principal, after his first complete knowledge of the transaction, the power to rescind, and, failing so to do, he is properly charged with full acceptance of all the responsibilities of the contract, even to the exoneration of his agent, because, with the ability to rescind, if he had rescinded, the transaction would be at an end and nobody would be injured. But, in a case such as the one here presented, it cannot successfully be contended that the acts of the plaintiff in endeavoring to realize upon the notes of the insolvent corporation, taken and indorsed by Smith in violation of his instructions, could amount, as to him, to an exonerating ratification. As to the packing company, undoubtedly it was a ratification, but, as to the packing company, the plaintiff corporation could do nothing else. Mr. Smith had apparent and ostensible authority to make sales in the manner in which he did. The sales as to the packing company were valid sales. The plaintiff, as to the packing company, could not have rescinded, and in failing to attempt to rescind it cannot be held to have ratified its agent's acts. The sale being complete as between the vinegar works and the packing company, it was not only the right, but it was the duty, of the plaintiff to realize as much as it could upon the notes thus improperly taken by its president, not to the end that he should be relieved from responsibility for the differences, but to the very end that by using every endeavor to realize upon the notes the agent's liability by way of damage could be accurately estimated in terms of that difference. Triggs v. Jones, 46 Minn. 277, 48 N. W. 1113; St. Mary's Bank v. Calder, 3 Strobb. (S. C.) 403; White v. Sanders, 32 Me. 188; Goodale v. Middaugh, 8 Colo. App. 233, 46 Pac. 11; Williams v. Moore, 24 Tex. Civ. App. 402, 58 S. W. 953; Continental Ins. Co. v. Clark, 126 Iowa, 274, 100 N. W. 524.

It is urged that the court erred in refusing to grant a nonsuit as to the twelfth cause of action; plaintiff's liability upon each of these notes being charged in a separate cause of action, and the twelfth dealing with the sum of $165.20 alleged to have been paid out of the funds of the plaintiff to the defendant's testator without consideration. On the trial the plaintiff offered in evidence a check drawn by the plaintiff corporation to the order of its president, Sidney M. Smith, and indorsed by him. There was no evidence offered by the plaintiff showing the purpose for which the check was given to Mr. Smith and a failure of proof to show that it was given without consideration or without authority. But the motion was directed "to all the causes of action mentioned in the complaint," and was not tenable unless, as to all, there was a failure of evidence. Moreover, no injury could have resulted to appellant, since, by its instructions, the court charged the jury to find for the defendant as to this particular cause of action. The court was justified in refusing to give defendant's requested instructions Nos. 1 and 2. The instructions were based on the proposition that no limit was fixed by the directors as to the amount of credit which its president Smith could extend to the packing company. There was evidence showing that the board of directors placed a credit limit of "$15,000 or thereabouts," and that the real authority of the president, Mr. Smith, was limited to the extension of that amount of credit.

Instruction No. 3, requested by the defendant and refused by the court, was to the effect that, though the plaintiff might have originally limited the amount of credit to a particular amount, nevertheless, if after imposing such limit it intentionally, or by want of ordinary care, allowed Mr. Smith to believe that he was authorized to extend such credit to an amount beyond the limit so imposed, and to the extent that he did impose it, this fact, if established, was a defense to the action. In support of this proposed instruction, it is contended that the books of account of the plaintiff corporation had been introduced in evidence, and that, as these books of account would have shown to the directors the true state of facts, negligence or an intentional acquiescence is imputable to them in having allowed the credit to exceed the designated amount. In this appellant contends for the rule that the officers, and particularly the directors of a corporation, are chargeable with knowledge of the facts which its books of account and record disclose. This is unquestionably a rule, as is said by Mr. Justice Brewer in First National Bank of Ft. Scott v. Drake, 29 Kan. 311, 44 Am. Rep. 646, which is "founded in public policy, essential to the safety of third parties in their dealings with the bank, and to the protection of the stockholders interested in its welfare and safe management. So far as is necessary to accomplish these results, it should be carefully and strictly upheld; but it should not be carried beyond this, or to such an extent as to work injury to the bank." The rule itself and the limitation of its application cannot be more aptly stated than in the language just quoted. It is designed to protect, and limited to the protection of, third parties and of stockholders, whose trustees and agents the directors are. But, when it is sought to apply the rule against the corporation on behalf of a president found faithless to his trust, the effort is without support in reason or authority. It would permit an officer of a corporation to enforce his own wrong against the corporation itself. Thus, while this rule of imputable knowledge of the contents of the books of a corporation is presumed for the protection of third persons and stockholders, it is not only never recognized, but distinctly disaffirmed, where the matter complained of is one between the corporation itself and any of its officers or agents. To apply it would be to put a premium on dishonest bookkeeping, and, as pointed out by Mr. Justice Brewer, in the case of a bank, to permit the bookkeeper and cashier to combine and plunder the bank of all its assets, unknown to any one, though every transaction should be entered in the books, and, after doing this, to receive immunity because of the knowledge imputed to the other officers. See, also, Scott v. Depeyster, 1 Edw. Ch. (N. Y.) 513; Wakeman v. Dalley, 51 N. Y. 27, 10 Am. Rep. 551; Wallace v. Lincoln Savings Bank, 89 Tenn. 630, 15 S. W. 448, 24 Am. St. Rep. 625; Hallmark's Case, 8 Ch. Div. 329.

For these reasons the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

1. APPEAL—REVIEW—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

4. APPEAL—REVIEW—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE—OBJECTIONS.

Where the gripman of the car which injured plaintiff, a child, testified for defendant that, when he saw the child, he instantly let go the cable, and stopped the car as quickly as he could, and on cross-examination he denied telling plaintiff's father, at a certain time and place, that, when he first saw the boy, he rang the gong, and thought he could frighten him, and the father was then asked if at such time and place the gripman did not make a certain statement to him, not precisely, but in substance, the same as that contained in the question to the gripman, and the answer finally given, as to what the gripman told him, showed a statement substantially the same as that as to which the foundation was laid, and no specific objection to the method of impeachment was made, but the only objection to the question calling forth the answer was that it was incompetent, and not part of the res gestæ; and there was no motion to strike out the answer, or any suggestion that the foundation laid did not fully cover the matter testified to—defendant cannot urge that a proper foundation was not laid for the impeaching testimony.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thomas F. Graham, Judge.

Action by Robert H. Keyes, Jr., against the Geary Street, Park & Ocean Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Platt & Bayne, for appellant. H. H. Hut-ton, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an action on behalf of an infant plaintiff for damages for personal injuries caused him by being struck by a moving car of defendant. Verdict and judgment were in his favor; and the defendant appeals from such judgment, and from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

1. The evidence given on the trial is sufficient to sustain the verdict upon the theory that defendant's gripman, after actual discovery of plaintiff's perilous situation, could have avoided the injury by the exercise of ordinary care. The well-settled rule that one is bound to use ordinary care to avoid injuring a person whom he actually discovers to be in a dangerous situation, although such dangerous situation is due solely to the negligence of such person, and is liable for the damage resulting from his failure to use such care, is not disputed. The claim is that the gripman did not actually discover the perilous situation of the child in time to avoid injuring him by the exercise of such care, and that, immediately upon discovering it, he did all that he could to stop the car and prevent the injury. An examination of the record has satisfied us that upon this question there is a substantial conflict of evidence, and under these circumstances the verdict of the jury and the ruling of the trial court on motion for a new trial are conclusive upon us. The case here presented is very different from that of Bennichsen v. Market St. Ry. Co., 149 Cal. 18, 84 Pac. 420, relied on by defendant, where there was no evidence at all to show that the motorman saw the child until after the accident had occurred, and the contention was that he would have seen her had he exercised reasonable care.

2. It is claimed that the trial court erred to defendant's prejudice in admitting evidence as to a statement made the day after the accident by the gripman of the car to plaintiff's father. The gripman was called as a witness by the defendant, and, on his direct examination, testified: "The moment I saw the child, I released the rope. I had been watching for the crossing. When I saw the young boy coming, I released my cable, and set my brakes as quickly as possible. I stopped my dummy in about eight or nine feet. * * * Before I saw the child, I was looking straight for the crossing, and rang my gong in case any team should get in my way. * * * I did let go of the cable with my grip. When I saw the child, I instantly let go and stopped the car as quick as I could." On cross-examination, he testified: "I had hold of the gong when I first saw the child, and rang the gong for the crossing, and saw the boy at the same time. It is not a fact that I thought the gong would scare the boy away. I have had too much experience for that. Mr. Keyes [the plaintiff's father] came out to my house the day after the accident happened. I do not believe there was anybody there at the time when he first came in." The witness was then asked: "Did not you tell him that, when you first saw the boy, you rang the gong and thought you could frighten him?" This was objected to by defendant as incompetent, on the ground that the statement was not a part of the res gestæ, having been made after the accident occurred. The objection was overruled, and the witness answered that he did not make any such statement. Mr. Keyes was called in rebuttal, and testified that he had a conversation with the gripman at the gripman's residence the day or the second day after the accident. He was then asked: "I have asked you whether or not he told you at that time he saw this boy and rang the gong, thinking that the gong would stop the child's running?" This was objected to as incompetent "on the ground that it was not a part of the res gestæ." Plaintiff's counsel replied that he was attempting to show that the gripman had made contradictory statements. The objection was then overruled, and the witness answered: "Yes, sir; he did. He made an assertion." The witness was then asked: "What did he say?" This was objected to upon the same ground; and, the objection having been overruled, the witness answered: "The exact words. I do not know that I could recall them, but they were to the effect—" The defendant here further objected that the witness was stating simply his conclusion. The witness was then asked: "Can you give me the substance of what he told you?" The same objections were repeated and overruled, and the witness answered: "The substance was that he rang the gong, and that he was under the impression that the child would stop or did stop."

We see no error in any of the rulings of the court in this matter. Our law provides: "A witness may also be impeached by evidence that he has made at other times statements inconsistent with his present testimony; but before this can be done the statements must be related to him with the circumstances of times, places, and persons present, and he must be asked whether he made such statements, and, if so, allowed to explain them. * * *" Code Civ. Proc. § 2052. It is unnecessary to cite authorities to the proposition that, in accord with this rule, a witness for an adverse party who testifies on his direct examination as to a matter material to the controversy may be shown, in the manner prescribed by the section quoted, to have made statements inconsistent with his testimony so given on direct examination. The only possible prejudicial effect as to defendant of the evidence in question was that it tended to show an admission on the part of the gripman that he did not upon discovering the child's perilous situation immediately endeavor to stop the car, but relied on the ringing of the gong to warn the child away. This is the effect claimed for the evidence by learned counsel for defendant, and it may be conceded that such was its effect. As we have seen, however, the gripman had testified on his direct examination: "When I saw the young boy coming, I released my cable and set my brakes as quickly as possible. * * * When I saw the child, I instantly let go, and stopped the car as quick as I could." This was most material evidence in support of the defendant's claim that, upon actual discovery of plaintiff's perilous situation, the gripman exercised the required care to avoid injuring him. Giving to the evidence in question the effect claimed for it by defendant, such evidence clearly showed a statement made at another time by the witness regarding the same matter, which was inconsistent with the evidence given by him for the defendant upon his direct examination. It was therefore, upon laying the proper foundation, admissible for the purpose of impeaching the witness, and discrediting the testimony given by him in that regard upon his direct examination. Counsel in discussing the question of the admissibility of this evidence have not referred to these particular portions of the direct examination of the witness, but they appear to us to so completely answer the objections made by defendant that we have not considered other reasons urged by plaintiff in support of the rulings.

It can constitute no valid objection to evidence showing inconsistent statements by a witness that it also shows a declaration by the witness that would not otherwise have been competent evidence against the party. Learned counsel for defendant is undoubtedly right in his contention that plaintiff was not entitled to show any negligence on the part of defendant by any admission or statement of the gripman made after the accident. But he did have a right to discredit the gripman's affirmative evidence given against him as to the exercise of all proper care by showing other statements made by him inconsistent with such evidence. The evidence was admissible solely for that purpose, and doubtless the trial court, if requested by defendant, would have instructed the jury that it could be considered only for that purpose. The instructions are not contained in the record, and, for aught we know, the jury was so instructed.

We have discussed the objection most strongly relied on by defendant; in fact, the only objection made in the original briefs. In the answer to the petition for a hearing in this court after decision in the district court of appeal, it is urged that proper foundation for the impeaching testimony was not laid. The foundation was certainly laid as to the statement contained in the question asked on the cross-examination of the gripman, viz.: "Did not you tell him that when you first saw the boy you rang the gong, and thought you could frighten him?" The circumstances of time, place, and persons present had already been recited, and the witness answered in the negative. The alleged statement contained in the question asked the impeaching witness was not precisely the same in words as that contained in the question asked the gripman, but it was substantially the same in effect, and, although it was stated by counsel for plaintiff that the evidence was offered for the purpose of impeachment, no specific objection that the proper foundation had not been laid for the precise question asked was made. Practically no answer was given to this question. The answer finally given by the impeaching witness as to what the gripman told him on the occasion in question showed a statement differing somewhat in verbiage from the statement as to which the foundation was laid, but it was substantially the same in effect. No specific objection to the method of impeachment was made; the only objection to the particular question calling forth this answer being that it "was incompetent and not part of the res gestæ." No motion to strike the answer out was made, or any suggestion that the foundation laid did not fully cover the matter testified to. We are satisfied that for all practical purposes the statement testified to by the impeaching witness was substantially the same as the statement contained in the question asked the gripman, and that the gripman could not have been misled in the matter by the form of the question asked him. While we see nothing warranting a reversal on account of these matters, we do not desire to be understood as approving the practice here followed. The proper practice in impeaching a witness by showing other statements inconsistent with his testimony is shown by the opinion of this court in People v. Nonella, 99 Cal. 333, 33 Pac. 1097.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

FORSYTH v. BUTLER. (S. F. 3,493.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 30, 1907.
Rehearing Denied Dec. 30, 1907.)

1. APPEAL—REVIEW—FINDINGS ON CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

A finding based upon conflicting evidence will not be disturbed on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 3983-3989.]

2. PARTNERSHIP—DISSOLUTION—ACCOUNTING.

Statement of proper method of determining items of expense chargeable to one of two partners in the business of packing, handling, and selling raisins, each partner being himself a grower, and turning over crop to the firm to be marketed, under an arrangement that their crops should be packed at a named price, but, when the crop of one should be greater than that of the other, the excess should be packed by the firm at cost at one of the seven packing plants of the firm.

3. SAME—OVERDRAWING ACCOUNT BY PARTNER—LIABILITY FOR INTEREST.

Where a partner through inadvertence overdraws his account which has not been stated, upon a settlement of the firm business, he should be charged with interest on the overdraft from the time he drew it down to the time of settlement, but not after that time, since he is not liable for interest after his money is due him.

4. APPEAL — RECORD — CONTENTS — PRE-SUMPTIONS.

Even where the record does not show whether any, or, if any, which, of the grounds of the motion for a new trial mentioned in the notice of intention were argued before the court for a new trial as the statement on appeal is expressly required to do under Code Civ. Proc. § 661, and the statement on appeal settled two years after the motion made upon the minutes of the court was denied, does not state or imply that it contains all the evidence pertaining to all the grounds argued before the court, and there are circumstances indicating that evidence pertaining to all the grounds is not included, it will be presumed on appeal that all the grounds mentioned in the minute order were argued in the absence of an objection by respondent as to the sufficiency of the record.

5. COSTS—DISCRETION OF COURT—EQUITY.

In equity costs are discretionary, both in the trial court and on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 13, Costs, § 21.]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; J. R. Webb, Judge.

Action by William Forsyth against A. B. Butler. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded, with directions.

Stanton L. Carter, for appellant. Frank H. Short, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The plaintiff and defendant were partners in the business of packing and selling raisins grown in the season of 1894. Each was also a grower of raisins on his own account, and each delivered to the firm the raisins grown by him, to be packed and sold by the firm for his individual account. After the dissolution of the partnership, Forsyth began this action for an accounting of the firm affairs. Butler thereupon began an independent suit against Forsyth, also for an accounting. The two actions were consolidated for trial and judgment, and but one decision was made for the two cases, covering all the issues in both of them. Butler appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The principal questions presented arise from differences concerning the settlement of the respective accounts of the members individually with the firm for the packing of the individual crop of each by the firm. According to the partnership agreement, Butler was to have charge of the keeping of the books of the firm, and of the storing, shipping, and selling of the packed product, while Forsyth was to attend to the receiving, grading, and packing thereof. The crop of each partner was delivered to the firm to be packed and sold for his account on the same terms as were fixed for other growers, with an exception to be hereafter referred to. The packing contract with the growers provided that, when the raisins were delivered at the packing house by the grower, the firm should "make a just and true grading according to quality, which grade shall be the basis of the proportionate amount of net receipts from the sale of raisins packed and sold by (the firm) during the season * * * to which said grower shall be entitled"; that all raisins received by the firm during the season from all growers were to be "graded alike as far as possible," but that, in packing and selling them, all the raisins of each grade were to be intermingled and packed and sold together, without distinction as to the persons delivering them. The different grades of raisins were of different values, ranging from 3 to 17 cents a pound, and, as a result, the value of each crop depended upon the proportion of high-grade raisins to be found therein. As they were intermingled in the packing, it was necessary, in order to have a basis of settlement with each grower, that an account should be kept of the total number of pounds delivered by each grower, and also a record either of the total number of pounds of each grade delivered by him, or of the proportion or percentage of each grade which his particular raisins would run. In practice the uniform custom of the firm was to keep an account only of the total number of pounds of all grades delivered by each grower, and to determine the number of pounds of each grower belonging to the different grades by making tests of his raisins, from time to time, as they were delivered, to ascertain what percentage of each grade they contained, and to find the quantity of the respective grades in the particular crop by means of the percentages thus ascertained. These tests and percentages were made by a "grader" in the employ of the firm, and under the supervision of Forsyth, and were by the grader entered in a book known as the "grade book," which was delivered to the bookkeeper at the close of the season. The grades of the raisins of the two partners, however, were entered only on sheets of paper delivered with the book.

The principal contention of Butler is that his raisins were either not correctly graded or not graded at all; that he had, and should have been credited with, a large quantity of the best quality of raisins, designated as "5 crown" and "6 crown" clusters, whereas he was not credited with any, and that he was credited with a much larger quantity of the poorer and least valuable grades of raisins than he actually had, and that, in consequence, the "proportionate amount of the net receipts" of the total sale of raisins for the season allotted to him, according to the books of the firm, and the test grading made, was much less than the true amount. The findings were against him on these points, and he claims that they are not sustained by the evidence. A vast amount of evidence, covering nearly 700 pages of the printed transcript, was introduced on this subject. We have examined it carefully, and we are satisfied that there is sufficient evidence to support the findings, not only in this, but also in all other essential particulars in which it is claimed to be insufficient, including the finding that the grading was not fraudulent.

That there were test gradings made of the raisins of Butler is established beyond doubt. There is considerable evidence tending to show that these gradings did not fairly show the actual quantity of each grade. There is also a good deal of evidence to the effect that it was a fair and just grading. The evidence being in substantial conflict, the finding is conclusive on this court. The method of grading adopted is necessarily, to some extent, inaccurate, and less satisfactory than a separation of the entire crop into grades and ascertaining the respective amounts by actual weighing of them all. It was, however, much less expensive, and there is reason to believe from the evidence as to the manner of carrying on the business that it was the only practicable method. In any event, it was the uniform method used by the firm. Butler knew the method, was fully advised of the fact that it was uniformly followed, and must have expected that his own raisins would be graded in the same way. He was informed of the grading actually made of his raisins. With this knowledge, he sold the entire output himself, and thus made it impossible thereafter to make any other or better grading. The court was justified in concluding that he had consented to the method adopted and that no fairer grading or adjustment of the matter was feasible after the goods were all disposed of. The partnership agreement contains the following provision: "In the event either of the said partners should have handled and packed by said firm more of his individual raisins than the other, the surplus is to be packed, handled and sold at the actual cost of the same to the said firm." The crop of Butler exceeded that of Forsyth by 915,899 pounds. This surplus was all of the kind known as "loose muscatels." Butler and Forsyth each signed a "grower's agreement," the same as other customers of the firm. This agreement provided that the firm should charge $10 a ton for packing this grade of raisins in 50-pound boxes. In casting the account, this rate was charged to each, so far as the crops were equal. But as the surplus was to be packed by the firm at its actual cost only, which was found to be only $4.50 a ton, Butler was not charged $4,579.49 for the packing of his surplus at $10 a ton, but only $2,060.77, the actual cost. As not alone packing, but also handling and selling, was to be done at actual cost, and it was the manifest intent of this clause of the contract that Butler was to derive no advantage or profit from the work done by the firm with respect to this surplus, the referee made a charge to Butler in favor of the firm of $1,753.80, which sum he found to be the actual cost to the firm of the handling and selling of the surplus. It was found that the cost to the firm of the handling, packing, and selling of the raisins at the Fresno house for that year, exclusive of the $4.50 a ton for packing, was, a sum equal to 6.026 per cent. of their gross value. The cost of any particular lot of raisins would obviously be the same percentage of the gross value thereof. The gross value of the Butler surplus was $29,103.87, 6.026 per cent. of which is $1,753.80, the amount charged. In computing the total expenses of all the raisins which went to make up this percentage, there were included all the general and incidental expenses of the business, except certain specific charges for expense, such as packing, commissions, and the like, which were separately accounted for. This was the correct method, and was in conformity with the provisions of the contract above quoted. To find the actual cost to the firm of any lot of raisins, it would be necessary to ascertain the percentage of the general expense properly chargeable to each pound, or to each dollar's worth of the total value, as was done here. To compute the cost at the rate per pound would not be as favorable to Butler, or, at any rate no more so, since he had a greater number of pounds in proportion to value than did Forsyth. If the firm had packed no raisins except those of the two partners, and it had been agreed that the surplus of one over the other should be packed at cost, it would scarcely be contended that it would not be a fair adjustment of the expense to make the one having the surplus pay such proportion of the general firm expenses as the value of his surplus bore to the value of the total quantity, leaving the balance of such general expenses to be borne equally. This, in substance, was accomplished by the plan adopted by the referee. If Butler were not made to pay this proportion of the general expense, he would obtain the services of the firm in disposing of his surplus and escape payment of his just part of the services which he agreed to pay.

There is no double charge in this plan of settling the account. In the matter of this charge Butler stands to the firm not as a partner, but as a customer or patron. The amount he is thus made to pay goes into the firm account as part of the receipts and to that extent increases the profits, of which Butler receives one-half. The same items of expense which are taken in computing his proper percentages, of course, appear again in the statement of the firm account, but this is in no sense a double charge to him. The firm carried on seven packing houses, and the raisins of the two partners were all packed at the Fresno house. All the raisins of all the houses were taken into account in ascertaining this percentage of the general expense to the gross value of the entire pack; the expenses considered being for the general benefit of them all. It is earnestly insisted that this calculation should have been confined to the expense of the Fresno house alone. This was done, so far as the expenses in that house could be separated. With respect to the expenses common to all, the point is wholly immaterial. It could have been ascertained in the way contended for by first ascertaining what portion of the general and common expense was properly chargeable to the Fresno house, and, with that included, computing Butler's percentage on account of the surplus with reference to the output and expense of the Fresno house as thus increased. The result would have been the same. Soon after the firm began business, Forsyth and Butler each began to draw from the firm large sums of money for individual use. The partnership articles provided that each should contribute equally to the capital and share equally in the profits, that it was to continue for one year, ending April 16, 1895, and that, until the termination of the year, neither partner should draw from the funds of the firm any money for individual use, except the proceeds of his individual raisins delivered by him to the firm to be packed and sold. It further provided that an accounting should be had at the end of the year, and each should then be allowed to draw his share of the profits. No such accounting was ever made; but it does not appear to have been more due to the negligence or fault of Butler than of Forsyth that it was not done. The referee took March 10, 1897, as a proper date for balancing the account. He charged each partner with interest on the respective sums drawn by him from the firm, from the date on which it was drawn up to March 10, 1897, and from that date to June 2, 1898, which was the time of the trial. Butler's interest charge was $2,875.19 and Forsyth's $2,069.38; the excess against Butler being $805.81. The firm made a profit, computed by the referee at $23,024.55, which was equally divided in the statement of the account. The interest all went into the profits, and hence Butler obtained a return of one-half of the excess of interest charged against him over that charged to Forsyth. If the interest charge is improper, Butler is injured to the extent of one-half of this excess, that is, in the sum of $402.95. The referee found that Butler still owed the firm the sum of $1,818.74, and accordingly gave judgment against him in favor of Forsyth for one-half that sum, or $909.37, to settle the account, which, of course, included this $402.95, charged for interest.

Appellant claims that a charge of interest was improper under the evidence. The statement bears many indications of omissions of parts of the evidence which would probably throw light upon the question of interest. As it stands, we are unable to find sufficient evidence to justify a charge of interest to either partner. The rule concerning interest for moneys drawn from the firm for individual use by the partners is thus stated in Lindley on Partnership at page 391: "Inasmuch as what is fair for one partner is so for another and the firm, when debtor, is charged with interest, it seems to follow that if one partner is indebted to the firm, either in respect of money borrowed or in respect of balances in his hands, he ought to be charged with interest on the amount so owing, even though on the balance of the whole account a sum might be due him. Except, however, where there has been a fraudulent retention, or an improper application, of money of the firm, it is not the practice of the court to charge a partner with interest on money of the firm in his hands; for example, under ordinary circumstances, a partner is not charged with interest on sums drawn out by him, or advanced to him." There is no evidence that Butler fraudulently retained money of the firm. So far as the evidence indicates anything on the subject, it seems to be the fact that each partner drew approximately enough money from the firm funds to pay what was or would be owing to him on account of his crop of raisins and the balance due him on account of his half of the profits, and that, presumably by inadvertence, the account not having been stated, Butler drew about $1,000 more than his proper share. If this is the true condition of the account, Butler should be charged with interest on the overdraft from the time he drew it down to the time of settlement. But this would not require any charge to Forsyth, nor would it account for the large amount charged to Butler for interest, an amount more than double his overdraft. Butler had charge of the books of the firm, and it was his duty to attend to the bookkeeping. He could not excuse the overdraft by the fact that the account had not been stated. It was his duty to state the account, or show good reason for his inability to do so. Hence he should pay interest on the overdraft.

Nor is there any substantial evidence of an improper application of the money drawn. The articles forbid the drawing of money by either partner during the year, and if it had been drawn without other reason than the fact of his being a partner, there would have been an improper application of firm money by each partner. But, in addition to being a partner, each member of the firm stood in the relation of a patron of the firm. Each sold to the firm a large quantity of raisins which the firm packed and sold for his account, the proceeds of which would be owing to him as soon as sales were made and would be due as soon as, under the growers' agreement, settlement was to be made. It seems that, for the most part, the money was drawn against this packing account, and that it was in the nature of an advancement by the firm to the grower on account of the crop received. It was the custom of the firm to make such advancements to the other growers whose raisins it packed, and it is to be inferred, in the absence of anything to the contrary, that these sums drawn by the partners, respectively, were for the same purpose. It may be that it was the custom to charge the grower interest upon these advances until the end of the year, when a settlement was to be made with them. If so, it would be proper to charge like interest to each of the partners for the same period. But as settlement was due in April, 1898, so far as appears (the record does not satisfactorily show when the raisins packed by the firm were sold), and as it was the duty of the firm to make settlement promptly, no interest could justly be charged after a settlement was due for the raisins sold. The evidence, however, does not show whether it was, or was not, the custom to charge interest upon advances to customers. So, also, if it had been proven that the firm borrowed money with which to carry on its business and was paying interest thereon at the time of these advances, then, of course, each partner should be required to pay interest on sums drawn out by him as a partner from the time of drawing until the money became properly payable to him on final settlement, or on striking a balance of profits. The fact that the partnership agreement shows that the firm had made provision for borrowing money, and the fact that money seems to have been drawn out before it would seem possible that any sales could have been made whereby money could have been received from that source, all indicate that money may have been borrowed, but still there is no evidence that money actually was borrowed, and the money drawn may have been previously paid in by the partners. Each partner became entitled to the money drawn as advances on the crop, as soon as a settlement was due after the raisins were all sold, and no interest should have been charged on the advances after that time. The interest was computed for more than three years, instead of only for a part of one year, as would have been the case in the event stated. Both were evidently drawing against both the profits and the amounts due them from the firm for raisins sold. Butler had by far the largest crop and accordingly drew the most money. The charge of interest against him is consequently greater than that against Forsyth. He could not complain of this difference so long as interest was justly chargeable to him under an agreement to pay interest on advances. But the continuance of the interest after his money was due him would be an injustice to him to that extent.

We are unable to make any proper adjustment of this matter as the record stands. It will be necessary to retry this issue. Evidently this was not considered an important question upon this appeal. Indeed, we had some doubts whether it could be considered at all upon the record presented. The motion for a new trial was made upon the minutes of the court, and was denied on December 17, 1900. The notice of motion contained voluminous specifications as to the insufficiency of the evidence. There is nothing in the record to show whether any, or, if any, which, of the grounds of the motion mentioned in the notice of intention were "argued before the court for a new trial." See Code Civ. Proc. § 661. Ordinarily it would perhaps be presumed that the grounds mentioned in the minute order were all argued. There would be no doubt of this in the present case were it not for the fact that the statement on appeal, settled in December, 1902, two years after the motion was denied, does not anywhere state, or imply, that it contains all the evidence pertaining to all the grounds argued before the court, or relating to the specifications set forth in the notice of intention; but on the subject of what evidence is included therein contains this statement only: "The foregoing is the substance of the testimony in relation to the grading, classification, and quality of the raisins received and packed at the Fresno packing house of Butler & Forsyth during the season of 1894, including the raisins delivered by the firm of Butler & Forsyth." There are many things to indicate that nothing else was intended to be included. The respondent does not raise the objection, and because of his acquiescence we have resolved the doubt in favor of the appellant. But, under all these circumstances and others which we have not stated, we think the appellant should not recover the costs of appeal. The case is in equity, and costs are discretionary both in the trial court and in the appellate court.

We do not consider it necessary to notice the errors of law urged so very briefly by the appellant. None of them affect the merits of the case. The rulings were either correct or harmless.

It is ordered that the judgment, to the amount of $506.42, be affirmed; that it be reversed as to the excess over that amount; that the order denying the motion for new trial be affirmed, except as to the question of the charges of interest to the respective partners in the statement of the account between them; that as to that issue the order be reversed and the cause remanded to the court below for trial of that issue alone; and that the superior court proceed to take such further evidence as may be necessary, and as may be offered upon the issue aforesaid and determine, in accordance with this opinion, the proper charges on account of such interest and render an additional judgment accordingly, and that neither party recover of the other his costs upon this appeal.

BIEBER v. LAMBERT et al. (Sac. 1,486.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 10, 1907.
Rehearing Denied Jan. 9, 1908.)

1. PUBLIC LANDS—SCHOOL LANDS—SALE BY STATE—CONFLICTING PURCHASERS.

Plaintiff's application to purchase state nonagricultural timbered land was in due form, except that there was a defect in the description, whereby it appeared that one tract of 40 acres, the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$, was twice described, making the application seem to cover about 360 acres, though calling for 400. The Surveyor General returned the application, stating as the reason that it called "for the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ and the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$." Thereafter defendant's transferor applied to purchase 560 acres in the same section, including all the land covered by plaintiff's application. Plaintiff then offered another application to purchase 400 acres, wherein the description was the same as in his first application, except that the words "N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$." were substituted for the words "N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$," thus making a good description for 400 acres, in which application the original date of verification was inserted, instead of the true date. A certificate of purchase was issued to defendant's transferor, and it did not appear that at the time she made her application or the purchase money was paid and certificate issued she had notice of plaintiff's attempted application prior to her own, and plaintiff did not occupy the land. Held, that defendant's transferor had the better right, the state by its laws offering such lands to the person who first makes proper application, and one who by his neglect or mistake makes an imperfect application, and whose application for that reason is not received, being, by that law, afforded no protection as against another who makes a proper application, which is received before the first person has again presented his application in amended form, except in cases where such first person was occupying the land before the second person made application therefor. Pol. Code, §§ 3495, 3497.

2. SAME.

Plaintiff's first application was not good for 360 acres of the 400 acres he applied for.

3. SAME—PRIORITY OF RIGHT.

The rule applicable to conflicting purchasers of state nonagricultural timbered land is that, other things being equal, he whose application is first in time is first in right.

4. SAME—PLEADING.

Where a contest under Pol. Code, §§ 3414, 3415, concerning the rights of the respective parties to buy state nonagricultural timbered land, is brought by the one who first filed a proper application, the statement of facts, showing that the land was subject to sale, that he is a qualified purchaser, that he has made and filed due application to purchase, that defendant claims under a subsequent application, and that the order of reference has been made, sufficiently shows his own right, and he need not allege other facts to show that defendant was not entitled to purchase or that his application is void: but, where the contest is brought by the person whose application is second in point of time, in order to show that there is any contest to try, he must aver that there is a claim under an adverse application, and if he alleges that it was filed prior to his own, and it is not defective on its face, he must overcome the presumption in its favor, arising from such priority, by averment and proof of some fact establishing its invalidity.

5. SAME.

Under Pol. Code, § 3514, making a certificate of purchase of state land prima facie evidence of title, a certificate is sufficient, if not controverted, to establish the right of the holder so far as necessary to prevent a judgment establishing a subsequent claim.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court. Lassen County; F. A. Kelley, Judge.

Action by Nathan Bieber against Ada Lambert and the Central Trust Company under Pol. Code, §§ 3414, 3415, to determine the rights of the respective parties to buy school lands of the state. Judgment for plaintiff, and the trust company appeals. Reversed.

Rehearing denied; Beatty, C. J., dissenting.

J. E. Pardee (A. E. Bolton, of counsel), for appellant. R. M. Rankin, for respondent. W. A. Gett, amicus curiæ.

SHAW, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff in a contest concerning the rights of the respective parties to buy school lands from the state, instituted under the provisions of sections 3414 and 3415 of the Political Code. Ada Lambert made application to purchase the lands, obtained a certificate therefor, and transferred the same to the Central Trust Company before the action, in pursuance of the Surveyor General's order of reference, was begun. The trust company claims only as her successor in interest. She was duly served with summons in the action, but failed to appear, and her default was duly entered. The trust company answered, and appeared at the trial, but introduced no evidence in support of the right of Ada Lambert, or in opposition to the plaintiff. The only question presented is the sufficiency of the evidence, in connection with the facts admitted by the pleadings, to support certain of the findings and the judgment. There is no conflict in the evidence. The facts are as follows: The land is situated in section 36, township 35 N., range 9 E., Mt. Diablo meridian, and is nonagricultural timbered land. On May 13, 1903, Nathan Bieber sent by mail to the Surveyor General at Sacramento his verified application to purchase 400 acres of said section. The application was in due form, except that there was a defect or ambiguity in the description of the land applied for, whereby it appeared that one tract of 40 acres, the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$, was twice described, and the application seemed to cover but 360 acres, though calling for 400 acres. The description was as follows: "The N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$, the W. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$, the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$, the N. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$, and the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 36, Tp. 35, N. R. 9, E., M. D. M., containing four hundred acres." The Surveyor General received the application on May 15, 1903, and on May 20, 1903, returned it by mail, accompanied by a letter to Bieber, stating that it was returned "for the reason that your application calls for the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ and N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ " of the section. The complaint alleges, and the court finds, that it was thereby returned by the Surveyor General to Bieber "for correction"; but there is no evidence that the Surveyor General at the time made any suggestion to that effect. In a letter written by him to Bieber on November 5, 1903, the Surveyor General says that the original application was returned to Bieber for correction, and this is all the evidence on the subject. On May 27, 1903, Ada Lambert presented to the Surveyor General her application and affidavit to purchase from the state 560 acres of the same section, including all the land covered by Bieber's application of May 13th, and also the entire S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ thereof, as well as the remaining 40 acres of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$. This application was on the same day received by the Surveyor General and by him filed in his office and numbered 4,237. On May 28, 1903, Bieber offered to the Surveyor General another application, duly verified, to purchase 400 acres of the section, and the same was thereupon received and filed, and numbered 4,240. The description of land in this application was the same as that in his first application except that the words, "N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$," were substituted for the words, "N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$," thus making a good description of 400 acres of land. The application was apparently verified on May 13, 1903, but Bieber testified, and the court finds, that it was in fact verified on May 23, 1903. Bieber testified that this application was made as a correction and amendatory to his application of May 13, 1903. There is nothing in the application of May 28th to show such intent, unless it may be inferred from the fact that the original date of verification was inserted instead of the true date. There is no other evidence that the Surveyor General was informed that the second application was intended as an amendment of the first. The order of reference, introduced in evidence by plaintiff, makes no mention of Bleber's first application, but recites only the two applications, the one of May 27, 1903, by Ada Lambert, and the other by Nathan Bleber on May 28, 1903. It further states that the application of Ada Lambert was approved on November 27, 1903, and that on January 20, 1904, certificate of purchase No. 4,876 was issued to her for the land she applied for. The complaint alleges that payment of the full purchase price was made upon the Ada Lambert application and a certificate of purchase issued to her by the Surveyor General. The answer admits these allegations, and they therefore stand as established facts in the case.

The complaint is in two counts. The first count is based on the theory that the second application of Bleber is to be treated as an amendment of that of May 13th, and that his rights are the same as if the second had been filed on May 15th, the day the first application was received by the Surveyor General. The second count does not mention the first application, but rests upon that of May 28th alone, and avers that some of the facts stated in the prior application of Ada Lambert are false and her entry consequently void, and upon that ground claims the better right as against her and her successor. The judgment is that Bleber, under his application of May 28, 1903, is entitled to purchase the 400 acres of land therein described, that the Surveyor General must approve the same; that the defendants are not, and never have been, entitled to purchase said 400 acres, or any part thereof; and that, as to said land, the application of Ada Lambert and the certificate of purchase issued to her are void.

1. It is not claimed, and it does not appear, that Ada Lambert, at the time she made her application and paid the fees therefor, nor at the time the purchase money for the land was paid and the certificate of purchase issued to her, had any notice or knowledge of the attempt of the plaintiff to file his application of May 13th, prior to the filing of her application, on May 27th. We are unable to perceive any sufficient ground or reason for declaring his right, by reason of that attempt, to be superior to hers. The land is timbered school land, unfit for cultivation, and Bleber did not settle upon or take possession of it. His application was for more than 320 acres, the largest quantity of tillable land that can be purchased from the state by one person. He did not apply as a settler, nor claim to have occupied the land, but applied to buy it as vacant, nonagricultural school land. The state, by its laws, offers such lands for sale to the qualified person who first makes a proper application for it, and one who, by his own neglect or mistake, makes an imperfect and uncertain application to purchase a body of such land, and whose application the agents of the state, for that reason, refuse to receive or file, is by that law afforded no protection and given no priority of right, as against another qualified person who makes a proper application for the same land, which is received and filed before the first person has again presented his application in an amended and perfect form, except in cases where such first person was occupying the land before the second party made application therefor. Pol. Code, §§ 3495, 3497. If the plaintiff had made a proper application and the Surveyor General had, without sufficient cause, rejected it or refused to receive and file it, possibly the plaintiff could claim a prior and superior right to purchase against a second applicant, although he did not occupy the land and such second applicant was ignorant of his offer to make a filing. We need not decide as to this, for the plaintiff's application was uncertain and ambiguous with respect to the land he sought to purchase, and there was good reason for rejecting it on that ground. He has no equitable grounds upon which to claim that Ada Lambert's prior application should not, if otherwise lawful, give her priority of right. There is some contention that the plaintiff's application was good for 360 acres of the 400 acres he applied for, although one tract of 40 acres was twice described therein, and that the Surveyor General should have received and filed it as an application for the land actually and properly described. There is no merit in this claim. The description was uncertain. There was no means of ascertaining therefrom what other 40-acre subdivision the plaintiff intended to describe instead of or in addition to that described twice, nor wherein the mistake lay, nor of determining that he was willing to take less than 400 acres. The reasonable and proper course was to return his application with a statement of the defect. It follows that the judgment was not authorized under the first count of the complaint.

2. In the second count the false statements made by Ada Lambert in her application were particularly alleged to be those to the effect that she was a citizen of the United States, a resident of this state; that there was no occupation of the land adverse to any that she had; that she desired to purchase it as school land, and solely for her own benefit; and that she had made no contract or agreement to sell the same, and it was alleged that her certificate was therefore void. The answer of the trust company joined issue upon these allegations, and alleged the qualifications and prior right of Ada Lambert to purchase, claiming as her assignee. The court found that her statements in the application that she desired to buy the land as school land and solely for her own use and benefit, and had made no contract or agreement to sell the same were false. This finding is challenged by a specification that it is unsupported by the evidence. We find no evidence in the record to sustain it, and consequently it must be excluded from our consideration as a foundation for the judgment.

The principal contention of the respondent is that in land contests of this character each claimant must become an actor, and must, by an appropriate pleading, state to the court the facts necessary to give him a prior right to purchase the land and must support his allegations in that behalf by proof, and that, if he fails to introduce any evidence, he must, in all cases, fail of any relief, and judgment must go against him in any event, and that, if the adverse party produces proof that he made an application in due form, and that he was a qualified purchaser, the right of such adverse party to purchase must be adjudged accordingly, although his application may be subsequent in time to that of the other party, and no proof be made showing the invalidity of the previous application or the lack of qualification of the previous applicant. There are cases to which this rule would apply, but this case is not of that character. As before stated, this land is not suitable for cultivation and no applicant therefor need be an occupant or actual settler, and in this case neither party claimed to be, or was, an occupant. The state holds such lands for sale and the rule clearly applicable to conflicting purchasers is that, other things being equal, he who is first in time is first in right. After the order of reference is made, either party may bring an action to determine the better right. It is always necessary for the party bringing the action to state facts which will show that there is an adverse claim which creates a contest. Polk v. Sleeper, 143 Cal. 71, 76 Pac. 819. If the action is brought by the one who first filed a proper application for this class of land, the statement of facts showing that the land was subject to sale, that he is a qualified purchaser, that he has made and filed due application to purchase, that the defendant claims under a subsequent application, and that the order of reference has been made will sufficiently show his own right and the inferiority of the right of the defendant, and he need not, unless he chooses to do so, allege other facts to show that defendant was not entitled to purchase, or that his application is void by reason of false statements or other causes. Where in such a case he rests upon proof of his own right and the subsequent application of the defendant, and the defendant offers no proof in support of his own case, the plaintiff is clearly entitled to judgment; for his application, being first in time, is prima facie first in right and the defendant's subsequent application is presumptively void.

But, where the action is begun by the person whose application is second in point of time, the conditions are, or may be, reversed. In order to show that there is any contest to try, he must aver that there is a claim under an adverse application. If he alleges that this was filed prior to his own, and it is not defective on its face, he must overcome the presumption in its favor arising from such priority by averment and proof of some fact or facts establishing its invalidity. If his own proof shows a prior application by the other party and the issuance of a certificate thereon by the Surveyor General and no defect or invalidity appears on the face of these papers, and no outside evidence is given to impeach them, such plaintiff must fail. The first applicant is required to make a sworn statement showing his qualifications as a purchaser, and it is only after this has been done that the Surveyor General has authority to issue his certificate. The presumptions that the law has been obeyed, that the first applicant is innocent of the crime of perjury, and that official duty has been properly performed come to the aid of the defendant. In the absence of controverting proof, these presumptions will prevail. The certificate is made prima facie evidence of title in the holder. Pol. Code, § 3514. It is not conclusive, of course, in a contest of this character (McFaul v. Pfankuch, 98 Cal. 402, 33 Pac. 397), and perhaps in this class of cases its prima facie force is no greater than that which arises from the presumption above mentioned; but it is at least sufficient, if not controverted, to establish the right of the holder, so far as may be necessary to prevent the plaintiff from obtaining judgment establishing the subsequent claim, and to require judgment that plaintiff take nothing by the action.

The cases of Lane v. Pferdner, 56 Cal. 122, Gilson v. Robinson, 68 Cal. 543, 10 Pac. 193, Garfield v. Wilson, 74 Cal. 178, 15 Pac. 620, and Prentice v. Miller, 82 Cal. 573, 23 Pac. 189, are cited in support of the proposition that either party to such contest must fail if he does not prove his qualifications as a purchaser, and the truth of any fact stated in his application and alleged by the other party to be false. In Lane v. Pferdner the question of the effect of the lack of any evidence on behalf of a defendant is discussed and decided. It was held that he has the burden of proof to establish the averments of his answer to the effect that he is qualified to purchase. In that case, however, it does not appear that there was any proof of facts by the plaintiff, or any facts admitted by the pleadings, which would have the effect of establishing the defendant's claim and a prima facie prior right in defendant, as is the case here. If in this case the plaintiff had merely alleged that the defendants claimed a right to purchase which was inferior to that of plaintiff, and that Ada Lambert was not a qualified purchaser and had made the false statements as found, and had rested his case after proving his own right, as the plaintiff did in Lane v. Pferdner, without proving or averring facts showing a prior right in defendants, the decision in that case would control, and judgment would properly go for the plaintiff, if defendants introduced no evidence. But the case is different here, and is governed by the rule stated in Polk v. Sleeper, 143 Cal. 73, 76 Pac. 819, to the effect that, where a plaintiff in such a contest by his pleading or proof shows a prima facie prior right in the defendant, he must go farther and show some "fact, matter, or thing that would invalidate the defendant's certificate of purchase." The ordinary rules of pleading, practice, and evidence are to be followed in these contests (Hinckley v. Fowler, 43 Cal. 64), and for the purpose of defeating the plaintiff's claim the defendant may rely on proof made by the plaintiff and facts admitted by the pleading, as in other actions.

The other cases cited by respondent are not applicable to the precise point here under consideration. They merely announce the general doctrine that each party is an actor, and must allege and prove his own case. Nothing is said in regard to the effect of facts admitted by the pleadings, or proof in his favor which may be made by his adversary.

The judgment is reversed.

GREENWOOD et al. v. BEELER.
(S. F. 3,756.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 2, 1907.)
VENDOR AND PURCHASER—CONTRACT—MODIFICATION BY AGREEMENT.

A written agreement was made by a landowner by which he sold it, the purchaser to pay a certain sum down and the balance in monthly installments, with interest, title to be conveyed on full payment. Held, that a subsequent parol contract, by which the vendor agreed to advance to the purchaser money to build a house on the land, the purchaser to increase his monthly payments under the written contract, and that later a written contract should be drawn up to secure the increased loan, could not be considered a rescission of the original written agreement.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by F. M. Greenwood and others, as executors of the will of Monroe Greenwood, deceased, against Edward A. Beeler. From an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial, they appeal. Affirmed.

F. M. Parcels, for appellants. R. F. Morgan and F. A. Hornblower (Chas. E. Nougues, of counsel), for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. In this action judgment went for defendant, and plaintiffs have appealed from an order denying their motion for a new trial. The justices of the District Court of Appeal for the First District being unable to agree upon a judgment, the matter was transferred to this court for hearing and determination.

The action is one by the executors of the will of Monroe Greenwood, deceased, to obtain a judgment fixing the amount due on a contract for the sale by deceased to Beeler of a lot of land, requiring Beeler to pay the same within a time to be fixed by the court, and providing that, in default of such payment by defendant, his right, title, and interest shall be forever barred and foreclosed, and plaintiffs' title quieted as against him. It appears by the complaint, and is admitted by the answer and cross-complaint of Beeler, that the only written contract between the parties was one entered into on February 23, 1895, whereby deceased agreed to sell the land to Beeler for $1,050, Beeler agreeing to pay said amount in installments, $50 at the date of the agreement, and the balance in monthly installments of $20 or more at his option, with interest on deferred payments at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, and all state, city, and county taxes on the property. The contract provided that the deceased would convey the property to Beeler, by good and sufficient deed, upon full payment being made in the time and manner stated, and that any failure of Beeler to comply with the terms of the contract would release deceased from all obligations to convey, and cause a forfeiture of such money as had been paid by him. It is admitted that, as alleged in answer and cross-complaint and found by the trial court, payments were made from time to time by Beeler, aggregating such an amount that, if the same were applied solely on such written contract, there remained due thereon on March 26, 1899, the sum of $270.10 only, which amount was on said day duly tendered to plaintiffs by defendant, with a demand for a deed, and refused by them.

It appears that in May, 1896, deceased orally agreed to advance to Beeler the money necessary to construct a dwelling house on the land, and that he did, in pursuance of this understanding, between May 20, 1896, and September 23, 1896, advance sums aggregating $876.50, the cost of said house. If all money paid by Beeler was paid on the written contract, none of this $876.50 or any interest thereon has ever been paid. Plaintiffs claimed that this should be taken into consideration in determining the amount due and payable before a deed can be required, and that they were entitled to foreclose Beeler's rights in the land under the agreement, in the event of his failure to pay the same. They further claimed that the amounts paid by Beeler were paid, not only on account of the purchase price of the land under the written contract, but also on account of the amount advanced for the construction of the house, and that consequently more than $270.10 remains due on the written contract. In support of their claims, they alleged in the complaint, after alleging the written contract, first, that on or about May 1, 1896, the deceased and Beeler mutually agreed to terminate and rescind said written contract, and that the same was rescinded at that time; and, second, that on said day deceased and Beeler entered into an oral agreement whereby deceased agreed to sell the land to Beeler for $1,050, giving him credit for all amounts paid on the written agreement, to advance the money necessary to construct a dwelling house thereon, and to convey the premises by deed upon the payment by Beeler of the whole amount, purchase price and advances, with interest on deferred payments at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, in monthly installments of at least $30. They further alleged that all subsequent payments made by Beeler were made on account of both the purchase price and the amount advanced for the house. These allegations were all explicitly denied by the answer, and explicitly found against by the trial court, which adopted the theory that the loaning of the money for the house was in no way connected with the matter of the written agreement, and that the money was loaned upon the express understanding that thereafter deceased would suggest to defendant some form of security therefor which would be agreeable to him, and defendant agreed to give such security as deceased should thereafter require. Deceased died October 10, 1896, and nothing was ever done in the matter of furnishing security. The court gave judgment, as asked in the cross-complaint, declaring Beeler to be the owner of the land, subject only to a lien in favor of plaintiffs for the amount remaining due on the written contract, $270.10.

As before stated, this is an appeal only from the order denying plaintiffs' motion for a new trial; no appeal from the judgment having been taken. The record is such that we are limited to a consideration of the question of the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings of fact of the trial court upon the matters already specially referred to, viz., the alleged rescission of the written contract, the alleged making of the new oral contract, and the question as to whether the moneys paid by Beeler were paid on account both of purchase price of land and loan for house, or on such purchase price only. Unless it can be held that the evidence is legally insufficient to support one or more of the findings as to these matters, the order of the trial court must be affirmed. A careful consideration of the evidence shown by the record has satisfied us that it cannot be so held. The well-established rule that, where there is a substantial conflict of evidence upon any proposition, this court will not interfere with the finding of the trial court thereon, is, of course, not disputed by counsel for plaintiffs. His claim is that there is no such conflict, but there plainly is such a conflict as to all the matters embraced within the particular findings under consideration. The evidence introduced by plaintiffs as to conversations between deceased and Beeler was so far as it tended to show any attempted rescission or change in the written contract, or any attempted oral agreement relative to the subject-matter or terms thereof, opposed to the positive and unqualified testimony given by Beeler, as was also the evidence on behalf of plaintiffs tending to show admissions made by Beeler. There was nothing in the admitted facts of the case, or in the evidence given by Beeler when considered in connection with the admitted facts, that is necessarily inconsistent with the theory of defendant that the money for the construction of the house was loaned to Beeler by deceased with no understanding between the parties other than that it was a loan which was to be repaid, with interest, that by reason of having a house on the land Beeler would increase the amount of monthly payments on his contract, and that some written instrument, the terms of which were not discussed, should be at some future time prepared by deceased and executed by the parties, which would constitute an agreement furnishing adequate security to the deceased. Such a transaction could not, of course, be held to constitute a rescission or termination of the existing written contract for the sale of the land, or the making of the oral agreement alleged in the complaint. Upon the question as to the application of the payments made by Beeler, the evidence given by Beeler himself is legally sufficient to support a conclusion that he directed each payment, at the time of making it, to be applied on the amount due on the written contract. Civ. Code, § 1479, subd. 1. The specific findings attacked on the motion for a new trial must be held to be sufficiently supported by evidence.

The order denying the motion for a new trial is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. HELM. (Cr. 1,398.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 10, 1907.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW—APPEAL—REVIEW — PREJUDICIAL ERROR — OVERRULING CHALLENGE TO JUROR.

The erroneous overruling of a good challenge for cause, thereby compelling accused to use a peremptory challenge, is prejudicial, where accused was afterwards obliged to accept an objectionable juror because his peremptory challenges had been exhausted, and this, though no challenges for cause were imposed to any jurors called after the exhaustion of such peremptory challenges.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 15, Criminal Law, § 3117.]

2. JURY—PEREMPTORY CHALLENGES.

The right to challenge peremptorily is absolute, and may be exercised on the mere whim or caprice of accused.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 31, Jury, §§ 599-606.]

3. SAME—BIAS—OPINION.

Pen. Code, § 1076, declaring that no juror shall be disqualified for having formed an opinion founded on public rumor, statements in public journals, or common notoriety, provided it appears that he can act impartially, though changing the common-law rule does not obviate the necessity that jurors must still be indifferent and unbiased; and hence if it does not appear affirmatively that the juror's opinion is based entirely on one of the three sources of information specified, or if it is shown that his belief originated from any other source, he is incompetent.

4. SAME—EXAMINATION.

Pen. Code, § 1076, declares that a juror shall not be disqualified because he has formed or expressed an opinion on a matter to be submitted to him for consideration if his opinion was formed on public rumor, statements in public journals, or on common notoriety alone, provided he can and will act impartially according to the law in determining the question submitted. Held, that the fact that jurors answered that their opinions were founded on common notoriety or statements in the public journals, etc., did not qualify them, where it appeared that they were biased, and that their opinions were not entirely so formed.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 31, Jury, §§ 448-457.]

5. SAME—SCOPE.

Where a juror stated on his voir dire that he had an opinion touching the guilt or innocence of accused of another murder, the defense was entitled to ask him whether, believing defendant guilty of such other homicide, he had not formed an adverse opinion toward him in the case at bar, and whether he believed the defendant in this case guilty of the prior homicide.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 31, Jury, §§ 438-448.]

6. CRIMINAL LAW — APPEAL — ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE—PREJUDICE.

In a prosecution for homicide, accused was not prejudiced by the introduction of a conversation between witness and deceased on the day of the murder, in which deceased told witness that he was unwell, and was going to see a doctor, defendant claiming that such evidence showed that defendant had no knowledge of deceased's plans, and could not, therefore, have prearranged a plot to kill him.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 15, Criminal Law, §§ 8137-3143.]

7. SAME—EVIDENCE—OPINION.

It being contended in a prosecution for murder that defendant and his brother rode bicycles to the scene of the homicide, a witness who had measured the bicycle tracks, but had lost the memorandum of the measurements, was properly permitted to give his opinion as to the width of the tracks, under the rule permitting nonexpert evidence of opinion on questions of identity, size, weight, color, quantity, distance, and time.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 14, Criminal Law, §§ 1048, 1049, 1051.]

8. SAME — MISCONDUCT OF PROSECUTING ATTORNEY—ARGUMENT.

Where, in a prosecution for homicide, there was no proof touching a prior murder of which defendant had been accused, the fact that many of the jurors on their voir dire were interrogated as to their knowledge of such previous murder and defendant's connection therewith, etc., did not justify the district attorney in referring to such murder, and to the connection of defendant and his brother therewith.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 14, Criminal Law, §§ 1603, 1609.]

9. HOLIDAYS—INFORMATION—FILING.

Code Civ. Proc. § 73, declares that the superior court shall be always open, legal holidays and nonjudicial days excepted. Section 134 provides that no court shall be open nor shall any judicial business be transacted on a holiday, save for the purposes enumerated, and section 13 declares that whenever an act of a secular nature is appointed by law or contract to be performed on a particular day, which falls on a holiday, such act may be performed on the succeeding day. Held that, the presentation of an information by the district attorney for filing, its reception and the placing of a file mark thereon by the clerk of the court, being ministerial acts, they might be performed on a holiday.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 25, Holidays, §§ 2-5.]

10. CRIMINAL LAW—INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICABILITY TO EVIDENCE.

Where the state claimed, and there was evidence to indicate, that larceny was defendant's motive in killing deceased an instruction that it was not claimed that the homicide charged was committed in the perpetration or attempt to perpetrate another felony, was erroneous as inapplicable to the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 14, Criminal Law, §§ 1980, 1981.]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; George E. Church, Judge.

William Helm was convicted of murder, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Everets & Ewing, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen. (George W. Jones, of counsel), for the People.

HENSHAW, J. Defendant was informed against by the district attorney of the county of Fresno for the crime of murder, was tried, and found guilty of murder in the first degree. He moved for a new trial and in arrest of judgment. His motions were denied, and the judgment was pronounced imposing the death penalty. From the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial, he prosecutes this appeal.

The defendant was accused of murdering a farmer and his wife who were camped by a roadside in the county of Fresno, shooting them both with a shotgun. The apparent motive of the crime was larceny. The evidence was circumstantial in its nature. Public feeling was much aroused by other crimes of violence which had been committed, and by another murder, that of a man named Jackson. Of the commission of these crimes this defendant was also suspected. The community, as was natural, was much exercised, and there was great prejudice against the defendant. It became a matter of difficulty, therefore, to secure upon the trial the fair and impartial jury to which every defendant is entitled. Some 59 jurors called to the box were excused upon challenge for actual bias. Defendant's challenge to others upon the same ground was denied, and his counsel was obliged to interpose peremptory challenges to them. Defendant's peremptory challenges were thus exhausted when only eight members of the jury had been obtained. Three of the last four were accepted by defendant without challenge for cause. The fourth was challenged for cause, and the challenge overruled. While it is true that the erroneous overruling of a good challenge for cause, thereby compelling the use of a peremptory challenge, is not prejudicial error where it is not made to appear that the challenger was obliged afterward to accept an objectionable juror, without power to use a peremptory challenge upon him, it is equally true that where such a condition is shown to result, as here, the error at once becomes prejudicial if the defendant has been obliged to exhaust his peremptory challenges in relieving himself from jurors who should have been excused by the court under challenge for cause, and the rulings of the court upon such jurors becomes a most important matter of review. It makes no difference in this respect that no challenges for cause were interposed by defendant to any jurors called to the box after the exhaustion of his peremptory challenges had been forced by the improper rulings of the court upon his challenges for cause. It may often happen that a juror most obnoxious to a defendant may successfully pass examination upon his voir dire. That examination may disclose no ground for the interposition of a challenge for cause. Yet there may be some reason known to the defendant which would make it most prejudicial to him that the juror should be retained. Even more, the right to exercise peremptory challenges is absolute. Such a challenge may be exercised upon the mere whim or caprice of defendant. So that again we say that any rulings of a court which compel a defendant to exhaust his peremptory challenges and force him to accept jurors after his challenges have been so exhausted becomes the proper subject of review.

The modification of the common-law rule which has been worked by section 1076 of the Penal Code has often been the subject of consideration. The common-law rule which demanded the strictest impartiality upon the part of each individual juror, which declared that one and all should, as between the crown and the defendant, "stand indifferent as they stand unsworn," has, by the section before adverted to, been subjected to an exceedingly narrow change. Jurors must still be indifferent and unbiased. Where, however, a juror has formed or expressed an opinion upon the matter to be submitted to him for consideration, and that opinion it is established was formed upon public rumor, statements in public journals or common notoriety alone, such a man is not necessarily disqualified, provided that it is made to appear to the court, upon his declaration under oath or otherwise, that he can and will, notwithstanding such opinion, act impartially and fairly in deciding the question to be submitted to him. It will be noted, therefore, that the right to unbiased and unprejudiced jurors is still an inseparable right to the trial by jury guaranteed by our Constitution. Lombardi v. Cal. St. R. R., 124 Cal. 317, 57 Pac. 66. It is for the trial court in the first instance to determine, and it must be affirmatively made to appear, when a juror is shown to have an opinion, that that opinion is founded upon public rumor, common notoriety, or statements in the public journals; and it must further be made to appear to the satisfaction in the first instance of the trial court that such opinion can and will be absolutely laid aside by the juror and that so laying it aside he can and will act with strict fairness and impartiality. If it is not made to appear that the juror's opinion is based entirely upon one or all of the three sources of information above named, if it is shown that his belief has its origin in any other source than one of the three enumerated, he is at once as thoroughly disqualified under our Code as he would have been at common law. This proposition is here emphasized because of its exceeding importance and consequence to a defendant. Thus in People v. Miller, 125 Cal. 44, 57 Pac. 770, a challenge was interposed upon the ground of actual bias. The juryman stated that he had read newspaper accounts of the killing. He had heard the matter discussed by persons, but did not know whether such persons assumed to know the facts or not. From what he had heard and read he had formed an opinion rather unfavorable to the defendant; that is, if what he had heard and read was true. He did not know who the witnesses were. It would take a little evidence to remove the opinion he had. The only impression he had about the case was a sort of impressionable opinion formed from others. If sworn as a juryman, he would try to lay aside his opinion entirely and act solely upon the evidence. He would regard the statements he had heard as of little weight. He had some idea that they might be mistaken. He would take the instructions of the court as to the law. This court held that the challenge for actual bias which was disallowed should have been allowed, and said: "Under the Penal Code of this state a single exception is found to the common-law rule, and that exception is declared in section 1076. This juror was clearly disqualified, unless he came within the provisions of the aforesaid section. The exception found in the law covers the single case where the opinion of the juror is founded upon public rumor, statements in public journals or common notoriety, and it further appears to the court from the declarations of the party under oath that he could and will, notwithstanding his opinion, act impartially and fairly upon the matters submitted to him. The court is not allowed to hold that a juror is qualified when he is impressed with an opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the defendant, unless that opinion is based alone upon one or more of the cases enumerated in the aforesaid section of the Code. * * * As far as this record discloses, any one of the parties with whom the juror conversed as to the circumstances of the killing may have been an eyewitness to the tragedy and an important witness at the trial. The record must show affirmatively a contrary state of facts to this, or the exception of section 1076 to the common-law rule cannot be invoked. There is nothing in the evidence which would justify the conclusion that the opinion of the juror was founded alone upon public rumors, statements in the public journals, or common notoriety." So, also, in People v. Wells, 100 Cal. 227, 34 Pac. 718, this court said: "Omitting from the statement of the juror that these things came to him from parties directly interested in the case, and allowing the examination to rest upon the sole fact that the juror entered the box with an opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the accused, that fact is of itself a disqualification, even though the juror should declare to the court under oath that, notwithstanding his opinion, he would and could act fairly and impartially upon the matters submitted to him. The juror would not only be disqualified at common law, but disqualified under the Penal Code, for he has not brought himself within the provisions of section 1076; as those provisions require an affirmative showing to the court that his opinion is based upon public rumor, common notoriety, or statements in public journals. Such a showing is not made in this case."

It is thus the established law that it must be affirmatively shown that the opinion which the juror holds was based upon one or all of the matters enumerated in section 1076, or he is disqualified. Again, in People v. Wiel, 40 Cal. 268, a juror on voir dire stated that he had a fixed and settled opinion regarding the guilt or innocence of the defendant. He believed what he heard, and it would require evidence to remove the opinion now existing in his mind. He further stated on cross-examination that his opinion was not an unqualified one; that he could try the case and render a verdict according to the evidence, notwithstanding any opinion previously formed in regard to the case. The challenge was denied. This court said: "The ruling in disallowing the defendant's challenge to the proposed juror * * * was clearly erroneous. The statement of the juror on his examination in chief clearly shows that he had formed an unqualified opinion and belief as to the guilt or innocence of the defendant, notwithstanding his subsequent statement on cross-examination." "And," proceeds the court, "It appears from the above recital of facts from the record that defendant was driven to a peremptory challenge to relieve himself from this, to him, obnoxious juror, and this contributed to swell the number of peremptory challenges exercised by him to the full extent allowed by law before the panel was full, and before the last man required to complete the jury was called to the box for examination as to qualifications, so that the defendant could not exercise a peremptory challenge upon this last juror, however obnoxious to him he may have been. Thus it plainly appears that the direct result of the disallowance by the court of defendant's challenge for cause was to contract the number of peremptory challenges to which he was entitled, and that such an error may have been seriously prejudicial to the defendant." In People v. Suesser, 132 Cal. 632, 64 Pac. 1095, this court said: "No more now than formerly is the defendant compelled to submit his case to a juror who has such an opinion of his guilt as will require evidence to remove, and thus unjustly add to the burden of his defense. * * * Most of the 20 peremptory challenges allowed the defendant were exercised upon proposed jurors who stated upon voir dire that, if sworn as jurors, they would take their seats in the box with a strong opinion against the defendant which it would require evidence to remove. Some said strong evidence. Where such a state of things exists the defendant cannot have a fair and impartial trial."

These lengthy quotations have been made, not alone because they announce the well-settled law in this state, but because they are peculiarly apposite to the evidence touching the examination of jurors presented on this appeal. The juror Seklemin testified on voir dire that he had read about the case and talked with people a little about it, but with no one who claimed to know anything about the facts. He had heard other people discuss it in his presence. He had formed an opinion in reference to the case, and he had that opinion at the time he was being examined, and it would take evidence to remove it. The opinion went directly to the guilt or innocence of the defendant, and, if selected as a juror, it would require evidence to remove it before he could be perfectly free with reference to the trial of the case. This opinion was of such a nature that it would require less evidence or evidence of less positive nature to produce a conviction in his mind than it would if he had never heard of the case. This juror was challenged for cause, and upon redirect examination and re-cross-examination he was asked whether he could "listen to the testimony from the mouths of the witnesses here and obey the rules that you will hear the judge tell you in the end. Can you do that?" and the witness answered "I think I can, and I will; yes." Further he testifies that he thinks he could give the defendant a fair and impartial trial. He thinks he could set aside the opinion that he has, though that opinion is one that would require evidence to remove. "It certainly would at this time, in my present frame of mind, require evidence to remove that opinion from me. I could set that opinion aside very easy, but not until I had heard some evidence on the part of the defendant. That is a positive fact. These statements that I have heard spoken by people I do not know whether they are true or false. I never heard them denied. Have no reason now to think they were untrue, and I would continue with that idea in view until the defendant placed some evidence before me to the contrary." Again interrogated by the district attorney as to whether he could not and would not set aside this opinion and obey the instructions of the judge, he answers: "I think I can; yes." To the next appeal of the district attorney, "Won't you do that if the judge tells you that it is the law?" he answers, "I think I can set aside my present opinion. I will obey the instructions of the court, but I have a certain opinion. I think I can set that opinion aside." The final question is then asked: "Your conscientious opinion now is that you can and will do it, is that right? A. Yes." The court then interrogates the juror: "Q. And you can do that and will do it? A. I think I can and I will. Q. You say you think you can. Do you know that you can? A. I know that I can." The challenge was denied. E. R. Winters testified that he discussed the case with his neighbors; read it in the papers. The people with whom he talked made statements in a general way about the case. They were people in whom he had confidence and had no reason to disbelieve them, and accepted their statements as true. From these statements and from what he had heard and read generally he had formed an opinion touching the guilt or innocence of the defendant, and he had that opinion still. "It is a fixed and settled opinion, at least to the extent that it would require some evidence to remove it. If selected as a juror, I would possibly require the prosecution to convince me beyond a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the defendant. In my present state of mind it would not require as much evidence to convince me of the guilt of this defendant in this case as it would where I had never heard anything about the facts and circumstances. It might require more evidence on the part of the defense to prove the young man innocent than it would in a case I had never heard anything about. Feeling as I do, and taking everything into consideration, what I have heard and read, and the opinion I have I do not see why I could not fairly and impartially try the case at this time. From these things I have formed an opinion in a certain way, and that opinion would require evidence to remove it. The mere direction or request on my part on my mind to lay aside that opinion would not be sufficient. I certainly would have to have evidence to lay aside that opinion that I now have." Further, he testifies that the opinion is formed solely upon statements in the newspapers and public rumors. It is not an unqualified opinion. That he is in a state of mind which would not prevent him from acting with entire impartiality. The challenge for cause interposed by the defense being denied by the prosecution, the juror further testifies: "By an unqualified opinion, I mean that I have not such an opinion, if there was sufficient evidence, that it could not be changed. I could change that opinion if there was evidence, but it would require, in my present frame of mind, evidence to change that opinion. Q. You read of the fact that the defendant had been accused of several different murders. A. Yes, sir. I don't know as that would tend to prejudice me against the defendant. It would take evidence to remove my opinion now. The opinion is based upon whether or not those things that I heard and read are true or not." Upon this juror the defendant was required to exercise a peremptory challenge. E. Neeley testified that he had read some of the accounts of the preliminary examination of the defendant, and never discussed the case, only just passing remarks with his neighbors. He had formed an opinion. "The opinion is one that, until evidence is introduced to remove it, I will take with me into the jury box. I would have to have evidence on the part of the defense to change my mind. If the evidence brought out here in this case is different from what I have read that came out at the preliminary examination, then I have no opinion. I don't believe I could act just as fairly and impartially in this case if selected as a juror as I could in a case that I have never heard anything about. The little impression that I have would bob up until all the evidence was in. I think that opinion or impression that I have would crop up in my consideration of the case. I don't know that I could handle this case as a juror with the same degree of fairness and impartiality that I could in a case that I knew nothing about. I think that is the way I feel." This juror was challenged, and upon examination by the district attorney he testified that his impression would go into the jury box with him; that he did not think it would prevent him from obeying the instructions of the court, and he did not think it would prevent him from acting with entire impartiality. If taken as a juror, he would give his verdict according to the evidence and the instructions of the court. He would have to do it. He would do it to the best of his ability. Defendant's challenge for cause was disallowed. George Wells read of the case in the newspapers and talked it over with people. He did not know whether the people he talked with knew the facts or not. The people with whom he talked were people in whom he had confidence. He never heard any statements to the contrary from what he heard from them. He did not know whether they were witnesses in the case or not. From what he had heard he had formed an opinion with reference to the guilt or innocence of the defendant. The opinion was based on what he heard and read. "Do not know whether or not the things I have heard were from people who were witnesses or not. It would require evidence upon the part of the defendant to change my opinion. I could disregard the opinion if I heard different evidence. It is not such an opinion that it would influence me in the rendition of my verdict." He thinks that he feels that he could meet the qualifications of a juror. If he heard the same evidence he would have the same opinion. It is an opinion such that it would require less evidence to convict the defendant than if he had never heard of the case. To that extent it would influence his mind as to the rendition of a verdict until the opinion was changed. The opinion is adverse to the defendant, and based not only upon what he had read, but upon the statements of people with whom he talked. The people were not witnesses that he knew of. Does not know whether they are or not. He could absolutely discard from his mind any opinion and listen to the evidence and nothing else, and upon that alone, under the instructions of the court, render his verdict, and would not be influenced by the opinion that he then had; but still that opinion is so strong that it would require evidence to remove it from his mind. It is a fixed and settled opinion until it is changed. It is not absolutely changeless. Upon examination by the district attorney, in answer to the question "Well, now, this is based upon newspaper reports and public rumor, is it not?" he said, "Yes. Q. Solely based on that? A. Yes." The challenge was denied, and the juror peremptorily excused by the defense. N. N. Norton upon voir dire testified that he had read pretty much all about the case, and conversed in regard to it with his neighbors. He did not know whether the people he talked with knew anything about the facts in the case or not. "I do not think they knew any more than I read in the papers, but I don't know." Had an opinion in reference to the guilt or innocence of the defendant. He thought that opinion would go with him into the jury box. It was unfavorable to the defendant, and it would take evidence on the part of the defendant to remove it. Was pretty sure that, unless some affirmative evidence was introduced to change his mind with reference to the matter, the opinion would influence him in the rendition of the verdict. On cross-examination he testifies that the opinion formed in his mind is from newspaper reports alone. Asked if he would obey the instructions of the court and regard only the evidence introduced, he answers that he would try to do that. Asked whether he would find anybody guilty of a crime on newspaper report, says he does not think he would. He does not think he would allow an unsworn newspaper report to influence his mind against testimony sworn to in court. Finally, asked by the court if he could fairly and impartially try the case and make up his verdict solely from the evidence and from the instructions, he answers, "I think so." The challenge to this juror was disallowed, and the defendant exercised a peremptory challenge upon him. John Cobbe had read and heard of the crime with which the defendant was charged, and attended the preliminary examination of this defendant charged with the murder of Mr. Jackson. He had discussed the case, and heard it discussed. He did not know whether the people with whom he talked were witnesses in this case or not. He does not think he talked with any one who was a witness. He does not know that they were. "Do not think I have talked with any of the officers in the case." He had formed an opinion as to the guilt of the defendant. He recalled portions of what he heard and statements made in reference to the case. He heard people make statements in reference to this defendant being seen on the White's Bridge road on the afternoon the crime was committed. (Witnesses in the case did testify to seeing the defendant on the White's Bridge road on the afternoon of the day when the crime was committed.) Further, he testifies that the opinion could be removed by the same kind of evidence that it was formed with; that it was from public rumors. He rather thought he could try the case fairly and impartially; rather thought he could act with the same degree of fairness if selected as a juror as he could in a case where he had never read or heard anything about it. He would require just as much evidence on the part of the prosecution in this case as if he had never formed an opinion or impression. Further, he testifies that feeling as he does now it would require evidence of some kind or character to remove from his mind the opinion that he has touching the guilt of the defendant. Challenged, he testified that the opinion is made up of public opinion and newspaper reports. He thinks he could give the defendant the presumption of innocence. He thinks he could wholly discard the impression which he has, not act upon it and not take it into consideration; but until he does receive some evidence, something of some kind, he would have this opinion, and it would require evidence—sworn or unsworn evidence—something to remove it from his mind. The challenge for cause to this juror was disallowed and a peremptory challenge exercised upon him. J. J. Wash, examined after the defendant had exercised all of his peremptory challenges, had read of the case, heard it discussed and discussed it with others. He had an opinion and believed that it would require evidence on the part of the defense to remove the opinion. It was adverse to the defendant. If the evidence was strong enough, he could lay aside the opinion. The opinion was created from rumors and newspaper reports. "I could lay aside the opinion, provided there was sufficient evidence produced to convince me that it was a mistake I am laboring under. Until that evidence was introduced I would have the opinion, but not necessarily a fixed or settled opinion. It would require evidence on the part of the defendant to remove the opinion, but until it was removed by evidence it would influence me to the extent of requiring evidence to remove it." Challenge for cause interposed by the defense being denied, the juror further testified that, if sworn as a juror, he could and would depend upon the testimony as he heard it from the lips of the witnesses and the instructions of the court.

With these extracts from the examination of the jurors before us, we think little need of comment is required. The jurors were doubtless conscientious in their answers, but as to some it certainly cannot be said that they gave evidence of the impartiality of mind which alone would qualify them. In other instances, while in answer to leading questions from the district attorney they stated that their opinions were founded upon common notoriety or the public journals, it is made equally apparent that their opinions were not so founded. One had attended the preliminary examination of the defendant, which preliminary examination he thinks was for the murder of Jackson. He talked with a man who saw the defendant at White's Bridge on the afternoon of the homicide. Witnesses did testify to seeing this defendant at White's Bridge at that time. Other jurors testified that they did not know whether or not the persons with whom they talked were witnesses or purported to know the facts. In each and all of these cases there is a failure to establish affirmatively that the opinion of the juror was based wholly upon public rumor or statements in the public journals or common notoriety. It is not sufficient to qualify a juror that he should be led to say that his opinion is based upon common rumor, when from his own lips the evidence discloses that it is not so founded. As to some of the jurors, it is apparent that they were biased within the meaning of the Code. As to others it is not made apparent that their opinions were founded exclusively upon matters enumerated in section 1076 of the Penal Code. "In criminal cases," says Judge Cooley (Holt v. People, 13 Mich. 224), "wherein, after full examination, the testimony given upon the challenge leaves a reasonable doubt of the impartiality of the juror the defendant should be given the benefit of the doubt."

In contemplation of the new trial which must necessarily result from the foregoing views, certain questions which must arise upon such new trial demand consideration. A juror upon voir dire had stated that he held an opinion touching the guilt or innocence of the defendant in reference to the Jackson murder case. He was then asked if, believing the defendant guilty in the Jackson Case, he had not formed an adverse opinion toward the defendant in the case at bar. The prosecution objected to this question, and was sustained. The defense then propounded the following question: "Now, Mr. Colburn, you believe the defendant in this case is guilty in the Jackson matter?" To this, likewise, the prosecution's objection was sustained. These questions should have been allowed—not only as tending to throw light upon the juror's condition of mind as to the matter under investigation, but also as legitimate inquiry for the purpose of determining whether a peremptory challenge should be interposed to him.

In the very nature of the workings of the human mind, if the juror did believe the defendant to have been guilty of the Jackson murder, he was more likely to have believed him guilty of the murder here charged, and if, in fact, the juror did believe the defendant guilty of the Jackson murder, the defendant was clearly entitled to know this, to the end that he might peremptorily excuse him from sitting upon the jury. A witness testified that on the day of the murder he met Mr. Hayes (the murdered man) and his wife at White's Bridge. They were going west. He was asked if he had had any conversation with Mr. Hayes, and, answering "Yes," was told to give the conversation. The defense objected. The witness answered: "He said he was going to Fresno. He said he was unwell, and was going to Fresno to see a doctor." It cannot be perceived how this evidence, even if in strictness inadmissible, could have been in the slightest degree injurious to the defendant, while elsewhere in defendant's brief it is contended that this very evidence is of importance and value to defendant, as showing that he could not have had any knowledge of the Hayes' plans, and thus could not have prearranged any plot for the murder. The witness McSwain had taken measurements of the size of certain tracks made by bicycle wheels; it being contended by the prosecution that the defendant and his brother rode bicycles to the scene of the murder. The witness had lost the memorandum of the measurements, and was permitted, over objection, to testify that one of the tracks was about an inch wide, and that the other was somewhat smaller. The rulings of the court were proper. In the absence of the memorandum, the testimony was the best which could be afforded, and the evidence was admissible under the well-settled rule that a person may give his opinion on the question of identity, or his judgment of size, weight, color, quantity, distance, and time, matters of opinion open to all men of ordinary information. Raymond v. Glover, 122 Cal. 475, 55 Pac. 398; Commonwealth v. O'Brien, 184 Mass. 198; 1 Wigmore on Evidence, § 413, 559, 1977; 5 Encyclopaedia of Evidence, p. 476 et seq.

Repeatedly, in the argument before the jury, the district attorney referred to the murder of Jackson, and of this defendant's and his brother's connection with it: "Then all at once they were arrested and both in jail—two charges—Jackson killed, lonely old man out here—unoffending woman and man murdered. * * * He could not have sworn to it if he had not been charged with the Jackson murder. * * * We sought to prove that he had recognized him [defendant] before he was arrested and before the Jackson murder." It is sought to justify these remarks of the district attorney upon the ground that many of the jurors upon voir dire were interrogated as to their knowledge of the Jackson murder and of defendant's connection with it, as to whether or not the fact that the defendant was charged with this murder tended to influence the jurors' opinions in the case at bar, and other like questions. But, while it is apparent that the Jackson murder was a matter of common knowledge and notoriety in the community, and was doubtless in a general way known to every man upon the jury, yet, so far as this record discloses, there was no evidence upon the trial touching the murder, and the references of the district attorney to it, and to defendant's connection with it, were therefore improper.

The information in this case was filed upon the 26th day of May, 1906. This date was one of the holidays declared by the chief executive following the earthquake and fire in the city and county of San Francisco. It is contended by defendant that the information was illegally filed, and is therefore void. Section 73 of the Code of Civil Procedure declares that the superior court shall be always open, legal holidays and nonjudicial days excepted. Section 134 of the same Code declares that no court shall be open nor shall any judicial business be transacted on a holiday, saving for the purposes enumerated. The presentation of an information by the district attorney for filing and the reception of this information and the placing of its file mark thereon by the clerk of the court are all purely ministerial acts. Ex parte Sternes, 82 Cal. 245, 23 Pac. 38; People v. Nogiri, 142 Cal. 593, 76 Pac. 490. The only provision of the law other than those cited bearing upon this question is that contained in section 13 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which declares that, whenever an act of a secular nature is appointed by law or contract to be performed upon a particular day, which day falls upon a holiday, such act may be performed upon the next business day. But this amounts to no more than a legal permission for the postponement of the act, and in no sense prohibits the doing of the act upon the designated day. It follows that it was not error, therefore, to file the information upon a legal holiday.

Coming, finally, to the instructions, as to the one to the effect that there need be no appreciable space of time between the formation of the intent to kill and the act of killing, it is perhaps not necessary to suggest that such instruction should be given in the language indicated by People v. Maughs, 149 Cal. 253, 86 Pac. 187. As has been said, throughout the case of the prosecution it was indicated and argued that larceny was the motive for these murders. The court instructed the jury as follows: "In this case it is not claimed by the prosecution that the homicide charged was committed in the perpetration or attempt to perpetrate another felony." It is manifest that the contention of the prosecution was at variance with this instruction, and, while it may not be perceived that the giving of it was injurious to the defendant, yet certainly under the evidence it had no proper place in the case.

The evidence, while circumstantial, was sufficient to sustain the verdict.

We perceive no other matters calling for consideration; but for the reasons given the judgment and order are reversed and the cause remanded.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; McFARLAND J.; LORIGAN, J.

BONNEAU v. NORTH SHORE R. CO.

(S. F. 4,196.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 2, 1907.
Rehearing Denied Dec. 30, 1907.)

1. CARRIERS—CARRIAGE OF PASSENGERS—PERSONAL INJURIES—CARE REQUIRED OF CARRIER.

A carrier of passengers must exercise the highest degree of care for their safety and transportation, and is liable for any injury sustained by them in the course of transportation through failure to exercise such care.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 9, Carriers, §§ 1085–1106.]

2. SAME—ACTIONS—PRESUMPTIONS.

Proof that an injury to a passenger occurred through some accident happening to the train on which plaintiff was riding in the course of its operation by the carrier raises a presumption of negligence on the part of the carrier in the operation of the train, makes a prima facie case against it, and throws on it the burden of proving that the injury sustained was without negligence on its part.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 9, Carriers, § 1288.]

3. SAME—INSTRUCTIONS—CONSTRUCTION.

In a personal injury action by a passenger, where it appeared that the coach in which plaintiff was riding left the rails, turned over, and was thrown into a creek, it was not error to instruct that the fact that the train overturned is all that plaintiff need establish to recover for injuries sustained, unless his want of care contributed to the overturning or to his injury, and that to rebut this presumption of negligence defendant must show that the overturning was the result of inevitable casualty, or some cause which could not have been prevented by human care and foresight, and in doing this the defendant must necessarily explain how the overturning occurred, and, if it fails to do this, the presumption of negligence remains; for, notwithstanding the latter part of the instruction it merely required the defendant to show that the car overturned without any negligence on its part.

4. SAME—BURDEN OF PROOF.

In a personal injury action by a passenger, an instruction that, in order to recover for such injuries as plaintiff received, it was only necessary to show that he was a passenger of the defendant, and that the car that he was riding in was overturned without his fault, and that, when this was done, the legal presumption arose that the overturning occurred through the negligence of defendant, and the burden of proving that there had been no negligence was cast upon the defendant, did not require the defendant to prove by a preponderance of evidence that it was not negligent, but simply declared that under the circumstances the presumption of negligence would prevail, and entitled plaintiff to recover, unless it was met or overcome by evidence of equal or greater weight, and the instruction was not erroneous.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 9, Carriers, § 1334.]

5. SAME — MISLEADING INSTRUCTIONS — BURDEN OF PROOF.

The instruction could not have misled the jury as to the burden of proof, where the jury was told in eight separate instructions that plaintiff, to recover, must prove negligence of the defendant by a preponderance of the evidence, and in three other places that, if they found the evidence on the question of negligence equally balanced, they should return a verdict for defendant, and, at the request of defendant, the court instructed that the presumption of negligence from the happening of the accident was not conclusive, but might be rebutted by the defendant, and that in rebutting the presumption it was not necessary to overcome it by a preponderance of the evidence, but it was sufficient if enough evidence was introduced to balance the presumption, for in that event it was overcome in the eyes of the law.

6. TRIAL—REFUSAL OF INSTRUCTIONS—EQUIVOCAL INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action by a passenger for injuries received through the overturning of a car, refusal of an instruction that, if the railroad company has shown the exercise of the required degree of care, it is not obliged to go further and explain the cause of the accident, is not error, where the court instructed that the law permits the defendant in answer to any presumption of negligence to show the facts connected with the accident, and if it appears that the company had used proper care the presumption of negligence was overcome, and if at the time of the derailment the train was being operated with proper care, and the roadbed, ties, and rails at such time and place were constructed, etc., with proper care, and from some unforeseen cause, not to be anticipated by defendant in the exercise of the required degree of care, the wheels left the rails, defendant would not be responsible; for the instruction given was a correct statement, and embodied all that was material in the instruction refused.

7. DAMAGES — PERSONAL INJURIES — LOSS OF TIME AND EARNING CAPACITY.

In an action for damages for personal injuries, the value of time lost during the disability resulting from the injuries, and the impairment of capacity for future earnings, are proper elements of damage.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 15, Damages, §§ 237-241.]

8. SAME—EVIDENCE — ADMISSIBILITY — PAST EARNINGS.

In an action for damages for personal injuries, evidence of earnings for the past several years prior to the accident is admissible on the question of damages.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 15, Damages, § 490.]

9. SAME—EXCESSIVE DAMAGES—GROUNDS OF OBJECTION.

A verdict in an action for damages for personal injuries can only be disturbed as excessive when it appears that the award can be sustained on no other theory than that it was the result of passion or prejudice on the part of the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 15, Damages, § 357.]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Marin County; Thos. J. Lennon, Judge.

Action by Thomas S. Bonneau against the North Shore Railroad Company for personal injuries. Judgment for plaintiff. From an order refusing a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Jesse W. Lillienthal and J. W. Cochrane, for appellant. John Flournoy and Thomas P. Boyd, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. This action was brought by plaintiff to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by him on June 21, 1903, through the derailment, overturning, and wrecking of one of defendant's passenger cars in which he was a passenger, occasioned, it is alleged, through the negligence of defendant in operating its train between Tomales and San Anselmo, in Marin county. Plaintiff obtained a verdict and judgment for $7,500, and defendant appeals from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

The points made on appeal relate to certain instructions given and to other certain instructions refused, rulings as to evidence offered, and the sufficiency of the evidence to justify the amount of the verdict. The evidence showed that the train of defendant on which plaintiff was a passenger consisted of an engine, tender, and one passenger coach; that, as the train was passing over a bridge across a small creek near Pt. Reyes, the passenger coach in which plaintiff was riding left the rails, turned over, and was precipitated into the creek, the plaintiff sustaining thereby the injuries for which he sought compensation.

As to the instructions attacked by appellant: The court instructed the jury that "the fact that the train did so overturn is all that he [plaintiff] need establish in order to recover for such injuries as he may have sustained, unless his want of ordinary care contributed to such overturning or to his injury. In order to rebut this presumption of negligence, the defendant must show that the overturning was the result of inevitable casualty or of some cause which human care and foresight could not prevent, for the law holds it responsible for the slightest negligence, and will not hold it blameless, except upon the most satisfactory proofs. In doing this the defendant must necessarily explain how the overturning occurred, and, if it fails to do this, the presumption of negligence remains." There can be no question of the accuracy of the general principle of law contained in this instruction. A carrier of passengers is held to the exercise of the highest degree of care for their safety and transportation, and liable for any injury sustained by them in the course of transportation through failure to exercise such care. And, where an action is brought by a passenger against a carrier to recover for injuries, he makes a prima facie case against the carrier when he shows that his injuries were sustained by some accident happening to the train on which he was riding in the course of its operation by the carrier. Such proof raises a presumption of negligence on the part of the carrier, in the operation of the train, and the burden is then thrown on it to show that the injury sustained by plaintiff was without negligence on its part. This has been the rule in this state for upwards of 40 years, being first announced in Boyce v. California Stage Co., 25 Cal. 468, and since reaffirmed, among other cases, in the recent case of McCurrie v. Southern Pacific Co., 122 Cal. 561, 55 Pac. 324. Counsel for appellant, however, criticise the last portion of the instruction given, in which it is declared to be the duty of the defendant to explain the cause of the overturning of the car, insisting that the defendant was not called on to prove how it overturned—what was in fact the cause of its overturning—but only that it occurred without any negligence on the part of the defendant. But, taking into consideration the entire instruction, it is apparent that the portion criticised only casts on the defendant the duty of showing that fact. The explanation that the defendant is required to make, as the instruction states it, is one which will show that the accident was the result of inevitable casualty, or that it resulted from some cause which care and prudence on the part of the carrier could not have prevented. In other words, that the accident was the result of some cause other than the negligence of the carrier itself. This is the only explanation the instruction calls for, was the only one which was stated and reiterated in the other instructions to the jury given by the court of its own motion and at the instance of the defendant, and was the one to which the evidence on the part of defendant was addressed. The instruction as given was taken from the language of the court in the Boyce Case, and is in the exact language of an instruction given in the case of Mitchell v. Southern Pacific Co., 87 Cal. 62, 25 Pac. 245, 11 L. R. A. 130, and approved by this court as a correct statement of the law.

It is also insisted that the court erred in giving another instruction. It told the jury: "That the plaintiff was a passenger of the defendant, and that the car in which he was riding was derailed or overturned without his fault, is all that the plaintiff need establish in the first instance in order to recover for such injuries as may have been proximately caused him thereby. When the plaintiff has done this, the legal presumption arises that the derailment or overturning of the car occurred through the negligence of the defendant, and the burden of proving that there has been no negligence is cast upon the defendant." Complaint is made that this instruction incorrectly declares the rule as to the burden of proof; the position of the appellant being that, in an action where the only question is as to the negligence of the defendant, the burden of proof is always upon the plaintiff to show by a preponderance of the evidence such negligence; that the burden of proof never shifts, and that it was error to instruct the jury that "the burden of proving that there has been no negligence is cast upon the defendant"; that in effect this was to instruct the jury that the burden was cast upon it to prove by a preponderance of evidence that it was not negligent. But it is quite clear that this instruction had nothing to do with declaring any rule as to the burden of proof in the case; that is, the burden of proving by a preponderance of evidence the negligence of defendant. This is always on the plaintiff, and never shifts. All that is declared by the instruction criticised is that as a presumption of negligence on the part of the carrier arises from proof of the overturning of the car in which plaintiff was riding, which, in the absence of any evidence on the part of defendant meeting it, would entitle the plaintiff to recover, it is incumbent on the defendant, if it would avoid the effect of the presumption, to produce evidence of equal or greater weight to meet or overcome it, or it will prevail. That there was no error in the giving of the instruction complained of, and that the construction placed upon it by appellant is unwarranted, is so clearly established by the authorities in this state that further general discussion of the proposition would be unprofitable. In the recent case of Cody v. Market St. Ry. Co., 148 Cal. 90, 82 Pac. 666, the following instruction given by the trial court was presented for review: "Hence, when it is shown that the injury to the passenger was caused by the act of the carrier in operating the instrumentalities employed in his business, there is a presumption of negligence which throws upon the carrier the burden of showing that the injury was sustained without any negligence on his part." It will be observed that there is no essential difference between the instruction immediately quoted and the one involved at bar. There is a difference in phraseology only. In the Cody Case, discussing the objection urged against the instruction there presented, this court said: "It is claimed that the court erred in giving this instruction. It is suggested that the effect of this instruction was to make it incumbent on defendant to overcome the showing of plaintiff by a preponderance of evidence, whereas, under the universally recognized rule, no verdict could be rendered for plaintiff in the absence of a preponderance of evidence showing negligence on the part of defendant. That this contention is not well founded is shown by the opinion of this court in several cases where the question has been discussed. Such an instruction simply informs the jury that, when the facts stated therein are shown, a presumption of negligence on the part of the carrier arises, which is sufficient to make out a prima facie case for the plaintiff, and requires the defendant to meet the case thus made, or, in other words, to answer the prima facie case, or it will prevail. But it does not require a defendant to show want of negligence by a preponderance of evidence. It does no more than to require him to make such showing as to want of negligence as will leave the jury, with all the evidence before it, unsatisfied as to whether there was negligence on defendant's part, and if, on the whole case, the scale does not preponderate in favor of the presumption of negligence, and against the defendant's proof, plaintiff is not entitled to a verdict, for he has not established his case by a preponderance of evidence, as he was compelled to do under the well-settled rule. The term 'burden' or 'burden of proof' is frequently used to signify simply the burden of meeting a prima facie case, rather than the burden of producing a preponderance of evidence, and as used in the instruction in question imported nothing more." The distinction pointed out is equally shown in previous decisions (Scott v. Wood, 81 Cal. 389, 400, 22 Pac. 871; Kahn v. Trlest, etc., Co., 139 Cal. 340, 344, 73 Pac. 164; Patterson v. S. F. & S. M. Ry. Co., 147 Cal. 178, 183, 81 Pac. 531; Valente v. Sierra Ry. Co. [Cal.] 91 Pac. 481), which are conclusive against the objection to the validity of the instruction urged by appellant.

Neither, when we examine the entire charge of the court, is there any room for reasonable contention that the jury could have understood the instruction in question to mean anything more than that the defendant was required to meet by evidence the presumption of negligence arising from the derailment and overturning of the car, or that it should prevail and warrant a verdict for the plaintiff. In eight separate instructions the jury was told by the trial court that the plaintiff, in order to recover, must prove negligence on the part of the defendant by a preponderance of the evidence. They were also told three several times in the instructions that, if they found that the evidence in the case on the question of negligence was equally balanced, they should return a verdict for defendant, and, at the request of the defendant, the court instructed the jury that the presumption of negligence arising from the happening of the accident was not a conclusive presumption, but might be rebutted by the defendant; that in rebutting the presumption it was not necessary for the defendant to overcome it by a preponderance of evidence; that it was sufficient if it introduced enough evidence simply to balance the presumption, for in that event the presumption was overcome in the eye of the law. With these instructions before them there could be no misconstruction by the jury of the instruction we have been considering.

It is next claimed that the court erred in refusing to give the following instruction tendered by defendant: "If the railroad company has shown the exercise of the required degree of care, it is not obliged to go further and explain the cause of the accident." All that was pertinent in this instruction was, however, embodied in the instructions given. The jury was told that the law permits the defendant in answer to any presumption of negligence to show the facts connected with the accident, and, if it appear from them and on the whole evidence that the company had used proper care, the presumption of negligence was overcome, and that if at the time of such derailment the train was being operated with proper care, and, further, that the roadbed, ties, and rails at such time and place were constructed, laid, and maintained with proper care, and that, from some unforeseen cause, not to be anticipated by the defendant in the exercise of the required degree of care, the wheels left the rail, the railroad company would not be responsible. This was a correct statement of what showing would relieve the defendant from liability, and embraced all that was really material in the instruction refused.

These are the only points made on the instructions.

As to the rulings on the admission of evidence: Plaintiff at the time of the accident was, and for many years prior thereto had been, an insurance solicitor for the New York Life Insurance Company, receiving commissions upon all business secured by him and written by said company. Over the objection of defendant, he was allowed to testify to the commissions earned by him for several years prior to the accident, which during that period varied in amounts from $2,000 to $3,700 per annum. It is insisted that it was error to allow this proof. We think not. As elements entering into the damage which plaintiff was entitled to receive as pecuniary loss were the value of his time for the period during which he was disabled by the injuries and if the injuries impaired his capacity for future earnings, such an amount as would compensate him for loss of such capacity. We know of no better method, and none has been suggested, whereby proof of such pecuniary loss can be presented to the jury than by the testimony of the plaintiff himself as to what his earnings as insurance solicitor were for a number of years and immediately prior to the accident. Naturally the earnings of one following a vocation such as the plaintiff was engaged in as they varied in the past must be uncertain as to the future, but evidence as to what they were in the past must furnish the best basis from which the jury may determine the extent of the pecuniary loss plaintiff has sustained as to either or both of the elements of damage suggested. The authorities sustain the admissibility of such evidence. Ehrgott v. City of New York, 96 N. Y. 264, 48 Am. Rep. 622; Symons v. Metropolitan St. Ry. Co. (Sup.) 58 N. Y. Supp. 227; Missouri, etc., R. R. v. Vance (Tex.) 41 S. W. 167.

As to the other points made by appellant on the rulings as to evidence, we deem them so untenable as to require neither mention nor discussion.

Lastly, it is claimed that the damages are excessive. We can only disturb a verdict in this class of cases for that reason when it appears that the damages are so excessive that the award can be sustained on no other theory than that it was the result of passion or prejudice on the part of the jury. Nothing of the kind appears here. The evidence in the case justified the jury in finding that the plaintiff had been damaged upwards of $2,000 for expenses—medical services, nursing, etc.—incurred by him by reason of the injuries and for loss of time while entirely disabled from pursuing his vocation as insurance solicitor. It appeared, further, that, aside from the pain and suffering he endured incident to his injuries, such injuries were of a permanent character and materially impaired his capacity for future pursuit of his vocation as such solicitor. Under this evidence, it was for the jury to exercise an intelligent discretion in the award of damages, and there is nothing in the amount awarded to indicate that it was the result of other than the exercise of such discretion.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

BUNTING v. HASKELL et al. (S. F. 4,804.)
(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 2, 1907.
Rehearing Denied Dec. 30, 1907.)

1. JUDICIAL SALES—REDEMPTION.

As a general rule, the redemption allowed by statute cannot be effected after the expiration of the statutory period allowed therefor.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 31, Judicial Sales, § 116.]

2. EXECUTION—REDEMPTION—FAILURE TO REDEEM—RELIEF.

Courts of equity may, upon a proper showing of fraud, mistake, or other circumstances appealing to the discretion of the chancellor, relieve judgment debtors whose property has been sold on execution from a failure to redeem within the statutory period.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 21, Execution, § 849.]

3. APPEAL—RIGHT OF REVIEW—WAIVER—ACCEPTANCE OF PAYMENT ON JUDGMENT.

Where plaintiff secures defendants' property on a judgment sale, and thereafter defendants obtain a decree of redemption upon payment of a specified sum within 30 days, plaintiff's acceptance of the sum within the time given would involve a waiver of his right of appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 2, Appeal and Error, §§ 984, 985.]

4. QUIETING TITLE—ADVERSE CLAIM OF TITLE.

Plaintiff secured defendants' property on a judgment sale. More than a year thereafter defendants obtained a decree of redemption upon payment within 30 days of a specified sum and 7 per cent. interest thereon, whereupon plaintiff must convey the property to defendants. The sum was tendered, but plaintiff refused it, and appealed from the decree. The judgment was affirmed, and 30 days afterwards plaintiff demanded the sum, tendering a conveyance of the property. Defendants refused to pay, claiming that, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 703, 704, providing that redemption by the debtor terminates the effect of the sale, and restores the debtor to his estate, and that a tender is equivalent to payment, their tender accomplished the redemption, and that, when it was refused, it was not necessary thereafter to keep it good or pay the amount to plaintiff. Held, in an action to quiet title, that defendants had lost their right of redemption, and that the title vested in plaintiff by the commissioner's deed following the judgment sale, was unaffected by any adverse claim arising from the decree of redemption; the right to redeem given by the decree being not the same right given by statute, and being governed by the conditions in the decree and not those mentioned in the act.

5. JUDICIAL SALES—REDEMPTION.

Civ. Code, § 1504, providing that "an offer of payment * * * stops the running of interest on the obligation, and has the same effect upon all its incidents as a performance thereof," has no application to a tender under a decree allowing judgment debtors to redeem their property within a specified time upon specified conditions, since the decree, being a mere option to redeem, imposed no "obligation" upon them, and neither the title to the land nor its possession was an "incident" to any obligation within the meaning of the section.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court. City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by William L. Bunting against Burnette G. Haskell and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Wm. B. Sharp, for appellants. Edward C. Harrison, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. This is an action to quiet title to real property. The plaintiff recovered judgment, and the defendants appeal on the judgment roll.

On June 1, 1897, Margaret Reese was the owner of the land described in the complaint, subject to a mortgage made by her on February 20, 1892, to one Iburg. Iburg brought action for the foreclosure of this mortgage, recovering judgment under which the property was sold to Bunting, plaintiff herein, on June 1, 1897. After the expiration of 12 months from said sale a deed of the property was executed and delivered to Bunting by the commissioner who had made the sale. Thereafter, on June 28, 1898, Margaret Reese and some of the defendants herein commenced an action against Bunting, the plaintiff herein, in which action the superior court on January 28, 1901, rendered a judgment that the plaintiffs therein and each of them were entitled to redeem the property from said sale within 30 days from the entry of said judgment, upon payment to the defendant therein (the plaintiff herein) of the sum of $819.89. This judgment was entered January 30, 1901, and within 30 days thereafter the plaintiffs in that action tendered to Bunting the amount of money necessary under the terms of the judgment to effect the redemption thereby allowed and provided for, but the said defendant refused to accept the said money. Thereafter the said defendant (plaintiff herein) appealed from the judgment, and deposited with the clerk of the superior court a conveyance of the property to the plaintiffs in said action to abide the judgment of the Supreme Court on said appeal. He also surrendered and delivered the possession of the property to said plaintiffs. The judgment appealed from was affirmed by this court on December 29, 1903 (Benson v. Bunting, 141 Cal. 462, 75 Pac. 59), and the remittitur filed in the superior court on February 26, 1904. After the filing of the remittitur, Bunting made a demand in writing upon the defendants herein (plaintiffs in said action of Benson v. Bunting) for the payment of the money provided by said judgment for said redemption, and at the same time tendered to them a conveyance by him to them of said property. But the defendants refused to pay the money so demanded, or any part thereof, specifying no objection to the tender or demand, excepting to state that said defendants were entitled to 30 days' time from and after such demand wherein to make the payment demanded. This tender and demand were made on the 27th day of April, 1904, and 30 days thereafter, to wit, on the 28th day of May, 1904, the plaintiff herein made a second tender to said defendants of a conveyance of the property, and again demanded of them the payment of said sum fixed by the court as the amount required for redemption, but said defendants refused, and ever since have refused, to pay the said sum of money so demanded or any part thereof. Thereupon the plaintiff brought the present action. The judgment appealed from determines that the plaintiff is the owner in fee simple absolute of the property, and adjudges that his title thereto be quieted as against any and all of the claims of any of the defendants, that said defendants be enjoined from asserting any claim whatever in or to said land adverse to said plaintiff, and that possession of said land be restored to said plaintiff. The contention of the appellants is that their tender to the plaintiff within 30 days after the entry of judgment in Benson v. Bunting of the amount required for redemption was in itself sufficient to accomplish the redemption, and that, when such tender was refused, it was not necessary thereafter to keep it good, or to pay the amount to plaintiff. If we were dealing with the question of a redemption from execution sale, effected by act of the judgment debtor in the manner and within the period fixed by law, this contention would undoubtedly be sound, and that for the simple reason that the statute expressly so provides. Section 703 of the Code of Civil Procedure declares that, "if the debtor redeem, the effect of the sale is terminated and he is restored to his estate." Section 704 declares that "a tender of the money is equivalent to payment." Speaking of a tender in redemption made within the time prescribed by law, this court, in Leet v. Armbruster, 143 Cal. 663, 77 Pac. 653, said that "the tender operated instantaneously to redeem the property and revest the title in the redemptioner."

But was the redemption authorized by the decree in Benson v. Bunting the redemption provided for in sections 702 et seq. of the Code of Civil Procedure? As a general rule, the redemption allowed by statute cannot be effected after the expiration of the statutory period allowed therefor. Tilley v. Bonney, 123 Cal. 118, 123, 55 Pac. 798; Davidson v. Gaston, 16 Minn. 230 (Gil. 202). It is well settled, however, that courts of equity may, upon a proper showing of fraud, mistake or other circumstances appealing to the discretion of the chancellor, relieve judgment debtors whose property has been sold on execution from a failure to redeem within the statutory period. In such cases equity "in its discretion will grant relief on a proper bill, and allow the judgment debtor to redeem after the expiration of the redemption period." 17 Cyc. 1330; Graffam v. Burgess, 117 U. S. 180, 6 Sup. Ct. 686, 29 L. Ed. 839; Branch v. Foust, 130 Ind. 538, 30 N. E. 631; Smith v. Huntton, 134 Ill. 24, 24 N. E. 971, 28 Am. St. Rep. 646. But such redemption, when authorized by the decree of a court of equity, finds its support, not in the provisions of the statute allowing redemption within a given time as a matter of right, but in the provisions of the decree granting to a party the privilege of redeeming upon terms fixed by the court as just. In the case at bar, the decree permitting redemption is described in the complaint, and no issue is made as to the allegations regarding it. Those allegations are that the court adjudged and decreed that certain defendants were entitled to redeem the property within 30 days from the date of entry of said judgment and decree, upon payment to the plaintiff of $819.89, with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum until payment, subject to certain reductions, and that in said decree it was further ordered and adjudged that, if the said defendants should fail to redeem the property within 30 days, the said action might, upon motion of Bunting, the plaintiff herein, be dismissed. The complaint contains further allegations from which it appears that the decree required the plaintiff to make and deliver to the defendants a deed of conveyance of the property in question.

Assuming that a court of equity may, in granting a right to redeem after the expiration of the statutory period, prescribe in its decree that the redemption so allowed shall be accomplished in the manner and subject to the conditions provided for statutory redemption, we think the decree in Benson v. Bunting should not be construed as giving to the plaintiffs in that action a right to a statutory redemption to be exercised within a new period of 30 days. The redemption authorized by the decree differed in several respects from that allowed by the Code. In the first place, the rate of interest to be computed on the amount required for redemption was not that fixed by law. Code Civ. Proc. § 702. Again, the decree provided for a conveyance by the plaintiff, whereas, in case of a redemption under the statute, payment, or even tender, would "ipso facto work a restoration to the judgment debtor, or his successor in interest, of his title." Leet v. Armbruster, supra. But a more substantial reason for holding that the decree in Benson v. Bunting should not be construed as intending to merely extend the statutory right of redemption, which had been lost by lapse of time, is that the decree does not contain any language indicating such intention, and that every consideration of equity demanded of the court that no such relief should be granted. The plaintiffs in Benson v. Bunting came into a court of equity asking to be restored to a right which under the law had passed from them. Such relief could properly be granted them only on condition that they themselves did equity. To give to the decree the construction advanced by appellants would be to hold that they, having come into a court of equity and obtained a decree permitting them to redeem property on payment of a certain sum, might merely by reason of a tender once made hold all the substantial fruits of the decree while repudiating the obligations imposed by it upon them. This is not equity, and the decree in the former suit should not be construed so as to permit such result. It must be remembered that that decree was not final. The plaintiff, Bunting, had the right to appeal from it, and did, in fact, appeal. An acceptance of the tender made by defendants would have involved a waiver of his right of appeal. 2 Cyc. 652; Wolff v. Canadian Pac. Ry., 89 Cal. 332, 338, 26 Pac. 825. If the decree had the effect attributed to it by appellants, they by their tender compelled the plaintiff to waive his right of appeal, under penalty of losing the property, if he should decline to make such waiver and the decree should be affirmed. But he was not bound to waive his right of appeal. If the decree were erroneous, the mere tender of the money did not entitle the plaintiffs in that action to redeem, and, while the right of appeal subsisted, Bunting's title could not be finally divested by a tender which was not accepted and was not kept good. No doubt the appellants (plaintiffs in Benson v. Bunting) had a right to make the tender within 30 days after entry of the decree, and after so doing they could not be put in default until the plaintiff should tender them a deed and demand payment of the amount due. After the judgment had been affirmed, their right to redeem still existed, but it was a right to redeem upon the condition fixed by the decree, which was that the money should be paid by the defendants. This condition they refused to comply with, and, that refusal having persisted after demand for the period of 30 days allowed them, the court below properly concluded that they had lost their right of redemption, and that the title vested in plaintiff by the commissioner's deed was unaffected by any adverse claim arising from the proceedings in Benson v. Bunting.

Appellants rely on section 1504 of the Civil Code, providing that "an offer of payment * * * stops the running of interest on the obligation, and has the same effect upon all its incidents as a performance thereof." We think this section has no application here. As we construe the decree in Benson v. Bunting, it gave to the defendants a mere option to redeem. That option imposed no "obligation" upon them, and neither the title to the land nor its possession was an "incident" to any obligation, within the meaning of this section.

The judgment is affirmed.

KATZ v. FITZGERALD et al. LESSER v. DORNIN. (S. F. 4,747, 4,205.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 2, 1907. Rehearing Denied Dec. 30, 1907.)

1. ELECTIONS — PRIMARY ELECTION LAW — CONSTITUTIONALITY.

The primary election law is not violative of Const. art. 2, § 2½, empowering the Legislature to determine the conditions on which electors may participate in any primary election, in that secrecy in voting is not preserved; that the law arbitrarily classifies voters and discriminates between the classes so made; that it destroys the right of self-preservation of political parties; that it impairs the right of citizens to assemble together and to instruct their representatives; and that it invests state officers with judicial functions.

2. SAME.

Const. art. 2, § 2½, empowers the Legislature to determine the conditions on which electors may participate in primary elections. Held, that the primary election law is not invalid because declaring that political parties shall be, as to their mode of holding conventions and nominating candidates for public office, regarded as public bodies, whose methods are to be controlled by the state.

3. SAME.

Pol. Code, § 1188, relating to nominations of candidates for public offices, and authorizing the clerk or other officer with whom the petition of any independent candidate is filed to strike from the list of names of candidates nominated by petition the names of those who have voted at any primary election, is not unconstitutional as vesting judicial powers in the Secretary of State, clerks, and others officers, since no judicial function is exercised in determining that one who voted at a primary election is the same person whose name is appended to a petition.

4. SAME.

Pol. Code, § 1190, prohibiting one who has voted at a primary election from signing a petition for another candidate, is not unconstitutional as providing an arbitrary classification of voters.

5. SAME.

Const. art. 2, § 2½, empowers the Legislature to determine the conditions on which electors may participate in primary elections, and provides that such conditions may be different from the conditions required at other elections authorized by law. Held, that Pol. Code, § 1361, extending the operation of the primary law to such political parties only as have polled 3 per cent. of the total vote, is not invalid as discriminating between large and small political parties, or as conferring any special privilege on parties which have cast more than 3 per cent. of the vote which is not conferred on all such parties.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; John Ellsworth, Judge.

Proceedings by A. B. Katz against George Fitzgerald and others and by M. Lesser against George W. Dornin. Judgment for defendants in each proceeding, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Lewis & Royce, for appellants. J. E. McElroy, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. These cases both represent attacks upon the constitutionality of the primary election law, and may be considered and disposed of together.

The propositions advanced against the law are: Secrecy in voting is not preserved. The law arbitrarily classifies voters and discriminates between the classes so made. It destroys the right of self-preservation of political parties, and impairs the right of citizens to assemble together and to instruct their representatives, and invests state officers with judicial functions. These objections, for the most part, were advanced and answered in the case of Schostag v. Cator (Cal.) 91 Pac. 502, and Rebetock v. Superior Court, 146 Cal. 308, 80 Pac. 64, decided by this court in bank since the appeals in the present cases were taken and the briefs therein filed. In the Schostag Case it is said that the evils sought to be remedied by the adoption of section 2½ of article 2 of our Constitution were the corrupt practices by which, in the absence of proper public control, primary elections were made to defeat, instead of to express, the will of political parties. It is further pointed out that the state has a general interest in guarding the purity of primary elections, since party elections have become an essential feature of our system of choosing public officers, and at the same time each political party has a special interest in reserving to its own members the control of its own affairs. In none of these respects does it appear that the legislative enactments violate the spirit or intent of section 2½ of article 2 of the Constitution. While primary election laws are now conducted under the law, and, are to that extent, a part of the elective system of the state, it is the secrecy of the ballot which the law protects, and not secrecy as to the political party with which the voter desires to act. The primary law does not prevent him from voting secretly. We cannot perceive where this law exposes any person advocating doctrines distasteful to any section of the community to its enmity any more than such a person would be exposed if he cast his ballot at a primary election held under the direction of the party managers without control of the law. Nor do we perceive that the right of self-preservation of a political party is destroyed. For, in addition to the tests which the Legislature has prescribed, it remains with the managing bodies of the political parties to require additional tests of qualification before a citizen may be allowed to vote the party ticket.

To the objection that it makes a public body of that which is, in its essence, a private association of citizens to accomplish a public purpose, it is sufficient to say that the conception that a political party is merely a private association of citizens, a conception which in the past found wide acceptance, has, under the development of modern political parties, been very generally abandoned, and, where not abandoned, the conception itself has been destroyed, as in this state by force of the Constitution and the statutory laws enacted under it. By virtue of the constitutional provision the state has seen fit to declare that political parties shall be as to their mode of holding conventions and nominating candidates for public office, regarded as public bodies whose methods are to be controlled by the state. Against the constitutionality of sections 1188 and 1190 of the Political Code, it is urged that judicial powers are vested in the Secretary of State, clerks, and other officers, in that they are empowered to strike from the list of names of candidates nominated by petition the names of those who have voted at any primary election. We perceive no force in this objection. Ordinarily the identity of the person will be established by the identity of names, and, even if other facts are required for the establishment of such identity, it will scarcely be said that a judicial function is exercised in the determination that the John Smith, who voted at a primary election, is the same John Smith whose name is appended to a petition.

As little force attaches to the objection that there is an arbitrary classification of voters by the provision prohibiting one who has exercised the right to vote at a primary election from signing a petition for another candidate. If it be said that hardship to the individual voter may result in preventing him from petitioning for the nomination of candidates of his choice, if his party should fail to nominate those whom he desires, his individual grief should be more than assuaged by the fact that he is not compelled to vote at a primary election, and that, if the rule were otherwise, it would open the door to endless frauds, and be destructive to all party organization. It would not alone enable vicious electors to vote at the primary of one or another political party, but would permit them, after doing so, to join in the petition for the nomination of any number of men for any number of offices. The provision is one frequently found in the election laws of the states, and when found has always been upheld. 10 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 635; Phillips v. Curtis, 4 Idaho, 193, 38 Pac. 405; Southall v. Griffiths, 100 Ky. 91, 37 S. W. 577.

As to the objection that there is a discrimination between large and small political parties because of the provisions of section 1361 extending the operation of the primary law only to such political parties as have polled 3 per cent. of the total vote, it must be said that the constitutional amendment in question was framed and adopted after the decisions of this court in Marsh v. Hanly, 111 Cal. 371, 43 Pac. 975, Spier v. Baker, 120 Cal. 370, 52 Pac. 659, 41 L. R. A. 196, and Brittain v. Board of Commissioners, 129 Cal. 341, 61 Pac. 1115, 51 L. R. A. 115, and it was adopted to meet and avoid the very objections to the primary law which this court found were interposed by the Constitution in its then existing form. Under the Constitutional amendment adopted, it must suffice to say that there is no constitutional recognition of any body of men calling themselves a party until 3 per cent. of the vote has been cast by such body. Three per cent. is an exceedingly small percentage. All bodies of men casting less than this percentage are treated alike. Some classification is made necessary, else any two, three, or four men might call themselves a party, and impose the burden of placing the names of their candidates upon the ballot provided by the state law—a condition which could easily be made intolerable to the state, as well as to the voter. Classification becoming necessary, the one here adopted is rational, and does not impose any burden upon one of a class that is not imposed upon all; nor, upon the other hand, does it confer any special privilege upon parties which have cast more than 3 per cent. of the vote, which is not conferred upon all such parties. Ladd v. Holmes, 40 Or. 167, 66 Pac. 714, 91 Am. St. Rep. 457.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgments appealed from are affirmed.

PUCKHABER v. HENRY. (S. F. 4,240.)
(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 2, 1907.
Rehearing Denied Dec. 30, 1907.)

1. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—EFFECT OF BAR—PAYMENT OF DEBT.

A debt is not satisfied or extinguished by mere lapse of time.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 33, Limitation of Actions, § 650.]

2. PLEDGES—RECOVERY OF PLEDGED PROPERTY—CONDITIONS PRECEDENT—PAYMENT.

In the absence of express provision to the contrary, a pledgor cannot recover possession of the pledged property without paying his debt, even though it is barred by the statute of limitations.

3. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—EFFECT—BAR OF DEBT AS AFFECTING SECURITY—STATUTORY PROVISIONS—PLEDGES.

Civ. Code, § 2911, providing that a lien is extinguished by the lapse of the time within which an action could be brought upon the principal obligation, applies both to mortgages and pledges, and was adopted as a part of the original Code to declare the rule previously laid down by the courts, to the effect that, when an action on an indebtedness is barred by the statute of limitations, action on a contract given to secure the debt is also barred, but it was not designed to aid a debtor in the recovery of possession of his property, or in removing any cloud upon his title, without paying his debt, and, while the statute will prevent an affirmative action on the part of a mortgagee or pledgee to enforce his lien after the debt is barred, the fact that a note secured by a policy of life insurance is barred by the statute of limitations does not bar an action on the policy by the pledgee after the death of the insured, if the note has not been paid.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 33, Limitation of Actions, §§ 651-653.]

4. TRIAL—SPECIAL FINDINGS—IMMATERIAL ISSUES—FAILURE TO FIND.

In an action on a life insurance policy, it appeared that the policy had been assigned and delivered to plaintiff to secure a note. The insurance company paid the money into court, and had the administrator of the insured substituted as defendant. The court found that the note had not been paid, but failed to find whether it was barred by the statute of limitations. Held, that the issue was immaterial, since defendant was not entitled to possession of the policy, and the money paid into court should be deemed to be in plaintiff's possession for the purpose of the action.

5. NEW TRIAL—GROUNDS—FAILURE TO FIND ON ISSUES—IMMATERIAL FACTS.

Failure of the court to find on an immaterial issue will not warrant the granting of a new trial.

6. PLEDGES—RIGHTS OF PLEDGEE—STATUTORY PROVISIONS—COLLECTION OF PLEDGED INSURANCE POLICY.

Under Civ. Code, § 3006, providing that a pledgee of an evidence of debt pledged to him may collect it when due, where a life insurance policy was assigned and delivered to plaintiff to secure a note, and the note was never paid, though it became barred by the statute of limitations, plaintiff was entitled to collect the insurance on the death of the insured.

McFarland, Henshaw, and Lorigan, JJ., dissenting.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; M. C. Sloss, Judge.

Action by Charles R. Puckhaber against Kate Henry, administratrix, etc. From an order granting defendant a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

See 81 Pac. 1105.

Mullany, Grant & Cushing and Cushing, Grant & Cushing, for appellant. T. Z. Blake-man and Chickering & Gregory, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an appeal from an order granting defendant's motion for a new trial. The action was originally one against the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York, a corporation, to recover the amount due on a policy of insurance issued by that company to John P. Henry, upon the life of said Henry; the plaintiff alleging that said policy had been assigned to him by Henry on August 22, 1896. Henry died on January 9, 1902, and the action was commenced May 8, 1902. The insurance company, admitting the validity of the policy and alleging that both plaintiff and Kate Henry, administratrix of estate of Henry, claimed the proceeds of said policy, obtained an order substituting said administratrix as defendant, and discharging it from liability to either party upon depositing in court the amount due on the policy, viz., $2,511. This deposit was made. Said administratrix, having been substituted as defendant, filed her answer and so-called cross-complaint. By this pleading, she denied the allegations of the complaint as to assignment of the policy. She also alleged that plaintiff's only claim to the policy or any of the proceeds thereof was that he held the policy as security for the payment of a promissory note made and delivered by Henry to Puckhaber in the year 1896 and payable one day after its date, and "that the obligation evidenced by the said promissory note and all thereof had prior to the death of the said John T. Henry become barred by the provisions of the statute of limitations of the state of California, to wit, by the provisions of section 337 of the Code of Civil Procedure of the state of California." She asked that plaintiff take nothing by his action, and that the money deposited be paid to her. Plaintiff answered this so-called cross-complaint, alleging the execution and delivery by Henry to him on August 22, 1896, of a promissory note for $688.50, together with interest from that date at 8 per cent. per annum, and the assignment and delivery of said policy as security for such payment. He alleged that no part of this note had been paid, and denied that the obligation evidenced by the promissory note or any part thereof had prior to the death of Henry become barred by the statute of limitations, and also alleged that his rights in and to said policy were not barred. The trial court found in accord with these allegations of plaintiff as to the assignment and delivery of the policy as security, and the nonpayment of the amount due or any part thereof. It further found that plaintiff's "cause of action herein" is not barred by any provision of the statute of limitations, but made no finding upon the issue as to the barring by such statute of the obligation evidenced by the promissory note. Judgment was given that plaintiff receive out of the sum deposited in court the amount due on said note, and that defendant receive the balance of such sum. Defendant's motion for a new trial was based upon the grounds, among others, that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the finding that the plaintiff's cause of action was not barred by the statute of limitations, and that the decision was against law, in that the court had failed to find upon the issue as to the obligation evidenced by the promissory note being barred by such statute prior to Henry's death.

The evidence showed without conflict that the obligation evidenced by the said promissory note and all thereof had become barred by the provisions of section 337 of the Code of Civil Procedure prior to the death of Henry. Section 2911 of the Civil Code provides: "A lien is extinguished by the lapse of time within which, under the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure, an action can be brought upon the principal obligation." This section is contained in the article relating to extinction of liens, and by section 2877 of the Civil Code both contracts of mortgage and pledge are expressly made subject to its provisions. In the case of Mutual Life Insurance Co. v. Pacific Fruit Co. et al., 142 Cal. 477, 76 Pac. 67, this court held that, by reason of section 2911, Civ. Code, the pledgee of a life insurance policy situated precisely as is the plaintiff here could not share in the proceeds of the policy. The effect of that decision is that, by reason of this section, a pledgee who has allowed his remedy upon the principal obligation to become barred cannot retain possession of the pledged property. If this decision is to be followed, it necessarily requires an affirmation of the order granting a new trial. This is conceded by counsel for plaintiff; their claim being that the case cited was incorrectly decided and should be overruled.

We are satisfied that this court in that case misconceived the effect of section 2911 of the Civil Code. There can, of course, be no question that under its terms the lien of the pledge is extinguished by the lapse of time within which, under the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure, an action can be brought upon the principal obligation. This is all that is said in the opinion as to the effect of this section, and it is apparently assumed from this that, the lien of the pledge being extinguished, the pledgee can no longer retain possession of the pledged property, even though the debt for which it was given as security has not been paid. It is in attributing this effect to the extinguishment of the lien that we think the decision is erroneous. Section 2911, adopted as a part of the original Code in 1872, was designed simply to declare the rule previously laid down by the decisions of this court, to the effect that, when an action upon the indebtedness is barred by the statute of limitations, action on any contract given by way of security for the debt is also barred. This rule was contrary to the rule existing at common law and in many of our sister states, under which an action might be maintained to foreclose a mortgage not barred by the statute, although the debt for which it was given as security was barred. It was, however, thoroughly established by a line of decisions rendered before the enactment of the Codes, commencing with Lord v. Morris, 18 Cal. 482, in which the matter was exhaustively discussed in an opinion delivered by Chief Justice Field. It clearly appears from the note of the Code commissioners to the original section that this was the reason for the elimination of the word "not" from the section of the New York Code, when such section was otherwise taken as a part of our own Civil Code, the New York section reading "a lien is not extinguished," etc., which was in accord with the rule theretofore established in that state. The effect of the California rule is undoubtedly to prevent any affirmative action on the part of the mortgagee or pledgee to enforce his lien, after the debt is barred by the statute of limitations. In such a case the lien no longer exists. It has been "extinguished." But the section was not designed to prevent the application of the equitable principle which has always been recognized as warranting courts in refusing to aid the debtor in the recovery of possession of his property from the mortgagee in possession or pledgee, or in removing any cloud upon his title created by an instrument in writing given as security, without paying his debt. This is thoroughly established in this state by the decisions in regard to mortgages, to which the section is equally applicable, and between which and pledges of personal property there is no distinction material to the question under discussion. Although the lien of a mortgage is "extinguished" by the barring of the debt by the statute of limitations, the mortgagor of real property cannot, without paying his debt, quiet his title against the mortgagee, or maintain ejectment against his mortgagee in possession. This is firmly settled in this state by decisions rendered since the adoption of the Code sections. Booth v. Hoskins, 75 Cal. 271, 276, 17 Pac. 225; De Cazara v. Orena, 80 Cal. 132, 22 Pac. 74; Spect v. Spect, 88 Cal. 437, 26 Pac. 203, 13 L. R. A. 137, 22 Am. St. Rep. 314; Brandt v. Thompson, 91 Cal. 453, 462, 27 Pac. 703; Hooper v. Young, 140 Cal. 274, 280, 74 Pac. 140, 98 Am. St. Rep. 56; Burns v. Hiatt, 149 Cal. 617, 87 Pac. 196. See, also, Grant v. Burr, 54 Cal. 298. This is in accord with the practically universal rule. A debt is not satisfied or extinguished by mere lapse of time. "The rights which grow out of the relations existing between mortgagor and mortgagee, as well as the remedies for the enforcement and protection of those rights, are of equitable origin, and are to be determined by the principles of equity, whether the right be asserted or the remedy sought in an action at law or in equity. * * * Courts look to the substantial rights of the parties for the purpose of determining the remedy to which they are entitled, irrespective of the form of the complaint under which the remedy is sought. Whenever a mortgagor seeks a remedy against his mortgagee, which appears to the court to be inequitable, * * * the court will deny him the relief he seeks, except upon the condition that he shall do that which is consonant with equity. * * * The statute of limitations is a bar to the remedy only, and does not extinguish, or even impair, the obligation of the debtor. It is available in judicial proceedings only as a defense, and can never be asserted as a cause of action in his behalf, or for conferring upon him a right of action." Spect v. Spect, supra. It is impossible to reconcile these decisions as to the rights of a mortgagor whose debt has not been paid with the decision under discussion, and no attempt has ever been made to do so. Section 2911 applies alike to mortgages and pledges. The pledgee is in precisely the position occupied by the mortgagee in possession. Property has been placed in his possession by the debtor as security for the discharge of his obligation. It would be as inequitable to assist him in recovering the possession thereof without paying his debt, as to assist a mortgagor in so recovering his property. It is the general rule enunciated by courts of last resort that a pledgor cannot recover possession of the pledged property without paying his debt, although the debt be barred by the statute of limitations, and this rule is based on the equitable doctrine already stated. This court has announced the same rule in regard to a pledge, although perhaps never in a case where it was necessary to the decision. See Spect v. Spect, supra; Zellerbach v. Allenberg, 99 Cal. 57, 69, 33 Pac. 786; Commercial Sav. Bank v. Hornberger, 140 Cal. 16, 20, 73 Pac. 625. We have no doubt that it is the correct rule in the absence of express provision to the contrary, and that section 2911 of the Civil Code should not be construed as providing to the contrary. To hold otherwise not only implies a legislative intent not shown by the language of the section, but deprives our numerous decisions as to the rights of a mortgagee of real property of the foundation upon which they are based. If Mutual Life Insurance Company v. Pacific Fruit Co., supra, is to be followed, either the decisions as to a mortgagee in possession must be overruled, or, accepting the doctrine of those cases as established as a rule of property which should not now be changed, we shall have two diametrically opposed constructions of section 2911, one for the mortgagee in possession and the other for the pledgee. We cannot see that property rights can by any possibility be injuriously affected by our now declaring what we are satisfied is the true rule in this matter, and declining to follow the decision under discussion.

The case of Conway v. Supreme Council, 131 Cal. 437, 63 Pac. 727, is cited in the opinion in Mutual, etc., Co. v. Pacific, etc., Co., supra, as sustaining the views therein enunciated. The opinion in the Conway Case fails to show that the claimants had received or were in possession of the policy, or that they had anything more than a mere equitable lien. The decision goes no further than to hold that in such a case it was essential to the claimant's rights to obtain possession from the beneficiaries of proceeds of the policy, that the lien had not been extinguished by the barring of the principal indebtedness. In this case, as in Mutual, etc., Co. v. Pacific, etc., Co., supra, the position of the beneficiary is clearly that of the pledgor or his successor seeking to recover possession of the pledged property from the pledgee without paying the debt for which it was pledged. The money paid into court as proceeds of the policy has merely taken the place of the policy held in possession by the plaintiff, and for all the purposes of this action should be deemed to be in the possession of the plaintiff. It follows from what we have said that the issue as to the debt being barred at the time of the death of Henry was an immaterial issue in this action, and the failure of the court to find on an immaterial issue would not warrant the granting of a new trial. It also follows that the evidence without conflict showed that plaintiff's "cause of action herein" is not barred.

There was no conflict in the evidence upon the proposition that Henry assigned and delivered the policy to plaintiff in pledge as security for the debt evidenced by the note. The right of the plaintiff to collect from the insurance company the amount of the policy when it fell due followed as a matter of law. Civ. Code, § 3006. A new trial could not therefore be granted on the ground of insufficiency of evidence to support the finding as to these matters. There is no other point made in support of the order granting a new trial. It is evident that the new trial was granted by the lower court solely because of the decision of this court in Mutual, etc., Co. v. Pacific, etc., Co., supra.

The order granting a new trial is reversed.

We concur: SHAW, J.; SLOSS, J.

BEATTY, C. J. I concur in the judgment, and also in the opinion, except that portion thereof referring to the case of Conway v. Supreme Council, 131 Cal. 437, 63 Pac. 727, which case was again before this court on a second appeal (137 Cal. 384, 70 Pac. 223). I think the effect of the opinion in this case is to overrule, not only the decision of this court in the Mutual, etc., Co. v. Pacific, etc., Co., 142 Cal. 477, 78 Pac. 67, but also the Conway Cases.

McFARLAND, HENSHAW, and LORIGAN, JJ. We dissent. In our opinion the law on the point at issue was correctly declared in the case of Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Pacific Fruit Co., 142 Cal. 477, 77 Pac. 67, and cases cited in the opinion filed in said case.

(152 Cal. 515)

BOARD OF EDUCATION OF THE CITY & COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO v. HYATT. (S. F. 4,832.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 6, 1907.)

1. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS—CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS—CONSTRUCTION.

Under Const. art. 9, § 6, providing that the public school system shall include primary and grammar schools and such high schools, evening schools, commercial schools and technical schools as may be established by the Legislature or by municipal or district authority, the words "evening schools" were merely intended to obviate doubt as to the power to provide for schools holding evening sessions, so that the section did not prevent the conduct of an evening high school as a part of the public school system.

2. SAME—HIGH SCHOOLS IN CITIES—ESTABLISHMENT—NECESSITY OF VOTE—STATE HIGH SCHOOL FUND—RIGHT TO SHARE.

Pol. Code, § 1616, declares that boards of education shall be elected in cities under the laws governing such cities, and their powers and duties shall be as prescribed therein, except as otherwise provided in such chapter. St. 1871-72, p. 846, c. 576, § 1, conferred on the board of education of San Francisco power to maintain public schools as then organized, and to establish additional ones as required, etc. Held, that high schools being a part of the public school system, as provided by Const. art. 9, § 6, the San Francisco board of education had power to establish high schools, which thereupon became entitled to share in the benefits of the state high school fund, if otherwise qualified, as provided by Act March 6, 1905, p. 58, c. 65, conferring such benefits on high schools organized under the laws of the state, or recognized as existing under the high school laws of the state, though such high schools were not organized pursuant to an election held in the manner prescribed by Pol. Code, § 1670.

3. STATUTES—LOCAL AND SPECIAL LAWS.

St. 1871-72, p. 846, c. 576, authorizing the board of education of the city of San Francisco to establish high schools, having been passed before the adoption of Const. 1879, was not affected by the restriction therein, prohibiting the passing of local or special laws.

4. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS—ORGANIZATION OF HIGH SCHOOLS—DEFECTS—CURATIVE ACTS—HIGH SCHOOL FUND—RIGHT TO SHARE.

A high school having been established by the board of education of the city of San Francisco in October, 1897, any defects existing in such organization were cured by St. 1901, p. 299, c. 140, providing that all proceedings for the establishment of high schools in previously established, incorporated cities were thereby declared legal, and by Acts 1905, amending Pol. Code, § 1671, subd. 11, legalizing all proceedings for the formation of high school districts, and the establishment of district high schools, so that such school became "duly organized under the laws of the state," regardless of defects, within St. 1905, p. 58, c. 65, § 5, providing for the distribution of the high school fund only among schools so organized.

5. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—POWERS—CURATIVE ACTS—POWER OF LEGISLATURE.

The Legislature has power to pass acts curing a failure to comply with statutory requirements that might originally have been dispensed with in the proceedings of municipal corporations.

6. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS—HIGH SCHOOLS—LENGTH OF SESSIONS—RIGHT TO FUNDS.

There being no statute providing a minimum duration of daily sessions of high schools, the fact that the sessions of an evening high school were only two hours per day did not prevent it from participating in the benefits conferred on regularly established high schools by Act March 6, 1905, p. 58, c. 65.

7. SAME—COURSE OF STUDY.

Act March 6, 1905, p. 58, c. 65, providing for the distribution of the state high school fund, limits the distribution to schools which have maintained the grade of instruction required by law, and have had at least two duly certified high school teachers, and a regular average attendance of 20 or more pupils, and Pol. Code, § 1670, subd. 12, prescribes that the course of study shall be such as will prepare graduates therein for admission to the State University. Held, that where an evening high school offered two courses of study, only one of which complied with University admission requirements, such school was only entitled to participate in the high school fund if it maintained two or more regularly certificated high school teachers and an average attendance of 20 or more pupils in such course; the right of a school to share in the fund being determined only according to those teachers and pupils engaged in high school work.

8. SAME—LENGTH OF COURSE.

Under Pol. Code, § 1670, subd. 12, providing that the high school course fitting students for entrance to the State University shall not be less than three years, the fact that an evening high school course, intended to meet University requirements, extended for five years, did not affect the right of such school to participate in the distribution of state high school funds, as provided by St. 1906, p. 58, c. 65, § 5.

In Bank. Application by the board of education of the city and county of San Francisco for a writ of mandamus against Edward Hyatt, as superintendent of public instruction. Petition dismissed.

Wm. G. Burke, City Atty., and A. S. Newbergh, Asst. City Atty., for petitioner. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for respondent.

SLOSS, J. Upon an application to this court by the board of education of the city and county of San Francisco for a writ of mandate to compel the state superintendent of public instruction to include the Humboldt evening high school in said city and county among the schools participating in the apportionment of the state high school fund, an alternative writ issued. The respondent appeared, and, after filing a demurrer and an answer, entered into a stipulation with the petitioner, agreeing upon the essential facts. By section 1 of the act entitled "An act creating a fund for the benefit and support of high schools and providing for its distribution," etc., approved March 6, 1905 (St. 1905, p. 58, c. 65), provision is made for the annual levy of a tax for the support of regularly established high schools of the state. The money so collected is to be turned into a "State High School Fund," created by the act and is appropriated for the use and support of regularly established state high schools. Sections 3, 4. Section 5 of the act directs the superintendent of public instruction to apportion the fund to high schools of the state upon this basis: One-third of the annual amount equally among the county, district, city, union, or joint union high schools of the state, irrespective of the number of pupils enrolled or in average daily attendance therein, and the remaining two-thirds pro rata according to the average daily attendance for the last preceding school year, "provided that such high schools have been organized under the law of the state, or have been recognized as existing under the high school laws of the state and have maintained the grade of instruction required by law for the high schools; and provided, that no school shall be eligible to a share in said state high school fund that has not during the last preceding school year employed at least two regularly certificated high school teachers for a period of not less than one hundred and eighty days with not less than twenty pupils in average daily attendance for such length of time. * * *; and provided, that before receiving state aid, each school shall furnish satisfactory evidence to the superintendent of public instruction of the possession of a reasonably good equipment of building, laboratory, and library and of having maintained, the preceding school year, proper high school instruction for a term of at least one hundred and eighty days. * * * It appears from the stipulation above referred to that the Humboldt evening high school was established and organized by the board of education of the city and county of San Francisco in October, 1897, at a time when said city and county was governed by the provisions of the consolidation act and the amendments thereto. In the establishment and organization of said school no election, as provided by sections 1670 and 1671 of the Political Code, was held. The sessions of said school are held in the evening only and continue during two hours of each of five evenings per week.

The respondent contends, in the first place, that under the Constitution of this state no high school holding evening sessions only can be established. This contention is based upon section 6 of article 9 of the Constitution, providing that "the public school system shall include primary and grammar schools, and such high schools, evening schools, normal schools and technical schools as may be established by the Legislature, or by municipal or district authority." The argument is that the Constitution, by enumerating the various classes of schools and making evening schools a distinct class in this enumeration, distinguished such evening schools from all other classes enumerated, and that an evening school could not therefore at the same time be a high school, since high schools form a class separately provided for in the section. But this argument proves too much. It would lead equally well to the conclusion that an evening school could not be either a primary, a grammar, a normal, or a technical school, a conclusion which seems on its face to be untenable. We are satisfied that the framers of the Constitution, in including in this section the words "evening schools," intended to obviate any doubt that might exist as to the power to provide for schools which should hold their sessions in the evening, and that it was not intended thereby to make a separate class of such schools in the sense that evening schools could not, as to the nature of the course of study pursued, possess the character of primary, grammar, high, normal, or technical schools.

Further, it is objected that the Humboldt evening high school was not organized pursuant to an election held under the provisions of section 1670 of the Political Code. By section 5 of the act of March 6, 1905, the benefits of the "state high school fund" are limited to high schools that "have been organized under the laws of the state, or have been recognized as existing under the high school law of the state." By this provision the act furnishes its own definition of the phrase "regularly established high schools of the state," used in the earlier sections, and impresses the character of regularly established high schools upon schools which comply with either of the last quoted requirements of section 5. As appears from the stipulation, the Humboldt evening high school was established by the board of education of the city and county of San Francisco in October, 1897. Section 1616 of the Political Code reads: "Boards of education are elected in cities under the provisions of the laws governing such cities, and their powers and duties are as prescribed in such laws, except as otherwise in this chapter provided." Under section 1 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the support of the common schools of the city and county of San Francisco and to define the powers and duties of the board of education thereof," approved April 1, 1872 (St. 1871-72, p. 846, c. 576), the board of education of the city and county of San Francisco is given power "to maintain public schools as now organized in said city and county, and to establish additional ones as required, and to consolidate and discontinue schools, as may be deemed best for the public interest." That high schools may properly be included within the term "public schools" will hardly be questioned. Indeed, article 9, § 6, of the present Constitution, quoted above, expressly makes them a part of the "public school system." This statute, therefore, in conferring upon the board of education of the city and county of San Francisco power to establish public schools, gave to it the power to establish high schools. The act, having been passed before the adoption of the Constitution of 1879, was not affected by the restrictions contained in that instrument prohibiting the passing of local or special laws. Nevada School Dist. v. Shoecraft, 88 Cal. 372, 26 Pac. 211. It would appear clear, therefore, that the Humboldt evening high school is a school that has "been organized under the law of the state." But, if there were any doubt as to the legality of the original organization of the school, two curative acts, passed after its establishment, had the effect of obviating any defects existing at the outset, or, at least, of making it a school "recognized as existing under the high school laws of the state." An act of March 15, 1901 (St. 1901, p. 209, c. 140), provides that "all proceedings for the establishment of high schools heretofore established in incorporated cities are hereby declared legal"; and in 1905 the Legislature amended section 1671 of the Political Code, including in said section a subdivision 11, providing that "all proceedings for the formation and organization of high school districts and the establishment of county, city and county, union, joint union, and district high schools had prior to the passage and approval of this act are hereby validated and declared legal, and said high school districts and high schools are hereby declared to be legally formed, organized and established." It is well settled that the Legislature has power to pass acts curing the failure to comply with statutory requirements that might originally have been dispensed with in the proceedings of municipal corporations. 6 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) 941. In the recent case of Chase v. Trout, 146 Cal. 350, 80 Pac. 81, this court fully expressed its views regarding the validity of curative acts. The statute there in question undertook to validate defective proceedings for the collection of taxes, but the principle declared is no less applicable to proceedings of the kind here involved. See, also, Baird v. Monroe (Cal. Sup.) 89 Pac. 352. If this school was in all other respects entitled to participate as a high school in the apportionment, these curative acts were clearly sufficient to bring it within the statutory definition of a "regularly established high school."

The further objection is made on behalf of respondent that the shortness of the daily session held in the school in question—i. e., two hours per day—takes the school out of the class of high schools contemplated by the law. While it appears that this session is considerably shorter than that regularly held in day high schools, we find no provision of law regulating the length of the daily sessions, with the exception of section 1673 of the Political Code, which provides that "no school must be continued in session more than six hours per day." No statute provides a minimum duration, and, if the school complies with all the requirements of law, the fact that its sessions are of shorter duration than those of other high schools does not deprive it of the character of a regularly established high school, or prevent it from participating in the benefits conferred upon regularly established high schools by the act of March 6, 1905. But, while the facts already set forth do not, in our opinion, tend to show that the school in question is not a "regularly established high school of the state," and do not, therefore, furnish any reason for excluding it from the apportionment, we think that the stipulation of facts fails to show that the Humboldt evening high school, considered as a high school, complied with the provisions of section 5 of the act of March 6, 1905, as to employment of teachers and average daily attendance. It might be said that the answer, tested by strict rules of pleading, does not raise a clear issue on this point. It may, however, without straining the meaning of words, be construed as raising such issue, and, inasmuch as this is a controversy between public officers, each of whom is doubtless desirous of ascertaining and performing his exact duty under the law, we are not disposed to allow any technical construction of the pleadings to prevent the consideration of a question whose determination is necessary to a proper understanding of the rights and obligations arising under the statute in question. The petition alleges, and it is not denied, that during the school year 1905-06 the Humboldt school employed 26 teachers for not less than 180 days, and that the average daily attendance was 546 pupils. It appears that graduates of grammar schools have been admitted to said school without examination. Pol. Code, § 1670, subd. 13. A course of instruction, extending over three years, and leading to a high school diploma, is given, but there is no suggestion that this course is such as to prepare graduates for admission to the State University. During the year 1905-06 the school had a course of study known as "course B," which extended for a period of five years, and which was adopted by the petitioner to comply with the admission requirements of the University of California. As we have seen, the act of March 6, 1905, limits the distribution of its benefits to schools which have maintained the grade of instruction required by law for the high schools. That grade of instruction, as declared by subdivision 12 of section 1670 of the Political Code, is "such as will prepare graduates therein for admission into the State University." If a school offers two courses, one of which falls short of this standard, it does not, as to such course, maintain the grade of instruction required by law of high schools. Accordingly, in the case at bar, the Humboldt evening high school is to be considered a high school only so far as concerns the instruction given and received in "course B." But the stipulation does not disclose that it has the requisite number of teachers and pupils in this course. It is true that the parties agree that the school, as a whole, has 26 teachers and 546 pupils, but it nowhere appears how many of these teachers or pupils are engaged in high school work, and how many are occupied in the three-year course, which is not up to the high school standard. Unless that part of the school which can properly be regarded as a high school has two or more regularly certificated high school teachers and twenty or more pupils in average daily attendance, no right to apportionment under the statute arises. Here these conditions are not shown to exist. That, in determining the right of a school to share in the benefits of this act, only those teachers and pupils engaged in high school work can be considered, is made manifest by the manner of the apportionment. Two-thirds of the fund is to go to schools in proportion to the number of pupils in attendance. This must mean the number of pupils who are receiving the grade of instruction required by law. It cannot have been intended to distribute a high school fund to schools maintaining a certain grade of instruction, and to base this distribution on the number of pupils to whom a lower grade of instruction is being given.

For these reasons, we conclude that the petitioner has on the record before us failed to show any right in the Humboldt evening high school to participate in the allotment of the high school fund. If, however, it shall furnish to the respondent satisfactory evidence of compliance with the requirements of section 5 of the act of March 6, 1905, having regard solely to the teachers and pupils engaged and the equipment employed in "course B" or any other course preparing pupils for admission to the State University, it will then be entitled to an allotment of the state fund, based, as to two-thirds of the fund, on the average daily attendance in such course or courses.

We may add that we attach no importance to the fact that "course B" extends over five years. The only provision of law regulating the length of the course is that it "shall embrace a period of not less than three years." Pol. Code, § 1670, subd. 12. That it may extend over a longer period than three years is clearly shown by subdivision 13 of section 1670, which contains a provision relating to schools "where the course of study embraces a period of four years."

The proceeding is dismissed.

We concur: ANGELLOTTI, J.; HENSHAW, J.; LORIGAN, J.; MCFARLAND, J.

SHAW, J. I concur. I agree that the mere fact that the daily sessions of the Humboldt evening high school are of but two hours' duration does not deprive it of its character as a high school organized under the law of the state, or as a high school recognized as existing under the high school laws of the state. But I suggest that, in view of the practically universal custom of holding sessions of the public schools at least five hours each school day, and the manifest inequality and lack of uniformity in the law if it is held to give the same amount for its support to a school in session only two hours daily as is given to one in session three times as long and, during each year, imparting presumably three times as much training and instruction at three times the expense, it may be a serious question, if it ever arises, whether the "average daily attendance" for the "term of at least one hundred and eighty days" required of high schools to entitle them to receive state aid, under the statute, does not mean a daily attendance for 180 days of, at least substantially, the same number of hours as is usual and customary. If the aid can be secured by 2 hours' daily instruction for 180 days—that is, by 360 hours each year—instead of the customary 900 hours each year, why not by means of daily sessions for that period of 1 hour, or less?

2. SAME—VALIDITY OF STATUTE—PRESUMPTIONS.

All doubts should be resolved in favor of the constitutionality of regularly enacted laws, and courts should be disposed to uphold, rather than overthrow, them.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 10, Constitutional Law, § 46.]

3. EXECUTORS—COMPENSATION—FEES—DISCRETION OF COURT.

Where the statutes prescribe the exact rate of compensation to which an executor is entitled, the court has no discretion, and can neither add to nor vary the compensation, based on the degree of good or bad faith displayed in the management of the estate.

4. SAME—STATUTORY AUTHORITY.

All matters of probate, including rights of inheritance, succession, testamentary disposition, and taxes on inheritances, are subject to statutory control, and a statute regulating the disposition of the property of decedents may prescribe uniform and reasonable fees for the services of executors and their attorneys.

5. SAME.

Act March 22, 1905 (St. 1905, p. 727, c. 561), providing that executors shall be allowed for fees of their attorneys the same amounts as are allowed as compensation for executors for their own services, modifies the previous law on the subject, embodied in St. 1850, p. 396, c. 129, §§ 220, 222 (St. 1851, p. 476, c. 124, §§ 220, 222; Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1616, 1618), authorizing reasonable attorney's fees, etc., and provides a uniform standard, and is valid as providing for reasonable fees.

6. SAME.

Under Act March 22, 1905 (St. 1905, p. 727, c. 561), providing that executors shall be allowed for fees of their attorneys a specified amount, an attorney of an executor has no claim against the estate of the decedent, but the allowance is made to the executor on account of money actually paid by him to the attorney for services actually performed, and, where an executor employs an attorney to perform the legal services for less than the prescribed fees, the executor will only be allowed his actual expenditures, but otherwise he will be allowed for the full amount prescribed and actually disbursed by him.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; Frank H. Smith, Judge.

Accounting by Clayton A. Douglas and another, as executors of Almon Luther Goodrich, deceased. From an order surcharging the executors, they appeal. Reversed.

F. O. Houskin (Plummer & Dunlap, of counsel), for appellants.

BURNETT, J. Appellants state the case as follows: "The question involved is the validity of the act of the Legislature approved March 22, 1905 (St. 1905, p. 727, c. 561, § 2), relating to expenditures by administrators and executors for and on account of the services of attorneys retained by them in the matter of the administration of estates.

* * * In the case at bar, the executors, appellants herein, retained as their attorney F. O. Housken, and had the benefit of his services in the conduct of all the legal proceedings pertaining to the said estate, and agreed to pay him for such services the amount fixed by said act of the Legislature, and did pay him such sum therefor, but on the settlement of the account of the executors the court refused to allow the amount paid by them, but allowed the sum of $150 for such purpose, and surcharged the executors with the amount of $215.42, the difference between the amount paid by the executors as provided by the statute and the sum allowed by the court." From the portion of the order and decree disallowing the full amount paid for the services of the attorney, the appeal has been taken by the executors.

A brief historical review of the statutory regulation of the fees and expenses allowed executors and administrators is considered not inappropriate. By an act passed April 22, 1850 (St. 1850, p. 396, c. 129), the Legislature provided in section 220 thereof that an executor or administrator "shall be allowed all necessary expenses in the care, management and settlement of the estate and for his services such fees as the law provides," etc. Section 222 of the same act prescribes the commissions to be allowed the executor when no compensation is provided by the will, or when the executor renounces all claim thereto, and provides that an administrator shall be entitled to the same commissions. In 1851 (St. 1851, p. 476, c. 124) said section 220 was re-enacted, as was also said section 222, except that the rate of commission was reduced. On the adoption of the Codes in 1873 said section 220 became section 1616, and said section 222 became section 1618, of the Code of Civil Procedure. There was no change till 1880, when to said section 1616 there was added the following: "Including reasonable fees paid to attorneys for conducting the necessary proceedings or suits in court." In 1905 the phraseology of said section 1616 was changed somewhat, the fees provided in said section 1618 were reduced, and there was added section 1619, which, as far as involved in this proceeding, is as follows: "Executors and administrators shall be allowed for fees of their attorneys for conducting the ordinary probate proceedings, the same amounts as are allowed by the last section as compensation for executors and administrators for their own services." The law as it exists now, it will be observed, provides a uniform standard for the determination of what shall be allowed for the services of an attorney, instead of leaving it, as formerly, to the discretion of the court without any legislative guidance, except the general limitation that the fees shall be "reasonable." We are not concerned with the wisdom or policy of the law.

However, in view of the striking difference of opinion exhibited by trial judges in their rulings as to what constitute reasonable fees for such services, it would seem to be just and equitable for the Legislature, if practicable, to provide for uniform and proportionate compensation to be paid for similar services in all estates. As to the validity of the act in question, there is no apparent reason why it should not be upheld. It seems to be within the domain of legitimate legislative enactment. The judicial department should, of course, refrain, if possible, from any unwarranted invasion of the function of the legislative department of the government. It has been often held that all doubts should be resolved in favor of the constitutionality of regularly enacted laws, and courts should be disposed to uphold rather than overthrow them. During all the years that the law has been in force, it has not been questioned that it was and is a constitutional exercise of power for the Legislature to provide for definite fees to be awarded to executors and administrators for their own services, and also an allowance to be made to them for their necessary expenses in the administration of the estate, including reasonable attorney's fees. It seems clear that the two sections 1818 and 1819 of the Code of Civil Procedure must stand or fall together. We can see no difference in principle between an act establishing certain fees for the services of an executor and one providing what he shall be allowed as payment for the services of an attorney. The latter is as much a part of the necessary expense of administration as is the former. In fact, under our practice, the services of an attorney are not only essential, but the burden and responsibility of his work are usually much greater than those of the executor or administrator. The effect of the law is simply to allow the executor an additional fee for a certain expense of administration. It is the same as though in one section it were provided that certain fees should be allowed the executor, of which one-half should be for the expense of employing an attorney. There is no more reason, in our opinion, why the court should be clothed with discretion in fixing the value of the attorney's services rather than those of the executor. It is competent for the Legislature to provide, as it has done, for both.

As to the validity of the act fixing the fees of executors the following quotations are sufficient: "The statutes in some jurisdictions prescribe the exact rate of compensation or percentage which shall be allowed, and the courts cannot vary the amount which may be allowed, except so far as they may be authorized to award special compensation for extraordinary services." 2 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, p. 1288. And in 2 Woerner on American Law of Administration, § 526, the author says: "But it would seem that the language of the statute in most states fixing the compensation of executors and administrators precludes all discretion in this respect." "The court can neither add to nor in any wise vary the compensation directed to be allowed by the statute. It can neither allow nor disallow commissions scaled by the degree of skill or of vigilance, of good or bad faith, displayed in the management of the estate, unless such discretion is vested in the court by statute." Again, as suggested by appellant, "all matters of probate, including rights of inheritance, succession, testamentary disposition of property, and taxes upon inheritances, are subject to statutory control." It is by virtue of the statute that the heir or devisee is entitled to receive any of the estate of the decedent, and the authority which thus regulates the disposition of such property can subject it to any reasonable condition or expense. This is the basic principle that justifies the Legislature in providing uniform fees for the services of executors and their attorneys in the proper administration of estates. Of course, we are not to be considered as holding that the courts would not interfere if it were manifest that the allowance was excessive and entirely disproportionate to the value of the services performed. The discretion to be exercised by the Legislature must be within reasonable limits. But we cannot say that the allowance provided for the services of an attorney is unfair or unreasonable, and hence there is no ground here for the revisory action of the court. It may be observed that under the law the attorney has no claim against the estate, but the allowance is made to the executor on account of money actually paid by him to an attorney for services actually performed. There is nothing in the law to prevent an executor from making a contract with an attorney to perform the legal services for the estate for less than the fees provided by the statute, and in that event obviously he would be allowed only his actual expenditure. But here the contract was for the full amount, and it was actually disbursed by the executors, and hence the reduction should not have been made by the court. The order is reversed.

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 1, 1907. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 31, 1907.)

1. HIGHWAYS—INJURIES FROM OBSTRUCTIONS—LIABILITY OF PERSONS CAUSING OBSTRUCTIONS.

Though, as between the public and the traveler the latter, if he leave a portion of the road laid out and prepared for the customary use and travel and go upon the unprepared and customarily unused part, does so at his own risk, yet he is entitled to the unobstructed use of the entire width of the highway as against the unlawful acts of other persons.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 25, Highways, §§ 417-422.]

2. NEGLIGENCE—PROXIMATE CAUSE.

Negligence proximate in causal relation to the damage is actionable.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 37, Negligence, §§ 69-77.]

3. SAME — NATURAL AND PROBABLE CONSEQUENCES.

A person guilty of negligence should be held responsible for all the consequences which a prudent and experienced man, fully acquainted with all the circumstances which in fact existed, whether they could have been ascertained by reasonable diligence or not, would at the time of the negligent act have thought reasonably possible to follow, if they had occurred to his mind.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 37, Negligence, §§ 71, 72.]

4. HIGHWAYS — OBSTRUCTION — INJURIES — PROXIMATE CAUSE.

Defendant owned a pile of wood, one corner of which extended over the highway, though not the traveled portion, for about two feet, but there was left sufficient room in the highway for the ordinary use thereof. The highway was parallel to a railroad track, and in close proximity thereto. While plaintiff's wife was driving along the road, the horse became frightened by a train, and started to run. When the woodpile was reached, the buggy struck the part extending into the highway, and was overturned, and plaintiff's wife thrown with such violence as to cause her death. Held, that the maintenance of the woodpile, as it was, by defendant, was the proximate cause of the accident.

5. SAME—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Whether the maintenance of a woodpile, one corner of which extended over the highway, though not the traveled portion, for about two feet, and against which the buggy in which plaintiff's wife was riding struck while the horse was running away, was negligence, held for the jury.

6. APPEAL—REVIEW—VERDICT ON CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

A verdict resting on evidence in which there is at least a substantial conflict is conclusive on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 3935-3937.]

7. DEATH—ACTIONS — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

In an action for the death of plaintiff's wife, the burden of showing contributory negligence by decedent or plaintiff is on defendant, unless plaintiff's evidence discloses contributory negligence, or that the accident would not have occurred but for the inexcusable fault of decedent or plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 15, Death, §§ 75-78.]

8. TRIAL — SPECIAL FINDINGS — QUESTIONS FOR SUBMISSION—IMMATERIAL ISSUES.

Code Civ. Proc. § 625, requires the court, on request, to direct the jury to find a special verdict. In an action for the death of plaintiff's wife, who was killed by being thrown from a buggy which struck a woodpile, a corner of which extended into the untraveled portion of the highway, her horse having been frightened by a train, the court refused to submit the following questions requested by defendant, the owner of the wood: "Was the woodpile an obstruction to the free use of the highway in the usual and customary manner? Would the accident have happened if the horse had been under control and driven in the usual and customary manner? Was the accident due to the running away of the horse? Did the woodpile have anything to do with the horse becoming frightened and running away? At the point in question, was the main traveled portion of the highway sufficiently wide and safe for the usual, ordinary, and customary travel thereon by horses under control?" Held, that a finding favorable to defendant on any of the questions would not have been inconsistent with the general verdict for plaintiff, and therefore would have been immaterial, so that the court properly refused to present them to the jury.

9. SAME—VERDICT—SPECIAL QUESTIONS—MISLEADING.

Where, in an action for the death of plaintiff's wife, who was killed by being thrown from a buggy which struck a woodpile, a corner of which extended over the untraveled portion of the highway, the horse having been frightened by a train, it was not contended that the woodpile was an obstruction to the free use of the highway in the usual and customary manner, nor that the accident would not have happened if the horse had been under control, nor that the accident was not partly due to the running away of the horse, requested special questions of fact—Was the woodpile an obstruction to the free use of the highway in the usual and customary manner? Would the accident have happened if the horse had been under control and driven in the usual and customary manner of driving horses? Was the accident due to the running away of the horse?—were misleading in form.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; E. W. Wilson, Judge.

Action by John Williams against the San Francisco & Northwestern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Gillett & Cutler, for appellant. Gregor & Connick, for respondent.

HART, J. This is an action for damages for causing the death of plaintiff's wife. The case was tried by a jury and plaintiff secured a verdict and judgment for the sum of $3,000. From said judgment, upon a bill of exceptions, the defendant presents this appeal.

The facts as established by the evidence and found by the jury are: The defendant corporation owns and operates a steam railroad about 25 miles in length, between the city of Eureka, in Humboldt county, to some point beyond the town of Scotia, in said county. On the line of the road are situated the towns of Fortuna and Singley's Station; the latter being about three miles in a northerly direction from the former. A county road, used for many years by the traveling public as a public highway, runs between and connects these towns or railroad stations. On the 23d day of July, 1903, while the wife of the plaintiff was on her way to Fortuna, in a buggy, drawn by a horse, driven by herself, and at a point between the two stations mentioned, a train of cars belonging to the defendant came along and the noise produced by the engine and the train caused the animal to become frightened and to start on a wild run over the road toward and in the direction of Fortuna. The right of way and track of defendant adjoin and parallel said public highway for a considerable distance. At a point on said county road, about one mile from Fortuna, was situated on the day the fatal accident occurred a large pile of wood, the property of the defendant. The complaint alleges, and it appears to be satisfactorily shown by the evidence, that one corner of said woodpile extended over and projected into a portion of said public highway for a distance of approximately two feet. When the animal, running at a lively rate, reached the point at which the woodpile was situated, the buggy struck or collided with that portion of the wood extending into the highway, the impact resulting in the overturning of the vehicle, and throwing the deceased to the ground with such violence as to produce fatal injuries, death being almost instantaneous. There does not appear to be any attempt to contradict the claim of the plaintiff that the woodpile with which the buggy collided occupied a part of the public highway, although not the traveled portion; but it is contended by the defendant, and there is no dispute upon the proposition, that that part of said highway so used by the defendant had been thus used by it for many years prior to the day upon which the unfortunate mishap occurred, and that, notwithstanding the existence of the obstruction, there was still left sufficient room in the highway at that point to facilitate and admit of the ordinary and customary use of the road by the traveling public. Those persons who saw the horse start to run and watched the animal running as far as the circumstances by which they were situated would permit them were passengers on the train, the noise from which caused the animal to become frightened. Testifying for the plaintiff, they all stated that the horse ran so fast that he kept up with the speed of the train; that the deceased seemed to be holding the animal with taut reins, and that she appeared to be perfectly calm, cool, and "collected," evincing no signs of the loss of control of her judgment; that "the woman was sitting firmly in the buggy seat," and "I should judge," testified the witness Robertson, "her feet were well braced, and she was holding her arms in a driving position. She had hold of both lines, one in each hand, was holding them tight and was guiding the horse." Some of the witnesses testified that on the day following that upon which the accident occurred they followed the track made by the vehicle used by the deceased from a point a considerable distance from the woodpile to the latter point, and that the buggy was kept in the center of the road until it struck said woodpile. The woodpile consisted of three tiers of "2-foot" wood. The width of the road, measuring from the outer edge of the woodpile to the fence on the opposite side of the highway, was about 20 feet, of which about 12 feet were graveled. On behalf of the defendant testimony was offered to the effect that the projection of the woodpile into the highway did not interfere with or obstruct the customary travel upon it. The witness Newell said that the corner of the woodpile projected upon the graveled portion of the road, and that, "if one was to use the whole of that road that was turnpiked, and graveled, he would get pretty near the edge of the woodpile." It also appears that just a short distance from where the woodpile was situated there is rather a sharp curve in the road, around which the horse ran at a high rate of speed, going in the direction of said woodpile. Newell declared that said curve "was a difficult one to make if the horse was running fast." Testimony was also introduced by the defendant tending to show that the horse driven by the deceased was high-spirited and easily excited, and that the "bridle-bit" used on the animal at the time of the accident was not of the kind which should be used on a horse of an excitable and unruly nature; that it was the "bit" ordinarily used on horses, and with which it would be difficult, if not impossible, to stop a frightened horse in the act of "running away." The witness Quill, a livery man, who sold the mare in question to the plaintiff in the year 1901, testified that the animal was of racing stock and a "saddle horse"; that he had driven her himself, but that no one else had up to the time that he sold her to plaintiff; that he told the latter, at the time of the sale, that the mare was "very high lived, and hard to handle when she got warmed up, and was all right, except when she got excited." This witness said that, after selling the mare to plaintiff, she had foaled a colt, and that he knew "from experience that sometimes having a colt has a quieting effect upon a mare," and that said mare was much quieter after she had the colt; that he had often seen plaintiff drive the mare, and that on such occasions "she was going along like any ordinary horse would." Testimony was introduced in rebuttal to show that the deceased had often driven the mare, taking with her in the buggy at different times certain ladies, who said that the mare always behaved well on those occasions. The deceased was described as a "large, strong, healthy woman," from which fact the inference is that she was capable, in point of physical strength, of controlling the animal. The foregoing embraces, in substance, the principal testimony introduced by both sides, and from which, of course, arise the legal propositions submitted for solution.

The main questions discussed in the briefs involve and revolve around two propositions, viz: (1) What was the proximate cause of the accident resulting in the death of plaintiff's wife? (2) Was plaintiff's right to recover barred by negligence contributed either by himself or his wife or by both? An important question is also presented in the contention of appellant that the court committed prejudicial error by its refusal to submit to the jury for findings thereon certain particular questions of fact requested in writing to be so submitted by the defendant. The specific contentions of the appellant upon the merits of the record are: That the direct cause of the accident was the fright and running away of the horse, due, presumably, to the noise made by the locomotive and train; that the horse, after starting to run, became unmanageable, and got beyond the control of the deceased, and that her inability to keep the animal in the middle or center of the road and thus have avoided the collision of the buggy with the woodpile constituted upon her part such culpable negligence as to destroy a right of recovery in plaintiff; that deceased was guilty of negligence in driving an animal claimed to be "high-lifed," nervous, and of an excitable nature. And, in connection with the question of the character of the horse driven by the deceased, it is also charged that the plaintiff himself was guilty of contributory negligence by the act of permitting his wife, unaccompanied by any one capable of lending her effective assistance in the event the horse became frightened and unruly, to drive an animal which, it is contended, was shown by the evidence to be at the time of the accident high-spirited and of a highly nervous temperament, and so known to be at the time by the plaintiff, along or near a railroad track over which a train of cars was likely to pass at any moment. It is also contended that the obstruction did not interfere with the usual and customary use of the highway.

Before proceeding with an examination of the respective positions of the parties to this appeal, these three self-evident and undisputed propositions may be declared: (1) That the defendant had the right to run its train over its track in the usual and customary manner of running railway trains, propelled by steam power; (2) that the deceased had the right to use the public highway in the usual and customary manner in which such highways are used and designed to be used; (3) that no one has any lawful right to maintain an obstruction or purpresture of any character or nature upon a public highway, or road laid out for and dedicated to the purposes of public travel.

In connection with the first of the propositions thus stated, it may be said that there is no claim that the defendant's train of cars, the noise from which it is alleged frightened the horse driven by deceased, made on the occasion of the accident an unusual or unnecessary noise, but it is conceded that the noise thus made was only the usual and orinary noise necessarily incident to the running of railway trains by means of a steam locomotive.

Was the act of the defendant in maintaining the woodpile upon an untraveled portion of the highway culpable negligence, and if so, was said woodpile the proximate cause of the accident, or, as we think the latter proposition may be as accurately and at the same time more explicitly stated, would the accident have occurred but for the maintenance of the woodpile under the circumstances disclosed by the evidence? The theory of the appellant upon the law of the case may best be presented in the language of the following instruction which was requested by it and refused by the court: "I further instruct you that if you find from the evidence that the wood piled by defendant was off of the main traveled portion of the highway, and at a place where it was not dangerous to persons driving along said highway in the customary and ordinary manner, and if you further find that the horse driven by plaintiff's said wife became frightened some distance from where said wood was piled and ran away, and got beyond her control and was unmanageable, and while so running away and beyond her control left the well-beaten track of the road, and ran to one side thereof and against the end of said wood, thereby causing her death, then I instruct you that the proximate cause of the accident was the fright and running away of the horse, and not the pile of wood against which the buggy collided, and you must find a verdict for the defendant." The portion of the foregoing rejected instruction bearing upon contributory negligence was covered by other instructions of the court; but by the instruction, it will be observed, it was also sought to induce the court to tell the jury that, as a question of law, the fact that the woodpile was "off of the main traveled portion of the highway and at a place where it was not dangerous to persons driving along said highway in the customary and ordinary manner," exculpated defendant from all blame and responsibility for the accident and its consequences. Our attention has been invited to no case decided in California in which the precise question presented by the rejected instruction, or a question arising upon facts substantially corresponding with those here, has been adjudicated. We have, however, devoted much time to an examination of all the cases cited by both sides from other jurisdictions in which a similar question, with its concomitant propositions, and growing out of facts in marked analogy to those of the case at bar, has been considered and decided. While those authorities appear to be (and in a few instances are) widely divergent, and seem to present a contrariety of views upon the application of the principles of law involved in the class of cases to which the one under review belongs, a careful examination, analysis, and comparison of them, as to the facts, will, we think, show that, generally speaking, whatever apparent difference there may be in the conclusions reached is founded upon a distinction based upon the measure of liability resting upon a town or county, charged with the duty of maintaining public highways, and that attaching to an individual or private corporation, where damage results from a defect in such highways through the fault or default of the one or the other. For illustration, it has been held that the duty of the public authorities is fully discharged when the traveled portion of the road—that part which has been gravelled, turnpiked, or otherwise prepared for the purposes of the customary travel—is kept and maintained in proper repair and in such shape as to admit of the usual, ordinary, and customary use. And while, as between the town or county or public authorities having supervision of public highways and the traveler, the latter will leave the portion of the road laid out and prepared for the customary use and travel and go upon and use the unprepared and customarily unused part at his own risk, he is nevertheless entitled to the unobstructed and uninterrupted use of the entire width of the highway as against the unlawful acts of other persons, either real or artificial. The principle, upholding the distinction suggested, and here sought to be stated, is well explained in Dickey v. Maine Telegraph Co., 46 Me. 485, as follows: " * * * But the right of travelers to use any part of a highway, if they see fit, is not restricted by the limitation of the liability of the town in case of accident. A person may go out of the beaten track at his own risk, as between himself and the town, and yet be entitled to protection against the unlawful acts of other persons or corporations. Any part of the highway may be used by the traveler, and in such direction as may suit his convenience or taste. [Citing Stinson v. Gardiner, 42 Me. 248, 68 Am. Dec. 281.] No private person has a right to place or cause any obstruction which interferes with this right on any part of the highway within its exterior limits. The extent of the liability of the town is no measure for such private person's liability. If the owner of the fee in the land, or any other person, should dig a pit, or stretch a cord, or place a pile of stones on the highway near the outer limit, and at a considerable distance from the traveled way, and a traveler passing, using due care, should be injured thereby, it would be no sufficient answer to his claim for damages to aver and prove that, under the circumstances, the town was not liable. The duty of the town is to perform a positive act in the preparation and preservation of a sufficient traveled road. The duty of others is to abstain from doing any act by which any part of the highway would become more dangerous to the traveler than in a state of nature, or than in the state in which the town has left it." See, also, State v. Ber- detta, 73 Ind. 185, 38 Am. Rep. 117, and Johnson v. Whitfield, 18 Me. 283, 36 Am. Dec. 721. In the last-named case it is said: "It is contended that the owner of land adjoining a public highway may lawfully use that part of it which is not prepared for the public travel. His ownership and right of use, so far as may be consistent with the rights of the public, need not be questioned. But it is a mistake to suppose the public rights of travel are restricted to the prepared and usually traveled path. While the town has done its duty when it has prepared a pathway of suitable width in such manner that it can be conveniently and safely traveled with teams and carriages, the citizens are not thereby deprived of the right to travel over the whole width of the way as laid out. And they have the right to do so without being subjected to other or greater dangers than may be presented by making and preparing the traveled path."

The rule as stated in the foregoing authorities is supported by the soundest reason and the most salutary principles of justice, and meets with our approval. The court properly, in our opinion, refused to give to the jury an instruction which would have taken from it the question of whether the act of the defendant was culpable negligence. The situation here, according to the undisputed facts, is that the appellant maintained an unlawful obstruction upon a public highway, paralleling which and in close proximity thereto was its railroad track, over which it operated and ran, by steam, its railroad trains. It is not denied that the buggy in which the deceased was driving collided with said obstruction, and that the collision caused the vehicle to upset and precipitate the deceased to the ground with such force as to cause her death. The rule is that the defendant is answerable in law for negligence proximate in causal relation to the damage; or, in other words, it is liable if the obstruction for the existence of which it was responsible was the direct cause of the accident, with its resulting damages. The difficulty, indeed insuperable, with which the courts and text-writers have been and always will be confronted with regard to the right of action founded in negligence, is to formulate an invariable, iron-clad rule, applicable alike to all cases of personal injury, upon the question of the proximate cause of the damage, or "the connection between the negligent act or omission and the damage." It should therefore be a case in which there is very clearly wanting, under the evidence, the essential connection between the negligent act or omission and the damage to warrant the court in taking it from the jury, either through a motion for a nonsuit or a direction to find for the defendant or the instructions. "The proximate cause of an event," say Shearman and Redfield, page 27 of volume 1 of the fifth edition of their treatise on the "Law of Negligence," "must be understood to be that which in a natural and continuous sequence, unbroken by any new, independent cause, produces that event, and without which that event would not have occurred." But, say the same authors, very great difficulty has been found in determining what damages should be considered as flowing, in a "natural and continuous sequence," from an act of negligence, especially when it is not a matter of contract liability. The difficulty of laying down a rule which will include all possible cases has caused some of the ablest judges to decline to state any fixed rule; thus indicating a disposition of the courts to leave all doubtful cases to the jury. The authors of the work from which we have just quoted have, however, undertaken to state a general rule as follows: "That a person guilty of negligence should be held responsible for all the consequences which a prudent and experienced man, fully acquainted with all the circumstances which in fact existed (whether they could have been ascertained by reasonable diligence or not) would, at the time of the negligent act, have thought reasonably possible to follow, if they had occurred to his mind." This formula is sensible and sound. Testing, therefore, the facts of the case at bar by the rule as thus declared, little, if any, difficulty is to be experienced, we think, in tracing the proximate cause of the damage to the negligent act of the defendant. That a horse, howsoever gentle he may be for ordinary driving purposes, is likely to become frightened upon the sudden approach of a steam railway train, producing its customary and necessary noise, is not only a reasonably possible, but, in our opinion, a reasonably probable fact, which all men of experience and prudence must know. It is one of the contingencies which are likely to occur upon a highway adjacent to a railroad track over which a steam railway is operated, and of which a prudent person, familiar with facts existing within the domain of common human experience, must reasonably have known and thought, had it occurred to his mind. It is an event which it was possible would happen at any time under the existing and known circumstances, and one, therefore, which it was the defendant's duty to think of and consider when it established and maintained the obstruction complained of. It is, in other words, one of those probable occurrences under the circumstances shown here which the defendant, having full knowledge of said circumstances, must be held to have reasonably anticipated. The meeting or overtaking of passing teams by a railway train traveling over a track adjoining a public highway is an event which is likely to occur at any moment, and which the owner of the railway must reasonably expect to happen. Therefore, had it "occurred to defendant's mind," fully acquainted, as it must be assumed to have been, with all the circumstances which in fact existed, it would have known that the consequences which might reasonably follow the frightening and consequent rapid running of the horse, hitched to a buggy, on and over the highway would be the collision of the vehicle with the obstruction maintained by it upon said highway, and resulting damage, to either person or property or both, if the frightened animal ran in the direction of the point of obstruction.

As is said in Borough of Pittston v. Hart, 89 Pa. 391, so it is true here: "It is true that without the frightening of the horses, there would have been no accident; but the horse is naturally a timid animal, and is so liable to fright that those having charge of the public highways ought to make reasonable provision for a matter so common and so likely to happen at any time. Horses abound, but horses that never frighten, or are never fractious, are exceedingly rare, and, if roads were to be constructed only for such animals, there must needs be but little traveling upon them." The defendant was primarily at fault in maintaining the obstruction upon the highway. Its act was an act of trespass. It had no lawful right to thus use a public highway, although the part obstructed was not customarily used by the traveling public. But in principle it had just as much right to thus use the highway a distance of 10 or 20 feet as 2 feet, although the danger of accident would be greater and the proof of negligence attended with less difficulty in the former than in the latter case. As was said in Cohen v. Mayor, etc., 113 N. Y. 532, 21 N. E. 700, 4 L. R. A. 408, 10 Am. St. Rep. 506: "There is always reasonable ground for apprehending accidents from obstructions in the highways, and any person who wrongfully places them there or aids in so doing, must be held responsible for such accidents as may occur by reason of their presence." This declaration is, of course, subject to the qualification that the plaintiff has not by his own default or negligence, contributed to the damage. And our own Supreme Court, in the case of McKune v. Santa Clara, etc., 110 Cal. 480, 42 Pac. 980, likewise holds that "one who maintains any unauthorized obstruction upon a highway by means of which another, through no fault of his own, is injured in person or property, is responsible in damages therefor."

The question here, it must be understood, is not whether the highway was dangerous only when a horse traveling over it became frightened and "ran away," but whether the highway, as maintained, is shown by the evidence to be dangerous for use as such, and this fact was and is dependent for its establishment upon all the circumstances by which it was maintained and surrounded—its condition, width, closeness to places of danger, the probability of accidents originating primarily through circumstances to which it was peculiarly subject by reason of its unusual situation. Nor is the question here, under the pleadings, whether the obstruction of the highway by the defendant involved the maintenance of a public nuisance. The defendant is charged in the complaint with actionable negligence in maintaining an unauthorized obstruction, and whether such allegation was true or not depended on what the evidence established. The evidence, it is true, developed facts showing that the obstruction constituted a public nuisance, for the maintenance of which the defendant might have been criminally prosecuted. Pen. Code, § 370. And if the plaintiff, by his averments and proofs, had relied upon the theory of a public nuisance, the negligence so established would be such per se. But, as suggested, the theory of negligence advanced is independent of any consideration of whether the obstruction was a public nuisance, and upon that theory the whole question was one for the jury. "The decision of such questions," says the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, in Plymouth Tp. v. Graver, 125 Pa. 34, 17 Atl. 249, 11 Am. St. Rep. 867, "is most appropriately made by submission of them to the practical judgment and experience of a jury upon a consideration of all the proofs respecting them." The learned judge of the trial court in leaving with the jury the question of negligence imputed to the defendant and the counter charge of contributory negligence pursued the course required by the issues tendered by the pleadings and as developed by the evidence, and declared to the jury the principles of law applicable to all the essential points in the case in language of singular perspicuity. Therefore, as to the claim of the defendant that the plaintiff and the deceased contributed by their own culpable negligence to the accident and its consequences, the answer is that the verdict of the jury resting upon evidence in which there is at least a substantial conflict, although it can well be said that the proofs appear to distinctly preponderate in favor of plaintiff, is conclusive here. The burden of showing such negligence upon the part of the deceased or the plaintiff was upon the defendant, unless plaintiff's evidence itself disclosed contributory negligence, or that the accident and resulting damage would not have occurred but for the inexcusable fault of the deceased or plaintiff. The proof upon the alleged contributory negligence was purely circumstantial, and, in our judgment, exceedingly weak. The evidence fully supports the verdict.

It is submitted that the court below erred to the prejudice of defendant by refusing to present to the jury, at its request, for findings thereon certain special questions of fact. Under the terms of the amendment by the Legislature of 1905 of section 625 of the Code of Civil Procedure, it is undoubtedly mandatory upon a trial court to submit special issues or particular questions of fact to the jury in all cases, when requested to do so in writing by either of the parties. In fact, the amendment is so construed in an opinion recently filed, and written by the learned chief justice of the Supreme Court, in the case of Plyer v. Pacific Portland Cement Co. (Cal.) 92 Pac. 56. It is said in that case, however: "What the judge has to determine, from an examination of the questions themselves, is whether the parties presenting them have a right to demand their submission to the jury in the form in which they are presented, and this depends, alike in the case of an issue and in the case of a special fact involved in the issues, upon two conditions: First, is the question so framed as to admit of a plain and direct answer? and, second, would an answer favorable to the party preferring the request be inconsistent with a general verdict for his adversary?" The "special issues" or particular questions of fact requested by the appellant and refused by the court are as follows: "(1) Was the woodpile an obstruction to the free use of the highway in the usual and customary manner? (2) Would the accident have happened if the horse had been under control and driven in the usual and customary manner of driving horses? (3) Was the accident due to the running away of the horse? (4) Did the woodpile have anything to do with the horse becoming frightened and running away? (5) At the point in the highway where defendant piled its wood was the main traveled portion thereof sufficiently wide and safe for the usual, ordinary, and customary travel therein by horses under control?" Where a finding upon a special issue or a particular question of fact would be so inconsistent with the general verdict as to destroy the effect thereof, the former would certainly control, and the party against whom the verdict went would be entitled to judgment non obstante veredicto. The question here is: Would a finding favorable to the defendant upon any of the foregoing questions of fact have been inconsistent with the general verdict found? We cannot see where or how there could be any incongruity between the conclusion of the jury as manifested by the general verdict and an answer favorable to the defendant to any of the questions proposed, assuming that the jury would have so answered them. However answered, therefore, we think the findings on the proposed special questions of fact would have been immaterial. It is not contended that the woodpile was an obstruction to the free use of the highway in the usual and customary manner; nor that the accident would not have happened if the horse had been under control and driven in the usual and customary manner of driving horses; nor that the accident was not partly due to the "running away" of the horse; nor that the woodpile had anything to do with the horse becoming frightened and running away; nor that the highway, at the point where defendant piled its wood, was not the main traveled portion of the road and not sufficiently wide and safe for the usual, ordinary, and customary travel therein by horses under control. The contention is, as we hold is his right, that the traveler is entitled to the use of the entire width of the highway as against the interference of private persons and corporations, if he desires to so use it, or in case it becomes necessary to so use it by reason of the happening of such a contingency, so liable to arise at any time upon a highway environed as this, as occurred here. It is not claimed that the deceased was driving the mare, after she started to run, in the "usual and customary" way, in the sense in which those terms are ordinarily or colloquially used and understood; but it is contended that while so driving the mare over the public highway, as she had a right to do, the animal became frightened—an event likely to happen at any time under the circumstances—and that, by reason of such fright, proceeded over the road at an unusual rate of speed, and that, under those circumstances, she was entitled to the free use of the whole width of the highway, unobstructed or uninterrupted by the unauthorized and negligent acts of a private person, in which to manage, control, and probably restore the animal to a state of calmness and composure, without injury to herself or property. It would be absurd to say that the reining or driving of a "runaway" horse would be driving the animal "in the usual and customary manner of driving horses." The jury would probably have treated the question as calling for an answer in the sense in which the words "usual and customary" are commonly accepted and used, and such an answer would obviously have meant nothing more than that the deceased was not driving the animal at the usual gait, and therefore using only the physical force ordinarily necessary to guide an animal, attached to a buggy, over a road. And, if the animal had been "under control" in the usual sense of that phrase, she would not have been running with unusual speed, and it is therefore manifest that the jury could have consistently answered the question in the negative, and yet have intended nothing militating against or impairing the force of the general verdict returned. If the purpose of the special question was to ascertain from the jury, by a categorical answer thereto, whether the deceased had the animal "under control" in the sense that she was guiding and keeping it, while running, in the center of the highway, the question should have been more clearly phrased and specific. In the form in which it was requested it was misleading. The same reasoning applies to special questions 1 and 2, and, as to the third, it is not contended, nor could it be, that the "running away" of the horse was not a contributing cause of the accident and damage. This last question, in the form requested, was also misleading.

The motion for a nonsuit presented by the defendant, upon the close of plaintiff's original case, and denied by the court, was based upon grounds involving the vital points in the case herein discussed, and the ruling thereon was, of course, under the views we have expressed, proper.

The judgment is affirmed.

(6 Cal. App. 707)

BLAKELEY v. KINGSBURY. (Civ. 364.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California.)

Nov. 1, 1907.)

1. PUBLIC LANDS—DISPOSAL BY STATE—CONTEST—TIME.

Pol. Code, § 3414, provides that, when a contest arises concerning a certificate of purchase or other evidence of title before the register, the officer must, when either party demands a trial in the courts of the state, make an order referring the contest, etc. Held that, in the absence of a question involving the statute of limitations, a contest is in time if begun before the patent has been issued, and as a general rule, after such contest is begun, the state officers have no right to issue the patent, but must abide the judgment of the court having jurisdiction to determine the controversy by reason of the reference.

2. SAME—ADVERSE CLAIMS—RIGHT OF STATE TO PRESCRIBE METHOD OF DETERMINATION.

A state owning lands has the right to prescribe what steps shall be taken by one desiring to secure title and how adverse claims to the same tract shall be determined; and the question is one of legislative regulation and control.

3. SAME—RIGHT TO PATENT—EFFECT OF DELAY—FILING OF CONTEST.

Every intending purchaser of state lands is charged with notice that he must establish certain facts to secure the approval of the Surveyor General and make certain payments, and that, after a certain time, he may demand and secure his patent, providing a contest has not been filed, which imposes the additional duty of proving that the statements in the application to the Surveyor General are true, and, where an application to purchase has been approved by the Surveyor General, and there was a time during which the applicant might have secured the patent by surrendering the certificate of purchase before a contest was filed, by waiting until after the filing of a contest and transfer of the matter to the Superior Court before demanding patent, the applicant was too late.

4. SAME—STATUTORY PROVISIONS—PAYMENT.

Pol. Code, § 3476, relating to reclamation of state lands, provides that whenever the trustees or owners of lands certify that the works of reclamation are completed, or that $2 per acre has been expended thereon, the board of supervisors must certify such facts to the register. Section 3477 provides that the register must thereupon credit each purchaser in the district with payment in full for such lands, and the purchasers are entitled to patents therefor. Held, that these sections do not exclude the operation of section 3414, in reference to contests before the patent has been issued, to determine whether the claimant's verified application is true.

5. SAME—METHOD OF PAYMENT.

Whether a payment for public land has been made directly in coin or by reclamation does not affect the liability to a contest before the patent has been issued.

6. SAME—EFFECT OF PAYMENT.

An applicant to purchase public land cannot, by making complete payment, prevent or nullify a contest, so as to become the real owner of the land and render the state a mere trustee.

tee of the legal title, with the obligation to convey on demand after expiration of the proper time.

7. SAME—MANDAMUS—ISSUE OF PATENT.

Plaintiff made application to purchase certain state lands under Act March 24, 1893 (St. 1893, p. 341, c. 229), relating to sale of previously overflowed lands. She paid 20 per cent. of the purchase money and interest on the balance, and the Surveyor General issued her a certificate of purchase. Afterwards a reclamation district was formed, and the board of supervisors made an order adjudging that the work of reclamation was completed and the land claimed by plaintiff was credited with full payment. Subsequently other persons claimed portions of the land, and filed protests, together with demands that the conflicting claims be referred to the proper court for adjudication. The Surveyor General made an order referring the contests to the superior court, protests were issued and filed, and within 60 days plaintiff filed in that court complaint against each of the contestants, setting up the facts upon which she relied to establish her right. While these actions were pending she brought mandamus to compel the Surveyor General as register to prepare a patent for the land in question from the state to plaintiff for execution according to law, etc., together with a certificate that the laws in relation to the execution of the patent had been complied with; that payment had been made in full, and that plaintiff was entitled to the same. Held, that mandamus would not lie.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; J. W. Hughes, Judge.

Mandamus by Laura W. Blakeley against W. S. Kingsbury, Surveyor General, etc. From an order granting a peremptory writ, defendant appeals. Reversed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Malcolm Glenn, Asst. Atty. Gen., for appellant. H. P. Brown, Charles G. Lamberson, and Frank Lamberson, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. On the 10th day of December, 1903, plaintiff filed in the office of the Surveyor General and register of the land office her duly verified application to purchase from the state under the provisions of an act entitled, "An act regulating the sale of the lands uncovered by the recession or drainage of the waters of inland lakes and unsegregated swamp and overflowed lands and validating sales and surveys heretofore made" approved March 24, 1893 (St. 1893, p. 341, c. 229), all of section 15, in township 22 south, range 18 east, M. D. M., situated in Kings county, this state. The said application contained the statement of facts required by law. On June 10, 1904, the application was approved by the Surveyor General of the state, and on July 30, 1904, plaintiff paid 20 per cent. of the purchase money and the interest on the balance till January 1, 1905, and on August 5, 1904, the Surveyor General issued to plaintiff a certificate of purchase. Afterwards the board of supervisors of Kings county formed a reclamation district including all of said section 15. Plaintiff paid the assessments levied by said board on her land. On June 5, 1905, after proper proof was received, the said board of supervisors made an order adjudging that the work of reclamation of said district had been fully completed, and that the lands therein had been fully reclaimed, and the board directed the clerk of the board to certify said facts to the register of the state land office. This was done, and the said register made his return to the treasurer of the county of Kings crediting each tract of said land, including section 15, with full payment. July 26, 1905, C. W. Porter filed in the office of said Surveyor General an application for the northwest quarter of said section 15 with a duly verified protest against the issuance of any further evidence of title to the said quarter to plaintiff, together with a demand that the matter of the conflicting claims to the right to purchase said land be referred to the proper court for adjudication. On July 27, 1905, one R. R. Cadwell filed in the same office a similar protest in reference to the east half and the southwest quarter of said land, and a similar demand for reference. On the latter date the Surveyor General made an order referring said contests to the superior court of Kings county, and protests were regularly issued and filed, and within 60 days from the order of reference plaintiff filed in the superior court of said county a complaint against Porter and also one against Cadwell, in each of which she set forth the facts upon which she relied to establish her right to purchase all of said section 15. Both actions are still pending and undetermined in said superior court of Kings county. On the 12th day of December, 1905, plaintiff filed in the superior court of Sacramento county her affidavit and petition for a writ of mandate to compel the Surveyor General as register of the state land office "to prepare a patent from the state of California to plaintiff for execution according to law, for the land hereinbefore described * * * together with a certificate that the laws in relation to the execution of such patent have been complied with; that payment in full has been made and that the plaintiff herein is entitled to the same." An alternative writ was issued, and, an answer having been filed, a trial was had and the writ was made peremptory, from which the Surveyor General has appealed.

The law provides that the writ shall issue "to compel the performance of an act which the law specially enjoins as a duty resulting from an office, trust or station." Section 1085, Code Civ. Proc. The contention of appellant is that under the circumstances of the case the law not only did not impose upon him the duty to issue the patent, but that, by the order of reference, he became divested of authority to proceed any further in the matter of confirmation of plaintiff's title, and that the whole question was relegated to the said superior court of Kings county which thereby acquired exclusive jurisdiction to determine to whom the patent should be issued. The basis for the contention is section 3414 of the Political Code, which provides: "When a contest arises concerning the approval of a survey or location before the Surveyor General or concerning a certificate of purchase or other evidence of title before the register, the officer before whom the contest is made may, when the question involved is as to the survey, or one purely of fact * * * proceed to hear and determine the same; but when, in the judgment of the officer, a question of law is involved, or when either party demands a trial in the courts of the state, he must make an order referring the contest to the district [superior] court of the county in which the land is situated and must enter such order in a record book in his office." As to the subsequent proceedings, section 3413 provides that: "After such order is made either party may bring an action in the superior court of the county in which the land in question is situated to determine the conflict, and the production of a certified copy of the entry, made by either the Surveyor General or the register, gives the court full and complete jurisdiction to hear and determine the action." These provisions have been considered more than once by the Supreme Court. It has been held that the jurisdiction of the court depends upon the order of reference. Keema v. Doherty, 51 Cal. 7; Vance v. Evans, 52 Cal. 93; Danielwitz v. Temple, 55 Cal. 42.

Again, the statute is silent as to when the contest before the Surveyor General must be initiated; but—disregarding the question of the statute of limitations which does not arise here—the contest is not too late if begun before the patent has been issued; and as a general rule applicable to state lands, after such contest is inaugurated the state officers have no right to issue the patent but must await the result of the proceedings brought, in other words, must abide by the judgment of the court having jurisdiction by reason of the order of reference to determine the controversy between the parties. People v. Carrick, 51 Cal. 325; Gilson v. Robinson, 68 Cal. 539, 10 Pac. 193; Garfield v. Wilson, 74 Cal. 176, 15 Pac. 620; McFaul v. Pfankuch, 98 Cal. 400, 33 Pac. 397; Youle v. Thomas, 146 Cal. 544, 80 Pac. 714. See, also, Miller v. Engle, 3 Cal. App. 325, 85 Pac. 159. It is true that before the contests here were filed there was a period of about 45 days during which respondent, by surrendering the certificate of purchase, could have secured the patent. Pol. Code, §§ 3519, 3521. As the application of plaintiff was approved by the Surveyor General June 10, 1904, the course suggested was open to her at any time between June 10, 1905, and July 28, 1905, when Porter's application was filed. But she slept on her rights until October 28th following when she demanded the patent. This was too late, as we have seen, because in obedience to the requirements of the statute the Surveyor General had transferred the matter to the superior court of Kings county.

But respondent's contention is not that she is entitled to a patent because more than one year had expired after the approval of her application to purchase and before a contest was filed, but when, in the language of her brief, "her application was approved there was then and there a contract entered into between her and the state, by which, if she caused the land to be reclaimed as provided by the laws relating to the reclamation of such land, she would after the statutory period of one year be entitled to the issuance of a patent for said land. And the fact that respondent had thus by the lapse of time become entitled to a patent, coupled with the fact that she had, before the expiration of the year, paid in full for the land by reclaiming it, gave to the respondent the absolute right to a patent for said land." But respondent seems to be begging the question. She assumes the very proposition in dispute, that, when the year has elapsed and she has paid for the land, the Surveyor General must issue the patent, although in the meantime he had transferred the contest to the superior court in consequence of the question having arisen in the orderly way as to whom must be issued "other evidence of title." It is clear that the rights of the plaintiff and the duty of the defendant must be determined by a consideration of the provisions of the statute. The question is one entirely of legislative regulation and control. The state in its sovereign capacity owns these lands, and it has the incontestable right to prescribe what steps shall be taken by an individual desiring to secure title in himself and how adverse claims to the same tract shall be determined.

We are not concerned as to the doctrine of estoppel, nor is it a case where payment alone entitles the claimant to a patent. Every intending purchaser is charged with notice that he must establish certain facts to secure the approval of the Surveyor General, that he must make certain payments, and that, after the expiration of a certain time, he may demand and secure his patent upon the contingency, however, that in the meantime a contest may be filed which shall impose upon the claimant the additional duty of proving to the satisfaction of a superior court that the statements in his application to the Surveyor General are true. These provisions of the law enter into and become a part of the contract with the state. It is true that the Legislature has provided a complete scheme for the reclamation of this species of state lands, and has intrusted to certain local officers the administration of its details, and has required of them important duties and has directed that "whenever the trustees, or owners of lands, if there be no trustees, certify under oath to the board of supervisors who form the district and show to their satisfaction that the works of reclamation are completed, or that two dollars per acre in gold coin has been expended on the works of reclamation; the board of supervisors must thereupon credit each purchaser in the district with payment in full for such lands and the purchasers are entitled to patents therefor." Pol. Code, §§ 3476, 3477. But there is nothing herein which excludes the operation of the general provision in reference to contests before the patent has been issued to determine whether the claimant has stated the truth in his verified application to the Surveyor General. He is "entitled to the patent" upon the assumption, of course, that he has complied with the law, and has not committed perjury, but, if the issue as before indicated has been properly referred, he must meet it in court. Is there anything in the said act of 1893 excluding the operation as to claimants thereunder of the general provision of the law in reference to contests? The only allusion to the question is found in section 4, which provides that "no application to purchase land under this act shall be approved by the Surveyor General until the expiration of ninety days from the filing thereof in his office and meanwhile the land shall be subject to the adverse claim of any actual settler who has resided thereon when the said application was filed."

In Wrinkle v. Wright, 136 Cal. 494, 69 Pac. 150, it is said that "the above provision was only intended for the purpose of giving those who were actual settlers at the time the application was filed the preferred right to purchase"; and it would seem to be contemplated that within the 90 days this preferred right of "actual settlers" might be established before the Surveyor General who would thereupon decline to approve the original application to purchase. In the Wrinkle Case, supra, it is further stated in regard to this act that "section 1 prescribes the conditions which entitle a party to purchase; and any applicant to purchase may show in a contest that he possesses the qualifications which entitle him to purchase, and that the party with whom he is contesting does not possess the requisite qualifications. The right to contest follows from the right of a qualified applicant to purchase."

As to the liability of a contest before the patent has been actually issued, the law makes no distinction between a claimant who has paid the purchase price directly in coin, and him who has been subjected to his just proportion of the expense of reclamation, and there certainly can be no difference in principle.

Respondent's argument that she is entitled to a patent because she has a vested right to it by reason of having complied with the requirements of the law would be of compelling force if addressed to the court wherein the aforesaid actions are pending; but, when presented to this forum in this proceeding, it ignores the fact that the Legislature has provided the other course for the determination of whether she has in fact complied with the requirement of the statute. The following cases are cited by respondent as upholding her contention that, after the payment in full for the land, she became the owner and the state a mere trustee of the legal title, which it was bound to convey on demand. People v. Shearer, 30 Cal. 647; Bludworth v. Lake (No. 1) 33 Cal. 262; Pratt v. Crane, 58 Cal. 533; McCabe v. Goodwin, 106 Cal. 488, 39 Pac. 941; Pioneer Land Co. v. Maddux, 109 Cal. 640, 42 Pac. 295, 50 Am. St. Rep. 67; Stark v. Starr, 6 Wall. (U. S.) 402, 18 L. Ed. 925; Huff v. Doyle, 93 U. S. 558, 23 L. Ed. 975; Wirth v. Branson, 98 U. S. 118, 25 L. Ed. 86; Benson Mining Co. v. Alta Mining Co., 145 U. S. 432, 12 Sup. Ct. 877, 36 L. Ed. 762. They are not in point here for reasons already stated. When respondent proves in the suits pending in Kings county that she has complied with the statutory requirement, under the authority of those cases, the judgment must necessarily be in her favor; and it must be presumed that the proper officers in consonance with said judgment will do their duty and issue to her the patent. Respondent's argument that because of full payment she has a vested right to the patent would in effect lead to this: Within fifty days after the approval of the application by the Surveyor General (Pol. Code, § 3440) an applicant if he desires may make a complete payment, and thereby prevent or nullify a contest although the patent could not be issued until 10 months thereafter. This view is not countenanced by the decisions we have already considered. Again, the application for a writ of mandate seems an unnecessary proceeding. The suits begun in Kings county afford a specific and adequate remedy for respondent and one which is equally convenient, beneficial, and effective as the proceeding by mandamus. It is true that the Surveyor General is not therein made a party, but the contestants are, and they will be bound by any judgment rendered therein, although not affected by the judgment in the case at bar; and it must be assumed that due effect will be given to the proceedings and judgment in said court. At least the duty of the Surveyor General to prepare the patent and certificate as claimed by respondent is not so clear under the circumstances as to justify the issuance of the writ of mandate.

Besides, since the suit in the said superior court of Kings county was brought by respondent and the questions involved can be properly and finally determined in that proceeding, respondent should be held to have voluntarily selected that forum in which to litigate her rights and she might well be considered as estopped by her own conduct from afterwards seeking to transfer the controversy to another jurisdiction and invoking other forms of relief. Spelling on Injunction and Other Extraordinary Remedies, § 1376, and cases cited.

At any rate, we find ourselves unable to agree with the learned trial judge that the writ should issue, and the judgment is therefore reversed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; HART, J.

SUMMERS v. GEER et al.

(Supreme Court of Oregon. Dec. 17, 1907.)

1. PUBLIC LANDS—DISPOSAL—OFFICES OF LAND COMMISSIONER AND AGENT.

The Governor was made land commissioner in 1873 by Hill's Ann. Laws 1892, § 3595, with power to locate all lands to which the state was entitled. Subsequently, by Act Feb. 18, 1890 (Laws 1890, p. 156), which repealed section 3597 and its amendments of 1895 (Laws 1895, p. 7) and 1899 (Laws 1899, p. 94), providing for an agent's appointment and fixing his duties, the Governor was made land commissioner, with authority to appoint such agents as might be necessary in the performance of his duties, the agents thus having no specified duties other than to aid the commissioner in locating the lands. Held, that the commissioner and agents were not agents of the state for the sale of state lands, and, in an action against them for defrauding a person desiring to buy state lands, allegations that they neglected to prepare and keep for public use, a list of base land, and that they refused to receive applications for the purchase of indemnity land, etc., are immaterial, since those matters were not within their duties.

2. SAME—AUTHORITY TO SELL LAND—SELLING LIEU LAND NOT YET SELECTED.

Hill's Ann. Laws 1892, § 3597, as amended in 1895 (Laws 1895, p. 7), makes it a duty of the state land board to proceed immediately to select lieu lands and perfect title thereto in the state, and keep a list of such as are for sale, etc. B. & C. Comp. § 3798 (amendment of 1899), provides that applications to purchase state lands can be made only to the state land board by filing the application with its clerk. Hill's Ann. Laws 1892, § 3619, authorizing a prospective purchaser to ascertain lands lost to the state, and have the land board select other lands desired by him in lieu thereof, was repealed in 1895, since which time the law has not contemplated sales of indemnity lands or applications for their purchase until they have been selected and title perfected in the state. Held, that the land agent or board has no authority to make contracts for the state to sell lieu land not yet selected and to which title has not been perfected, and, if it were optional with the state land agent or board to select such lieu land as a prospective purchaser suggests, upon base to be established by the purchaser, board, or agent, the approval by the United States Land Department of the selection would be at the applicant's risk.

3. FRAUD—ACTION—COMPLAINT—SUFFICIENCY.

In an action for fraud against a state land commissioner and agents, a count of a complaint which alleges that plaintiff was led by two of the defendants to buy information of the other that certain school sections lost to the state were mineral in character, when, in fact, they were not mineral in character, and the information was false, and that having selected lieu land thereon his application was not approved by the United States Land Department, but does not allege that the defendants by whom he was induced to purchase the information knew the kind of information possessed by the one selling it, nor in any way became liable as guarantors of or parties to the representations made him, does not state a cause of action against them.

4. PLEADING—DUPLICITY.

A count of a complaint in an action for fraud alleged that one of the defendants, a state land agent, with intent to defraud plaintiff, falsely represented himself to be in possession of private records and information as to mineral lands for which the state was entitled to indemnity selections, which information he offered to sell to plaintiff, and pretended that for a certain sum he would furnish to the other land agent for plaintiff information as to the whereabouts of certain available mineral base land for which indemnity lands were due the state, and which would be approved by the Land Department and Secretary of the Interior, all of which was done with knowledge of its falsity, and that he thereby fraudulently obtained plaintiff's money. Held that, though the terms of a contract are set up as constituting part of the means by which the fraud was consummated, the count was not duplicitous, since recovery was sought only upon the fraud and deceit, while to render a pleading duplicitous it must appear that two or more causes of action are relied upon for a single recovery.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Marion County; Geo. H. Burnett, Judge.

Action by George Summers against T. T. Geer and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed in part, and reversed and remanded in part.

See 85 Pac. 514.

This suit is brought to recover as damages money obtained from plaintiff by conspiracy and fraud. The complaint consists of 340 pages, and is even too lengthy to include the first count in this statement. It will be sufficient to state generally the ground of plaintiff's claim. From January, 1890, to January, 1903, defendant T. T. Geer was Governor and ex officio land commissioner of the state of Oregon, and defendants L. B. Geer and W. H. Odell were state land agents, appointed by the Governor. During that time, especially in 1902, defendants conspired for the purpose of defrauding all persons desiring to purchase indemnity lands from the state by withholding information from them as to the state's rights to indemnity lands in lieu of section 16 and 36, lost to the state by the creation of forest and Indian reserves, adjustment of state boundaries, and survey of nonnavigable lakes, of which there were 82,000 acres, called "lieu land" base. Defendants announced to the public that the state had exhausted its supply of such base lands, and, for the purpose of aiding defendant W. H. Odell in the sale of information of such sections lost to the state by reason of their mineral character, called "mineral" base, it was the custom of the said T. T. and L. B. Geer to require applicants for the purchase of indemnity lands to furnish base at their own expense, and to refer them to W. H. Odell for information as to such base, to refuse applications for the purchase of lieu land, except through W. H. Odell, and to refuse to give information to applicants as to nonmineral base—all alleged to have been done pursuant to such conspiracy and for the purpose of aiding W. H. Odell to sell such information as to pretended mineral base, and with knowledge of the facts, that T. T. and L. B. Geer failed to prepare and keep for public use a list of such base lands for which indemnity is due the state. The said L. B. Geer was accustomed to receive the applications to purchase, and collect from such applicants the first payment of the purchase money, and also the compensation to W. H. Odell for such information prior to the selection of said lieu lands, and hold and retain the same until the indemnity lists were furnished the United States Land Office, and when approved by the local land officers to file such applications with the clerk, and cause certificates of sale to issue thereon to such purchaser before such selections were approved by the General Land Office. The allegations of the complaint relating to the conspiracy on the part of T. T. and L. B. Geer were alleged at great length and with particularity. The complaint further states that, pursuant to such conspiracy, W. H. Odell fraudulently represented to the plaintiff that he had information and knowledge of 320 acres of mineral base which he would furnish to plaintiff for \$480, and that by reason of the acts and representations of defendants, and relying upon the same and believing them to be true, plaintiff paid to said defendant W. H. Odell the said sum of \$480 for such information of alleged mineral base, viz., the E. $\frac{1}{2}$ of section 16, township 14 S., range 31 E., W. M., and, based thereon, plaintiff applied to said L. B. Geer for the purchase of 320 acres in section 32, township 11 S., range 14 E., W. M., from the state as lieu land, and said L. B. Geer procured from the clerk a certificate of sale therefor in favor of plaintiff; that plaintiff was ignorant of the fact that W. H. Odell was an agent of the state; that said base, so furnished by W. H. Odell, was not mineral in character, and had not been lost to the state, and could not be used as base for the purchase of lieu lands; and plaintiff's application was rejected, and the certificate issued to him canceled. Plaintiff claims damages in the sum of \$480, with interest, and punitive damages in the sum of \$1,000. There are 25 other counts in the complaint, all based upon the same allegations as the first, except that they are upon claims in favor of other persons and assigned to plaintiff. Motions were filed to strike out all the allegations which alleged any acts of defendants T. T. and L. B. Geer tending to show their custom with, or representations to, the public, the greater portion of which were sustained. A general demurrer to the complaint was filed by the defendant, W. H. Odell, on the ground that several causes of action have been improperly united, and that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, also by the defendants T. T. and L. B. Geer, for the reason that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against them, which were sustained by the court, judgment being rendered thereon dismissing the action.

M. E. Pogue, for appellant. Geo. G. Bingham, John W. Reynolds, and A. O. Condit, for respondents.

EAKIN, J. (after stating the facts as above). It becomes necessary to notice the provisions of the statute as to the power and duties of the land commissioner and land agent. The Governor was first made land commissioner in 1878, with power to locate all lands to which the state was entitled (Hill's Ann. Laws 1892, § 3595), and by section 3597 he was authorized to appoint an agent to select state lands. This latter section was amended in 1895 by giving more specific directions as to the powers and duties of such land agent, and also requiring the state land board to ascertain all the losses sustained by the state by reason of the occupation of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections and to select lieu lands therefor, and "that a list of such lands so selected be kept in a book accessible to every one, in the clerk's office * * * accurately describing the lands for sale and the land for which it was taken in lieu." This section is a part of chapter 52 of Hill's Annotated Laws of 1892, and was again amended by the Legislature in 1899 with additional duties upon the state land agent as to such lieu lands and giving to him general supervision of all lands acquired by the state by foreclosure of mortgages, etc. This amendment was approved and became a law February 17, 1899. Laws 1899, p. 94. At the same term of the Legislature a new act was passed relating to the selection and sale of state lands, which was approved by the Governor and became a law on February 18, 1899 (Laws 1899, p. 156), expressly repealing chapter 52, of which section 3597 was a part. This act of February 18, 1899, appointed the Governor as land commissioner, and empowers him "to locate the lands to which the state of Oregon is entitled," and he "is authorized to appoint such agent or agents as may be necessary in the performance of his duties."

Applications to purchase state lands can be made only to the state land board, and must be filed with the clerk of the board, and the purchase price paid to him, but since February 18, 1899, until February, 1907, the state land agent has had no specified duties other than to aid the commissioner in locating the lands to which the state is entitled. Therefore the allegations in the complaint that the defendants T. T. and L. B. Geer neglected to prepare or file, and keep for public use, a list of such base land, and that they refused to receive applications for the purchase of indemnity lands, or required applicants to furnish base at their own expense, and other matters with reference to certain customs and usages of defendants, are wholly immaterial, as these matters were not within their duties or province. They were not agents of the state for the sale of state lands. Section 3597, Hill's Ann. Laws 1892, as amended in 1895 (Laws 1895, p. 7), made it a duty of the state land board to proceed immediately to select such lieu lands, and perfect title thereto in the state, and keep a list of such that are for sale, together with the base upon which the selection is made. This, however, was to be a list of selections to which title had been perfected and of the lands for sale. By section 3296, B. & C. Comp. (amendment of 1899), applications to purchase state lands can be made only to the state land board by filing the same with the clerk of the board. It is alleged that T. T. and L. B. Geer directed and advised the clerk of the state land board to refer all applicants for lieu lands to L. B. Geer; but the clerk was not the clerk of the Governor or agent, and they had no control or authority over him. The burden of plaintiff's allegations upon the matter of the fraud of T. T. and L. B. Geer is that it was their custom and usage to represent to the public and plaintiff that there was no available non-mineral base and to refer all applicants to W. H. Odell for information as to mineral base, and that plaintiff, having knowledge of this custom, applied to W. H. Odell for such information to his damage.

In 1902 there was no law authorizing a prospective purchaser to ascertain lands lost to the state, and based thereon have the board select other lands desired by him in lieu thereof. The act of 1887 (Hill's Ann. Laws 1892, § 3619) did authorize such a proceeding, but this was repealed by the act of 1895, supra, since which time the law has not contemplated sales of indemnity lands or applications for their purchase until the same have been selected and title thereto perfected in the state. It was not within the power or authority of the agent or board to make contracts for the state to sell lieu lands not yet selected and to which the state had not perfected title. It may have been optional with the state land agent or board to select such lieu land as some prospective purchaser might suggest upon base to be established by such purchaser, board, or agent; but such was not made their duty, and the approval by the United States Land Department of such selection would be at the risk of such applicant. Much that is alleged as against T. T. and L. B. Geer is immaterial by reason of the terms of these statutes. Plaintiff seeks to recover, not because he was induced or compelled to pay for information as to available base, but because of the fraud by which he was led to buy information that certain school sections were mineral, when, in fact, such information was false, and such lands were not mineral in character, and because of his consequent loss of the money paid therefor and failure to secure lieu land thereon. It is not alleged as against T. T. and L. B. Geer that they knew the kind of information possessed by W. H. Odell as to the mineral character of the land, or that they represented that the land was mineral, or in any way made themselves liable as guarantors or parties to the representations of W. H. Odell. Therefore the complaint is insufficient to create a liability as against T. T. and L. B. Geer; and the demurrer was properly sustained.

As to the sufficiency of the complaint as against W. H. Odell, it is alleged that, with intent to defraud plaintiff, he falsely represented himself to be in the possession of private records and information as to the whereabouts of large tracts of mineral lands, for which the state of Oregon was entitled to indemnity selections, which information he offered to sell to the plaintiff; and that he falsely represented and pretended to plaintiff that for the sum of $480 he would furnish for plaintiff to L. B. Geer, state land agent, information as to the whereabouts of 320 acres of available mineral base land, and that such lands were mineral in character and valid base, for which indemnity lands were due the state of Oregon, and would be approved by the Land Department and Secretary of the Interior, all of which, it is alleged, was done with knowledge of its falsity, and that he thereby fraudulently obtained plaintiff's money. It is claimed that this was objectionable for duplicity in alleging upon breach of contract and upon fraud and deceit. To constitute duplicity in pleading, it is not enough that it appears therefrom that the plaintiff has more than one cause of action. It must appear that he relies on more than one as the ground of a single recovery. It is not objectionable because he sets up the terms of a contract as constituting part of the means by which the fraud was consummated, so long as he does not seek to recover upon it. Bingham v. Lipman, 40 Or. 363, 67 Pac. 98; Raymond v. Sturgis, 23 Conn. 134. But we think the complaint clearly shows that the plaintiff is relying upon the fraud and deceit, and not upon a breach of contract. We understand the rule to be that a pleading is duplicitous only when it so alleges both the contract and deceit that, upon the trial, one recovery may be had upon either the contract or the deceit; but the complaint here plainly discloses that the recovery is sought only for the deceit, and states a good cause of action against W. H. Odell, and his demurrer was improperly sustained.

The judgment, therefore, will be sustained as to T. T. and L. B. Geer, and reversed as to W. H. Odell, and remanded to the lower court for such further proceedings as may be proper and not inconsistent with this opinion.

(50 Or. 398)

SUTHERLIN v. BLOOMER.

(Supreme Court of Oregon. Dec. 17, 1907.)

1. APPEAL—EXCEPTIONS—TRIAL DE NOVO.

Under the express terms of B. & C. Comp. §§ 406, 535, on appeal suits in equity are triable de novo on the transcript and evidence accompanying the appeal, and accordingly exceptions to the rulings on such suits are unnecessary, except in the instance provided for by section 406, where the court may refuse to permit testimony offered to be taken over its rulings sustaining objections thereto, in which event an exception to such refusal appearing in the record is sufficient to show no waiver of the right claimed is intended. Hence in equity appeals a bill of exceptions is unnecessary, and one cannot be considered, and, when accompanying the transcript, must be treated as surplusage, except in so far as the testimony there certified may be applied in determining the issues involved.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 3637-3644.]

2. SAME—EQUITY—OBJECTIONS TO TESTIMONY—NECESSITY FOR.

In equity suits, in order that objections to the admission of testimony may be of avail on appeal, they must be taken and noted in the trial court.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 2, Appeal and Error, §§ 1258-1277.]

3. SAME—RECORDING TESTIMONY OVER RULING.

Where, in equity cases, testimony is tendered, but objections thereto are sustained, the party offering it may have it taken and recorded over the court's rulings by offering to pay the additional expense incurred thereby in the event the proffered testimony shall finally be held inadmissible.

4. SAME—REMANDING FOR ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

Where, in equity cases, testimony is proffered, objections thereto sustained, and notwithstanding a request that it be taken and recorded, as provided in B. & C. Comp. § 406, the court refuses to permit the testimony to be taken, and it appears on appeal that the rejected testimony is essential to a proper determination of the issues, the case may be remanded, with directions to admit the testimony.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, § 4392.]

5. SAME.

When, in an equity case, objections are sustained to testimony offered but recorded regardless of such ruling, and, relying upon the correctness of the ruling, no proof is offered in response to the testimony, and on appeal it shall be determined that the court erred in sustaining the objections thereto, the cause may be remanded for further proceedings, if deemed essential to a proper determination of the parties' rights.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, § 4392.]

6. SAME—REVIEW—QUESTIONS PRESENTED.

Where defendant in an equity suit manifested no desire to have testimony reported over the trial court's rulings, as might have been done under the express terms of B. & C. Comp. § 406, questions as to the admissibility of the excluded testimony are not presented on appeal, except in so far as necessary to a review of other errors assigned.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 2905-2909.]

7. ACCORD AND SATISFACTION—SETTLEMENT OF CAUSES—CONSIDERATION.

Any action, suit, or proceeding may be settled by accord and satisfaction thereof by a separate agreement, if made for a valuable consideration.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 1, Accord and Satisfaction, §§ 14-20.]

8. SAME—INTENTION.

Whether an agreement for the settlement of a suit or the performance thereof shall constitute a satisfaction depends upon the intention of the parties thereto; the rule applying to oral contracts, if executed, as well as written ones.

9. EVIDENCE—PAROL—ADMISSIBILITY TO AFFECT WRITING.

Parol testimony is inadmissible to contradict, add to, detract from, or vary a written contract which is clear and explicit, and contains no latent ambiguities.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 20, Evidence, § 1756.]

10. SAME—CONSIDERATION.

Where the statement in a written agreement as to the consideration consists of a specific promise to perform certain acts, it cannot be modified by parol evidence; and so, where a written agreement recited the release of attachments as a consideration, but states no basis for an inference that the actions were to be dismissed, parol testimony is inadmissible to show the latter fact.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 20, Evidence, §§ 1912-1928.]

11. PLEADING—ANSWER—INSUFFICIENCY—FAILURE TO DEMUR.

The insufficiency of an answer may be urged in opposition to defendant's motion for judgment on the pleadings in the lower court or on appeal, though no demurrer was filed thereto.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 39, Pleading, §§ 1339, 1375.]

12. SAME—PLEA IN ABATEMENT—CONSTRUCTION.

Since pleas in abatement do not question the merits, but merely tend to delay the remedy, they are not favored, and much strictness is applied to them, and they will not be aided in construction by any intendment. With them correctness of form is a matter of substance, and any defect of form is fatal.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 39, Pleading, § 219.]

13. SAME.

Where matter concludes in bar, it must be so treated, and its character must be determined not from the subject-matter of the plea, but from its conclusion or prayer.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 39, Pleading, §§ 219-230.]

14. SAME—WAIVER OF PLEA.

By not pleading a contract in abatement, defendant waived any right to rely upon it for that purpose, and may not insist that under the contract the decree against him was premature.

15. APPEAL—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—FINDINGS.

Under B. & C. Comp. § 406, requiring findings on all material issues in equity cases, and providing that on appeal the cause shall be tried anew without reference to such findings, failure to make findings is not reversible error, where the transcript discloses all the proceedings had and evidence taken below, and especially where the complaining party does not appear to have been prejudiced.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 4234-4239.]

16. TRIAL—FINDINGS AND CONCLUSIONS OF LAW—WHEN NOT NECESSARY.

B. & C. Comp. § 406, requiring the court in equity cases to make findings of fact and conclusions of law, does not contemplate that findings of fact and conclusions of law be made by the trial court, where judgment is had on the pleadings or for want of an answer.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Douglas County; J. W. Hamilton, Judge.

Suit by R. Sutherland against Thomas C. Bloomer to foreclose a chattel mortgage. From a decree for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

This is a suit to foreclose a chattel mortgage on furniture and other property owned by, and in the possession of, the defendant, as mortgagor; the chattels involved being in what is known as the "McClallen House," in Roseburg, Or., which was at the time the proceedings were begun being conducted by him as a hotel under an unexpired lease thereon. The complaint is in the usual form, and demands judgment for $5,000, with interest, costs, and disbursements, including $250 attorney fees, together with a decree of foreclosure to satisfy the sums demanded. Three months after service of summons defendant answered, admitting that on the date of the filing of the suit he was indebted to plaintiff in the sum mentioned in the complaint, except as to attorney fees, concerning which he denies that $250, or any other sum, is reasonable to be adjudged by the court for the prosecution of the suit. For a further, separate, and affirmative answer he alleges: "That on the 19th day of August, 1905, the said plaintiff and the defendant herein, and one Chan Hi, the Douglas County Bank, and the H. Marks Company mutually entered into an agreement in full accord and satisfaction of the said indebtedness set forth in plaintiff's complaint, which agreement was in writing and was in words and figures as follows, to wit: 'This indenture, made and entered into this 19th day of August A. D., 1905, by and between Thos. C. Bloomer, of Roseburg, Douglas County, Oregon, the party of the first part, and J. R. Sutherlin, Chan Hi, the H. Marks Co., a corporation, and the Douglas County Bank, a corporation, the parties of the second part, witnesseth, that whereas each of said parties of the second part is a creditor of the party of the first part; and whereas on the 18th day of August, 1905, the three last named of the parties of the second part filed in the circuit court of the State of Oregon for Douglas County actions at law against said party of the first part and that writs of attachment have been issued therein in favor of the H. Marks Co., and the Douglas County Bank and all the property of the party of the first part has been levied upon under said writs of attachment: Now, therefore, in consideration of the release of said writs of attachment aforesaid by the Douglas County Bank and by H. Marks Co., the said Thos. C. Bloomer has sold, assigned, set over and delivered to all of the said parties of the second part in trust for each of said parties jointly and severally, that certain lease of the McClallen House property which said lease of said property was executed by Electa McClallen, on the 9th day of May, 1901, in favor of M. Schmidt, and by said M. Schmidt on the 18th day of November, 1903, assigned to J. R. Sutherlin, and thereafter and on the 31st day of March, 1904, assigned by said J. R. Sutherlin to Thos. C. Bloomer, the first party named herein. Now the conditions of this sale and assignments are such that: whereas, there is due to the said J. R. Sutherlin, one of the parties of the second part, named herein, on a certain note given by the party of the first part to said J. R. Sutherlin on the 31st day of March, 1904, for the sum of $5000, bearing interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum an unpaid balance of ——— dollars; and whereas there is due to Chan Hi, one of the parties of the second part named herein, from the party of the first part the sum of $1355; and whereas there is due from the party of the first part to the H. Marks Co., the sum of $781.83 bearing interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum from August 15, 1905; and whereas, there is due from the party of the first part to the Douglas County Bank, one of the parties of the second part herein, an unpaid balance of a promissory note of $300 bearing interest at 6 per cent. per annum after July 31, 1905: Now, therefore, should the party of the first part continue in the conduct and management of the said McClallen House property and conduct the same as a first-class hotel and after defraying all current expenses necessary in the conduct of said business, and of the net proceeds of said business pay into the Douglas County Bank for the pro rata use and benefit of the said second parties, according to the amount of their respective claims, until each and all of such claims are fully paid, satisfied, and discharged, together with all costs heretofore incurred and which may hereafter accrue by reason of such claims; then this sale and assignment shall be null and void, otherwise to remain in full force and effect. It is hereby fully agreed and understood and made a part of this contract and one of the conditions to its faithful performance, that Bert Westbrook, the present clerk of the said McClallen House, is to remain in his present position as agent of the parties of the second part; that he, the said Bert Westbrook, is to keep the books of the said McClallen business, under the terms of this contract and to see that the payments herein conditioned are fully and fairly made; that any violation of this last condition will work a forfeiture of this entire contract. Given under our hands and seals this 19th day of August, 1905. Thos. C. Bloomer. [Seal.] J. R. Sutherlin. [Seal.] Chan Hi. [Seal.] H. Marks Co. [Seal.] Douglas County Bank, by J. H. Booth, Cashier. [Seal.] Signed, sealed, and delivered in the presence of W. W. Cardwell.' That the said plaintiff accepted the said agreement and security in full satisfaction of said claims set out in said complaint, which said claims mentioned in said complaint are the same as set forth in said agreement. That said agreement is still in force and effect and defendant has not violated the terms thereof, and that plaintiff has accepted part payment under the terms thereof. That all moneys due under said agreement have been paid in accordance with the terms thereof, and that there is nothing now due under said contract. Wherefore defendant prays judgment and decree herein dismissing plaintiff's complaint and for such other and further relief as may be meet and equitable and defendant will ever pray." Some time after the filing of the answer, and during a regular term of court, defendant moved for judgment on the pleadings, alleging failure on the part of plaintiff either to reply or demur to the answer. Afterwards, during the same term, but prior to the disposal of the motion, plaintiff filed a demurrer to the answer, which, together with defendant's motion, was overruled. Plaintiff then replied, admitting the execution of the contract as alleged, but denying that it was executed or accepted in satisfaction of the claim involved. At the trial plaintiff introduced evidence relative to attorney fees, and rested. Defendant then offered testimony tending to prove that the contract set out was intended to be given in full satisfaction of the claim and mortgage mentioned in the complaint; that the written agreement given in his answer was accepted by plaintiff in full satisfaction thereof; and that, as an additional consideration to that stated in the written instrument for its execution, plaintiff agreed to dismiss the foreclosure suit. Objection was made to this testimony as being an attempt to vary by parol the terms of a written instrument. Defendant, for the same purpose, also offered proof as to the value of the lease assigned to plaintiff and referred to in the contract, which offer was objected to as being incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial. Plaintiff's objections to all the testimony offered by the defendant were sustained, and the evidence offered was excluded by the court. A decree was entered for plaintiff, from which defendant appeals. The errors assigned and here urged are (1) the overruling of the motion for judgment on the pleadings; (2) the excluding of the testimony offered by defendant; (3) the failure of the court to make any findings upon which to base a decree.

Albert Abraham, for appellant. W. W. Cardwell, for respondent.

KING, C. (after stating the facts as above). This cause appears to have been tried, evidence offered, exceptions taken to the court's rulings thereon, and brought here on a bill of exceptions as in actions at law. However, our statute clearly provides that suits in equity on appeal shall be tried de novo on the transcript and evidence accompanying it. B. & C. Comp. §§ 406, 555; Robson v. Hamilton, 41 Or. 246, 69 Pac. 651; Powers v. Powers, 46 Or. 481, 80 Pac. 1038. It accordingly follows that exceptions to the rulings of the court in equity suits are unnecessary, save in the particular instance designated in B. & C. Comp. § 406, where the court may refuse to permit testimony offered to be taken over its rulings in sustaining objections thereto, in which event an exception to such refusal appearing in the record is sufficient to indicate that no waiver of the right claimed is intended. A bill of exceptions in suits in equity, therefore, cannot be considered on appeal, and, when accompanying the transcript, must be treated as surplusage, except in so far as the testimony there certified to may be applied in determining the issues involved. The objections taken as to evidence offered, if urged on appeal, may be considered; and where testimony is tendered, but objections to the interrogatories are sustained, and the party offering the testimony demands that it be taken and recorded over the court's rulings, as provided in B. & C. Comp. § 406, but, notwithstanding such request, the court refuses to permit the proffered testimony to be taken, the cause may be remanded, with directions to admit the desired testimony, provided the testimony rejected shall appear admissible or necessary to a proper determination of the issues involved; but, in no event, is a bill of exceptions necessary in equity appeals. Again, if the court sustains objections to interrogatories, but permits the witness to answer, and allows the response to be recorded over its rulings, and the opposite party, relying upon the correctness of the court's action, offers no proof in response to the testimony thus taken, and on appeal it shall be determined that the court erred in sustaining the objections thereto, the appellate court may, if deemed essential to a proper determination of the rights of the litigants, remand the cause for further proceedings. Robson v. Hamilton, 41 Or. 246, 69 Pac. 651. The record in this cause discloses all the evidence introduced by plaintiff, together with the questions asked by counsel for defendant with objections made thereto. The answers were not taken over the rulings of the court, nor did defendant so request, but proceeded as in a law action. Had defendant demanded that the questions be answered, and offered to pay the additional expense incurred thereby, then, since the questions asked appear with the court's ruling thereon together with counsel's statement as to the purpose of the interrogatories, to which objections were sustained, he would be in position to urge the alleged erroneous rulings of the court in this respect as grounds for remanding the cause for further proceedings; but, since he manifested no desire to have the testimony taken and reported over the rulings of the court, the question as to the admissibility of the excluded testimony is not properly before us for determination, except in so far as it may become necessary to a decision upon the first error assigned; and, since the transcript includes all proceedings except the points urged under the bill of exceptions, the points presented by the transcript of the judgment roll, including testimony taken, will be considered so far as entitled thereto under the record.

It is maintained that, inasmuch as the plaintiff was in default in pleading to the answer, the defendant's motion for judgment on the pleadings should have been sustained. This position appears to be based upon the theory that, notwithstanding the complaint alleges reasonable attorney fees, which is denied by the answer, the affirmative allegations in the answer are sufficient to preclude plaintiff's recovery of any portion of the claim named in the foreclosure suit, including attorney fees; and not having been denied by filing a reply, and no showing having been made as to the cause of the delay, a decree should be entered accordingly. The question as to whether it was within the power of the court to overrule the motion and allow plaintiff to file a reply or otherwise plead could be material here only in the event the answer states sufficient facts to entitle defendant to a dismissal of the foreclosure suit.

The question accordingly arises as to whether the affirmative allegations of the answer, which the failure to reply, for the purpose of the motion, admitted, state sufficient facts to entitle the defendant to a decree thereon. It appears well settled by the authorities that any action, suit, or proceeding may be settled by accord and satisfaction thereof by a separate and distinct agreement, if entered into for a valuable consideration; and as to whether the agreement or the performance thereof shall constitute a satisfaction depends upon the intention of the parties thereto. 1 Cyc. 336. And this is the rule with an oral contract, if executed, as well as when reduced to writing, but it is equally as well settled that when a contract between the parties is reduced to writing and such writing is clear and explicit, containing no latent ambiguities, parol evidence is not admissible, either to contradict, add to, detract from, or vary its terms. Edgar v. Golden, 36 Or. 448, 48 Pac. 1118, 60 Pac. 2; Ruckman v. Imbler Lbr. Co., 42 Or. 231, 70 Pac. 811; Hilgar v. Miller, 42 Or. 552, 72 Pac. 319. But it is argued that since the answer avers that there was a prior agreement whereby the contract set out in the answer should be accepted in full satisfaction of the claim specified in the suit, and that such agreement was a part of the consideration given to defendant by plaintiff, whereby defendant executed the instrument, and under which he permitted plaintiff to receive the lease to the hotel, and whereby he let plaintiff's agent, named in the writing, look after the collection of Sutherland's pro rata of the moneys coming to him under its terms, that this is sufficient, if true, to entitle him to a dismissal of the suit. While these facts are alleged, it will be observed that the answer also avers that the agreement entered into between plaintiff and defendant, together with Chan Hi, the H. Marks Company, and the Douglas County Bank, for the purpose of such accord and satisfaction, consisted of the written instrument quoted in the answer, thereby restricting the agreement relied upon to the one there specified. This clearly indicates that the contract, by which the satisfaction of the claims mentioned in the complaint was to be accomplished, is the written instrument referred to, and that it contains all the terms of an agreement between the parties, except the reference to the alleged additional consideration concerning the dismissal of the suit. It is true that this allegation is followed by one to the effect that plaintiff accepted the written contract and security referred to therein in full satisfaction of his claims; but when this statement is construed together with the averment relative to the dismissal of the suit, which it is urged was omitted from, and should have been included in, the contract, it can have reference only to the covenants contained in the writings between them as set out in full in the answer, and a careful examination of this instrument fails to disclose any intention of dismissing the original suit. In fact, it is clearly stated therein that the consideration on the part of plaintiff and others signing with him consisted of the release of the writs of attachment mentioned, and nothing is there stated from which it could be inferred that any of the suits or actions should be dismissed. On the contrary, it is especially provided, not only that all costs theretofore incurred, but all costs which might thereafter accrue, by reason of the claims involved in the suit and actions pending, should be paid by defendant, thereby indicating, by inference at least, that the suit and actions there named should remain in statu quo until the claims were fully paid in the manner specified in the written contract, or at least until a reasonable time had elapsed, or until the contract should become forfeited through some failure to comply with its terms. From any point of view, therefore, we can find nothing in the contract from which it can be inferred that there was any intention of dismissing either this suit or the actions mentioned prior to a full payment of the claims in controversy. But it is argued that it is always permissible to show by parol other and additional consideration than that specified in the contract, and that the averments are sufficient for that purpose; and this position is tenable where a monetary consideration is specified. Burkhart v. Hart, 36 Or. 586, 60 Pac. 205. But, in the case before us, the consideration specified in the written contract consists of certain acts to be performed; and the authorities are practically unanimous in holding that, where the statement in the written instrument as to the consideration is of a contractual nature, as where the consideration consists of a specific and direct promise by one of the parties to perform certain acts, it cannot be changed or modified by parol or extrinsic evidence. A party has a right to make the consideration of his agreement of the essence of the contract, and, when this is done, the consideration for the contract, with reference to its conclusiveness, must stand upon the same footing as its other provisions, and accordingly cannot be affected by the introduction of parol or extrinsic evidence. 17 Cyc. 661; Hilgar v. Miller, 42 Or. 555, 72 Pac. 319; Walter v. Dearing (Tex. Civ. App.) 65 S. W. 380; Cheesman v. Nicholl, 18 Colo. App. 174, 70 Pac. 797; Ind. Union R. Co. v. Houlihan, 157 Ind. 494, 60 N. E. 943, 54 L. R. A. 787; Trice v. Yoeman, 60 Kan. 742, 57 Pac. 955; Sayre v. Burdick, 47 Minn. 367, 50 N. W. 245.

The recital in the contract that it was entered into in consideration of the attachments being released, together with the manner of paying the indebtedness, etc., as there detailed, excludes the idea that any other agreements were to be performed, or of there being any other consideration. Then, conceding all the facts disclosed by the answer to be true, which the absence of a reply at the time of the motion admitted, it appears that defendant would not be entitled to a decree of dismissal. The same rule must prevail as to answers in this respect as in a complaint, from which it follows that it is immaterial that no demurrer was filed, for its insufficiency can be urged in opposition to the motion, whether in the court below or on appeal. B. & C. Comp. 72; Moore v. Halliday, 43 Or. 250, 72 Pac. 801, 99 Am. St. Rep. 724.

It is also maintained, in effect, that the contract discloses that the sums involved were to be paid out of the net proceeds of the business under the management there agreed upon, and that all payments due under these terms are alleged to have been paid, which is not denied, for which reason it is suggested that the decree is premature. The allegation that the payments due have been paid has reference only to the payment out of the net proceeds, so far as they have accumulated, and not that the claims specified therein have been fully paid. Plaintiff does not rely upon this instrument for recovery, but upon the original contract as contained in the mortgage. Hence it was unnecessary for him either to allege or prove a failure on the part of defendant to comply with the terms of the new agreement. The defense that the decree is premature could avail the defendant only if pleaded in abatement; and, while the facts as alleged may have been sufficient to abate the suit, if pleaded for that purpose, they are pleaded in bar. This not only appears from the prayer of the answer, but it has been treated throughout the case by defendant as a plea in bar. Pleas in abatement, since they do not question the merits, but merely tend to delay the remedy, are not favored. Much strictness is accordingly applied to them, and they will not be aided in construction by any intendments. With them correctness of form is a matter of substance, and any defect of form is fatal. 1 Ency. Pl. & Pr. 23. Where matter in abatement concludes in bar it must be so treated (Morgan's Estate, 46 Or. 242, 77 Pac. 608, 78 Pac. 1029), and its character must be determined, not from the subject-matter of the plea, but from its conclusion or prayer. 1 Ency. Pl. & Pr. 27; Lyman v. Cent. Vt. R. Co., 59 Vt. 167, 10 Atl. 346; Pitts Sons' Mfg. Co. v. Commercial Nat. Bank, 121 Ill. 582, 13 N. E. 156; Collette v. Weed, 68 Wis. 428, 32 N. W. 753. Defendant, not having pleaded the contract in abatement, necessarily waived any right to rely upon it for that purpose, and accordingly is not in a position to insist that the decree was prematurely entered. Chamberlain v. Hibbard, 26 Or. 428, 38 Pac. 437.

The next point to which our attention has been directed is that the court below made no findings of fact, and it is urged that this duty is made imperative by our Code. B. & C. Comp. § 406, provides that the court, in rendering its decision in suits in equity, shall set out in writing its findings of fact on all material issues presented by the pleadings together with its conclusions of law, each of which shall be stated separately from the decree and be filed with the clerk, thereafter constituting a part of the judgment roll of such cause; and that the findings of fact shall have the same force and effect as a verdict of a jury in actions at law. These provisions are followed by an exception and qualification thereof, to the effect that on appeal the cause shall be tried anew without reference to such findings. Under this exception, it is clear that a failure to make findings should not constitute reversible error; nor can we conceive of any reason why it should have such effect when all the evidence offered and properly admitted is before the appellate court. It is true that where the evidence has been taken in the presence of the trial judge, and the court has prepared its own findings, they may be of material assistance to this court in reaching its conclusion on close questions of fact. But, since our statute expressly declares that this court shall try the cause anew without reference to the findings of the lower court, it is obvious that the absence thereof cannot be deemed fatal on appeal, even though the statute directs such findings to be made; for, while findings of fact and conclusions of law may, in some instances, be useful and convenient as a part of the records of the circuit court, it does not follow that they are essential here; and especially should the want of such findings not constitute reversible error, nor the cause be remanded on that account, when it does not appear that the complaining party is prejudiced by reason thereof. It is not contemplated by the act that findings shall be made where no issues are tried, and it appears, as a result of the conclusions here reached, that the only material issue made and tried in this cause, under the pleadings in the court below, was in reference to the attorney fees claimed by plaintiff, as to which all the evidence bearing on that question is before us, while the conclusion of the circuit court thereon is contained in the decree. While the findings of fact in some instances might be material and of importance, the want thereof, when appealed, is not reversible error where the transcript discloses all the proceedings had and evidence taken in the court below.

There being no error disclosed by the record, the decree of the circuit court should be affirmed.

H. MARKS CO. v. BLOOMER.

(Supreme Court of Oregon. Dec. 17, 1907.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Douglas County; J. W. Hamilton, Judge.

Action by the H. Marks Company against Thomas C. Bloomer. From a decree for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Albert Abraham, for appellant. W. W. Cardwell, for respondent.

KING, C. This is an action to recover a balance of $781.83, with interest, alleged to be due plaintiff from defendant on a promissory note, and was argued and submitted at the same time as the case of Sutherland v. Bloomer, 93 Pac. 135, in which an opinion is filed at this time. With the exception of the third error assigned in that suit, the points presented and urged in this action are the same as in that proceeding.

In disposing of the question there argued as to the sufficiency of the answer to entitle defendant to a decree of dismissal, we necessarily determined all questions involved in this appeal adversely to defendant's contention.

Based on the authority of that case, we find there was no error in the proceedings of the court below; and its judgment must accordingly be affirmed.

DOUGLAS COUNTY BANK v. BLOOMER.

(Supreme Court of Oregon. Dec. 17, 1907.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Douglas County; J. W. Hamilton, Judge.

Action by the Douglas County Bank against Thomas C. Bloomer. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Albert Abraham, for appellant. W. W. Cardwell, for respondent.

KING, C. This is an action by the Douglas County Bank against defendant to recover $300, with interest, alleged to be due plaintiff on a promissory note, in which the points involved are, in effect, the same as in Sutherland v. Bloomer (decided on this date), 93 Pac. 135, except as to the third error there urged.

The judgment of the trial court must accordingly be affirmed.

(50 Or. 560)

CHAN HI v. BLOOMER.

(Supreme Court of Oregon. Dec. 17, 1907.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Douglas County; J. W. Hamilton, Judge.

Action by Chan Hi against Thomas C. Bloomer. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Albert Abraham, for appellant. W. W. Cardwell, for respondent.

KING, C. This is an action at law by plaintiff for the recovery of a balance of $1,350, alleged to be due him from defendant on a contract for labor. The bill of exceptions discloses the same questions to be involved here as urged in Sutherland v. Bloomer (decided on this date) 93 Pac. 135, except as to the third error therein assigned.

That case having determined the points here involved adversely to defendant's contention, it follows that the judgment of the circuit court in this action must be affirmed.

KUNZ v. OREGON R. CO.*

(Supreme Court of Oregon. Dec. 17, 1907.)

1. RAILROADS—INJURIES AT CROSSINGS—ACTIONS—EVIDENCE—VIOLATING SPEED ORDINANCE.

In an action for the killing of a person at a crossing, the fact that the engine was traveling 20 or 30 miles an hour across a public grade road in a city where the lawful speed was 6 miles an hour is a circumstance from which the railroad's negligence might reasonably be inferred by the jury, especially where, in consequence of obstructions to a view of the train, a person was prevented from seeing a locomotive at any great distance until he came within about 50 feet of the crossing.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 41, Railroads, §§ 1120, 1143.]

2. SAME—VIOLATION OF SPEED ORDINANCE.

To authorize a recovery for a personal injury on the ground of a railroad's negligence in violating a speed ordinance, it must appear that the hurt was caused by the unlawful speed without contributory negligence of the injured person.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 41, Railroads, §§ 1009, 1095.]

3. SAME—RIGHT OF PERSON TO USE RAILROAD CROSSING.

A traveler on a public road that intersects a railway at grade is entitled to use the crossing, subject to the railroad company's superior right of way, to which when he has notice of the approach of a train he must yield.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 41, Railroads, § 936.]

4. SAME—DUTY TO LOOK AND LISTEN.

A traveler before undertaking to cross a railroad must look along the track in each direction for an approaching train, and if the view is at all obstructed, he must listen, and if he fails to do so without a reasonable excuse, he is negligent.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 41, Railroads, §§ 1043–1053.]

5. SAME—VIOLATION OF SPEED ORDINANCE—PRESUMPTION THAT TRAINS RUN AT LEGAL RATE.

In the absence of evidence to the contrary, a person approaching a railroad crossing in a city may presume that the railroad will not run its trains at a greater rate of speed than allowed by the city ordinance.

6. SAME—TRIAL—QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

Though the negligence of one party cannot be set up by the other as an excuse for the want of care on his part, yet when, in an action for a personal injury, it appears from plaintiff's testimony that the harm was caused by the negligence of defendant railroad in operating a train, a judgment of nonsuit should not be given unless it is manifest that the person injured was negligent.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 41, Railroads, §§ 1167–1189.]

7. SAME.

Whether decedent, killed at a railway crossing, was negligent at the time, held, under the evidence, for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 41, Railroads, §§ 1167–1189.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Multnomah County; J. B. Cleland, Judge.

Action by Martha M. Kunz, administratrix of the estate of David H. Kunz, against the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, and new trial ordered.

This is an action by Martha M. Kunz, as administratrix of the estate of her husband, David H. Kunz, against the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company, a corporation, to recover damages occasioned by his death which was caused November 21, 1904, by his being struck by a locomotive drawing a passenger train as he was crossing the defendant's railroad at grade on a public highway within the corporate limits of the city of Portland. The negligence alleged as a basis for the recovery is, in effect, that the defendant's agents, without giving any warning of approaching the crossing, operated the engine, which caused the injury, at the unlawful and dangerous velocity of about 40 miles an hour, in violation of municipal regulations limiting the rate of speed of railroad locomotives within the corporate limits of the city to 6 miles an hour, and prescribing a penalty for a violation thereof; that if such agents had carefully observed the track they could have seen the intestate crossing in front of the engine and checked its speed, thereby avoiding any injury; and that, because of a curve in the railroad and of such unlawful speed, it was impossible for the decedent, or any ordinarily prudent person, to have seen the train or heard its approach until it was too late to prevent a collision with it. The complaint states in detail the situation of the public crossing, and avers its constant use by many persons, which facts were well known to the defendant; that the city of Portland is duly incorporated, and its common council, pursuant to a legislative grant, enacted ordinances, limiting the rate of speed of railroad locomotives as mentioned, copies of which municipal law are set out; and further alleging the several duties imposed on the defendant's agents in operating the engine, and their neglect to comply with such requirements. The answer denied the material allegations of the complaint, and averred, inter alia, that the intestate lost his life in consequence of his own negligence. The reply put in issue the allegations of new matter in the answer, and the cause coming on regularly for trial the court, upon the motion of defendant's counsel, granted a judgment of nonsuit at the close of the testimony introduced by the plaintiff, and she appeals.

Ralph R. Dumiway, for appellant. Arthur O. Spencer, for respondent.

MOORE, J. (after stating the facts as above). Numerous errors are assigned by plaintiff's counsel on the ground that the court rejected testimony which he offered, and also admitted on the cross-examination of his witnesses testimony which the defendant's counsel was permitted, over objection and exception, to elicit. If it be conceded that the court's rulings in these respects were erroneous, the action complained of would not be prejudicial, provided the judgment of nonsuit was properly given. To determine this question, the locus in quo will be particularly described, and the testimony introduced by the plaintiff's counsel, together with the cross-examination of his witnesses, to which no objection was interposed, will be detailed, from which may be inferred the degree of care exercised by the decedent.

Considering the courses respectively pursued by the train and by Kunz at the time and place of the accident, as they proceeded toward Portland, the defendant's railroad, within the limits of that city, is constructed northwesterly at the place where it is crossed at grade by the Sandy Road, a public highway extending southwesterly at the acute angle of 49 degrees and 45 minutes, as disclosed by a blue print received in evidence. At a point in the center of the Sandy Road 90 feet southwesterly from its intersection with the railroad the Barr Road, another public highway, commences and extends due east, intersecting the railroad at a point 170 feet southeasterly from the Sandy Road crossing. A cattle guard has been constructed across the railroad 350 feet southeasterly from the Sandy Road intersection, and in the same direction, at a point 1,500 feet from such crossing, a whistling post has been set at the side of the railroad. This post indicates the place where the warning signal should be given to announce the approach of a locomotive from the east toward the crossings mentioned. A short distance southeasterly from the whistling post the railway is again intersected by the Wiberg Lane. The railroad is construed through a cut which commences near the cattle guard and gradually grows deeper as it extends toward the whistling post, the northerly bank attaining at the highest place an altitude of 10 or 14 feet. A hedge has been planted on the south side of the Barr Road for some distance east from its intersection with the railroad. A dwelling, occupied at the time of the accident by W. H. Moss, stands on the southerly side of the Sandy Road, 405 feet from the crossing, and between this dwelling and the intersection, on the same side of the public road, is situated another house, which at that time was vacant. From a point on such highway 583 feet north-easterly from the crossing a person can look over the hedge and bank mentioned and see a locomotive coming west as it emerges from the cut at a point 633 feet from the Sandy Road crossing, but the smokestack of the engine can be seen farther away. It will thus be seen that, in consequence of the excavation and also of the houses mentioned, an extended view of the railroad east of the crossing cannot be obtained by a person traveling on the Sandy Road toward Portland, but when he reaches a point on that highway about 50 feet from the crossing the testimony discloses that he can behold the track almost to the whistling post.

The admitted facts are that on November 21, 1904, about 8 o'clock in the morning of a fair day, Kunz drove toward Portland a pair of horses hitched to a wagon that was loaded with farm produce, and as he attempted to cross the railway at the Sandy Road intersection a locomotive drawing a passenger train which was about on schedule time, and also going in the same direction, collided with him, which resulted in killing the horses, breaking the wagon and harness, scattering the produce, and injuring him so that in a few hours thereafter he died.

W. H. Moss, who, it will be remembered, resided near the Sandy Road crossing, testified for the plaintiff that on the morning of the collision he saw Mr. Kunz pass, driving his team at the rate of two, or possibly three, miles an hour; that when Kunz was probably within 40 or 50 feet from the track, the danger whistle was sounded by the engineer just beyond the cattle guard near the Barr Road; that the train was then running from 20 to 30 miles an hour. In answer to the question, "How much time elapsed between the sounding of this danger whistle right at the cattle guard and the engine hitting the horses?" the witness replied: "Well, it was very quick. Of course, I could not tell you the exact time. All my recollection is I looked around when the locomotive blew the alarm whistle, I looked around, and saw the train's momentum slackening, and I looked instantly back and his team was standing square on the crossing, right on the crossing of the track—standing there—and he just made a motion as if he was rushing his horses forward or back, and he was gone that quick (the witness slapping his hands together)." On cross-examination Mr. Moss was asked, "How soon after Mr. Kunz drove up on that morning was it before you heard the whistle of the train?" and answered: "Well, I heard the whistle of the train just as he passed by my house. I heard them whistling on up above, towards Montavilla when he passed by the house. Q. Did you see or observe him as he continued to drive from your house down to the track? A. Yes, sir; I observed him. Q. Did you notice whether he was looking or listening for the approach of that train? A. Well, I didn't see him looking, or notice him do anything in particular at all. * * * He was smoking along leisurely, and I didn't see that he paid any attention at all. That is what caused me to stop and remain on the platform looking at him, wondering why he wasn't spurring up his team, or something of that kind, because I heard the whistle coming down along the road above there. Q. And did you hear them at the whistling post above there? A. Well, we didn't know where it was. I did not. Q. They were up in that location up there? A. Yes; I could not tell whether it was the Wiberg Lane, or where it was. Q. There is not much difference between the Wiberg Lane and the whistling post? A. No, not at all. Q. Anyway, it was whistling rapidly coming down through there, was it not? A. Yes; I heard a whistle two or three times before the accident. Q. Did you see him turn his head, or not? A. No. Q. Now he was walking his team as he went along the road there as he passed your house? A. Yes, sir. Q. What is the fact as to whether he got them into a trot or not? A. That I could not say, because I never seen the horses trotting, to my recollection. They might have trotted a little down toward the bottom of the grade, but not to my recollection. * * * Q. And you saw the engine coming down in full sight, and whistling before he got onto the crossing? A. Just as I tell you. As he was just going up to the—approaching to the—railroad crossing, I heard the alarm whistle, and of course I turned my head that way instantly, and I turned back instantly as quick as I had looked, and seen the train was so close to him, and then, as I said before, the horses was right on the track." The plaintiff's counsel, on redirect examination of the witness, in referring to the first alarm he observed on the morning of the accident, inquired, "How far above your house on the railroad was that whistling that you heard?" and received the following answer: "Well, I should judge it was somewhere in the neighborhood of $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles or 3 miles. Q. And at the time you heard that whistling above Montavilla, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles or so away, whereabouts was Mr. Kunz, and what was he doing? A. He was driving along the road. Q. Between your house and the railroad crossing at Sandy? A. Yes, sir. * * * Q. From the time you heard the whistle up above the Wiberg Lane, which caused you to be apprehensive of a disaster at this point, how long was it, and when was it that you next heard a distinct whistle from the engine, which you can recall? A. Well, the next whistle that I heard was the alarm whistle which was very shortly after the last whistle. Q. Where was the position of the engine at that time? A. Right above the cattle guard at the Barr Road. * * * Q. At this time did you hear the bell on the engine ringing? A. Not to my recollection. Q. Now counsel asked you about Mr. Kunz looking or listening. You were standing back of Mr. Kunz as he went down towards the railroad track? A. Yes, sir. Q. And you had a view of the back of his head? A. Yes, sir. Q. You could not see his eyes, as to whether they were open or not? A. No, sir. Q. State whether or not as Mr. Kunz went past your house and down towards the Sandy Road, whether this Sandy Road crossing was right in front of him for 200 or 300 feet? A. Why, of course it is in plain view of him there, certainly. Q. Then what is the fact as to whether it was necessary for Mr. Kunz to turn his head in order to see 200 or 300 feet of that railway in front of him? A. Well, it wasn't absolutely necessary for him at that time, but after he passed that house—that little house that obstructed the way, the view—then it would be necessary for him to turn around in that direction to look up the track (witness illustrating)."

Mrs. W. H. Moss, as plaintiff's witness, testified that she saw Mr. Kunz on the morning of the accident driving slowly down towards the track, and was asked: "State whether or not you heard the whistle of the train away up above, about Montavilla, at that time? A. Well, I heard whistles all the way up that way. I don't know where they were." On cross-examination this witness was interrogated as follows: "You heard the train whistling up above? A. Yes, sir. Q. And you saw Mr. Kunz driving for that crossing? A. Yes, sir. Q. You noticed that he was not paying a bit of attention to the fact that the train was coming? A. He didn't seem like it." This witness, on redirect examination was asked: "Mrs. Moss, when you say the man was paying no attention, isn't it a fact that he was driving toward this crossing with his eyes right toward it, and you could see only the back of his head? A. Well, he didn't seem to notice that there was a train coming, although we did— Q. Yes, but the fact— (The defendant's counsel, interrupting, said: "Let her finish her answer.") The witness, continuing, said: "But we could hear the train. We could hear it coming, although we never stopped to see it. We didn't see it, but we knew the train was coming. We could hear the noise." The court thereupon inquired: "You mean you could hear the noise of the train? A. The roar of the train coming; yes, sir. Q. Mr. Kunz gave no sign of hearing it himself? A. I don't think so. He didn't seem to. Q. But Mr. Kunz, as he drove down there, could see the crossing right in front of him, could he not, without turning his head? A. Yes, sir; he could see the crossing; yes, sir. Q. And you don't undertake to say as to whether or not he used, or did not use, his sense of hearing, as he was going down there, do you? A. No; I don't know. Q. That you could not say? A. No. Q. When the last danger whistle was given, just before the train hit him, what, if anything, did Mr. Kunz do? A. Well, there is a little slope there before the track, and the horses trotted. I don't know whether he made the horses trot. Anyway, they trotted on that little slope, and then he got on the track and he tried to make the horses go ahead, and they would not go ahead, and he tried to make them come back, and they would not go back, and he waived his hand, and then the alarm whistle, you know, the danger whistle. Q. Was that alarm whistle before or after he moved his hands? A. No; it was after. Q. That was after? A. I think it was after. I could not say for sure. Q. You are not sure about that? A. No; I was excited."

The testimony shows that at the time of his death Mr. Kunz was 41 years old, possessed all his faculties, and was in perfect health and happy; that he was a farmer, and knew how to manage horses; that the team which was killed was gentle, good, and true; and that four or five times a week he drove over the Sandy Road to Portland. It is fair to infer that the train runs down grade from the whistling post mentioned to the crossing where Kunz was injured, for O. Pullen, as plaintiff's witness, testified that after the engineer passes Wiberg Lane, going towards Portland, he seems to shut off steam, and the locomotive does not emit such a quantity of smoke as is discharged by it at that place when going in an opposite direction.

The foregoing testimony, and the legitimate inferences that are deducible therefrom, fairly present the manner in which the defendant's servants operated the engine and train as they approached the crossing on the day of the accident, and also show the attention which Kunz paid to the dangerous instrumentality as he drove his team to the place where the collision occurred.

The acts of the defendant's servants in permitting an engine operated by them to attain a velocity of 20 or 30 miles an hour across a public road at grade in the city of Portland, where the rate of speed of a locomotive had been limited to 6 miles an hour, is a circumstance from which negligence might reasonably have been inferred by the jury, and particularly so, when, in consequence of a deep cut and of other obstructions to a view of the train going towards that city, a person on the highway was prevented from seeing a locomotive at any great distance until he reached a point on the public road about 50 feet from the crossing. 23 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law (2d Ed.) 760; 4 Cur. Law, 1208; Beck v. Vancouver Ry. Co., 25 Or. 33, 34 Pac. 753; 2 Shearman & Redfield, Neg. (5th Ed.) § 407; Correll v. Burlington, etc., Ry. Co., 38 Iowa, 120, 18 Am. Rep. 22; Karle v. Kansas City, etc., Ry. Co., 55 Mo. 476; Kolb v. St. Louis Trans. Co., 102 Mo. App. 143, 76 S. W. 1050; Crosby v. New York Cent., etc., Ry. Co., 88 Hun, 196, 34 N. Y. Supp. 714; Gratlot v. Missouri Pac. Ry. Co. (Mo.) 16 S. W. 384. Though the courts of last resort differ as to the degree of negligence which they declare will result from a violation of a statute or of a municipal ordinance regulating the rate of speed of railroad locomotives, the adjudications on this subject are quite uniform in holding that, to authorize a recovery for a personal injury, it must satisfactorily appear that the hurt was caused by such unlawful speed, without any direct contributory negligence on the part of the person sustaining the harm. 23 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law (2d Ed.) 760; Pierce, Railroads, 354; Wood, Railroads (Minor's Ed.) 1515.

A traveler on a public road that intersects a railway at grade is entitled to use the crossing; but as passengers and freight, when transported by rail, must be carried with speed, a locomotive and the cars which it draws have the right of way to which a person, desiring to cross the track, and having reasonable notice of the near approach of a train, must yield on the ground that in doing so the greatest good will result to the greatest number. Pierce, Railroads, 342; Wood, Railroads (Minor's Ed.) 1510; Continental Improvement Co. v. Stead, 95 U. S. 161, 24 L. Ed. 403. If a contrary rule prevailed, the operations of trains would be practically prevented across streets at grade in cities where many persons are constantly passing. This standard of care makes it incumbent upon a traveler, before undertaking to cross a railroad, to look along the track in each direction for an approaching train, and if the view is at all obstructed, he must listen; and a failure to comply with these requirements, without a reasonable excuse, is deemed negligence. Durbin v. O. R. & N. Co., 17 Or. 5, 17

Pac. 5, 11 Am. St. Rep. 778; McBride v. N. P. R. Co., 19 Or. 64, 23 Pac. 814; Hecker v. Oregon R. Co., 40 Or. 6, 66 Pac. 270.

It might appear from an examination of the testimony hereinbefore set out that Kunz did not look in either direction along the railroad before attempting to cross it; but, as disclosed by the sworn statements of Mr. and Mrs. Moss, his back was towards them as he drove his team further away, and this being so, a turn of his head to the left, sufficient to overcome the acute angle formed by the county road and the railway, may not have been observed by them. It will be remembered that Moss first heard the whistle of the locomotive about $2\frac{1}{2}$ or 3 miles distant, when the train approached Montavilla, and next heard it near the whistling post, 1,500 feet from the Sandy Road crossing. As Kunz possessed all his faculties, it is right to infer, since he was nearer the track than either Mr. or Mrs. Moss, that he also heard the alarm blasts that had been given, and in the absence of any evidence to the contrary he was authorized to presume that the defendant's agents would obey the municipal requirement and not run the train at a greater rate of speed than 6 miles an hour. Moore v. Chicago, etc., Ry. Co., 102 Iowa, 595, 71 N. W. 569; Cleveland, etc., Ry. Co., v. Harrington, 131 Ind. 426, 30 N. E. 37. Assuming that the first whistle was given $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles east of the crossing and at a time when the team was less than 405 feet distant therefrom, the train necessarily traveled more than 32 times faster than the horses, so that if Kunz had looked easterly along the track when the first opportunity occurred, which presents itself at a point within 50 feet of the intersection, he could not have seen the engine which then must have been east of the whistling post and beyond a curve in the railway. If the testimony of Mr. Moss is controlling, however, the judgment of nonsuit was properly given, for it appears from his sworn statements that Kunz was about 40 or 50 feet from the crossing when the danger whistle was sounded right above the cattle guard, near the Barr Road, and that the speed of the train was immediately slackened. It would thus appear that, while the team traversed this 40 or 50 feet to the place of collision, the train passed over 400 or 500 feet of the railway to the same locality, thus making the sworn statements of this witness consistent; that the speed of the team and of the train was, respectively, 3 and 30 miles an hour. Moss admits that the team was standing on the track, and that Kunz made a motion as if he was rushing his horses forward or backward. It is impossible to determine the length of time the team stood on the crossing, but that the horses halted at all on the railroad track tends to show that the estimate of the distance relatively traveled by the team and train may have been incorrect. It will be remembered that Mrs. Moss, in answer to the inquiry as to what Kunz did after the danger whistle was sounded, replied that his horses trotted down an incline of the public road towards the crossing. It might, at first, appear from this answer that it corroborated the testimony of her husband to the effect that the team had not reached the railroad when the last blast of the whistle was given. When her entire testimony is considered, however, we think it is evident that she understood the danger whistle, to which her attention was called, to mean the warning given by the engineer at the whistling post near the Wiberg Lane, and not the alarm sounded near the cattle guard, for after answering the inquiry as indicated, she said that when the team refused to start forward or backward across the track Kunz signaled the engineer before the alarm whistle was sounded. She subsequently qualified that statement by declaring that she thought the whistle was given after he waived his hand, and thereafter further restricted her testimony by saying that she was not sure about the matter, because of being excited at the time. It is fairly to be inferred from her sworn statements that Kunz had reached the crossing before he saw the approaching train; that the horses unexpectedly halted at the intersection; and that as he observed the locomotive bearing down on him he waived his hand, whereupon the engineer gave the alarm whistle and began to check the speed of the train. No testimony was introduced at the trial tending to show that more than three whistles were given or heard—the first probably east of Montavilla, the second near the Wiberg Lane, and the third, or danger, signal, near the cattle guard. If the team was standing on the railroad track when the danger signal was given, Kunz could not well have been 40 or 50 feet from the track at that time, as stated by Mr. Moss.

Considering as true, all the favorable testimony given by plaintiff's witnesses, and all reasonable inferences deducible therefrom that tend to support the cause of action, as is required to be done in passing upon a motion for a judgment of nonsuit, we think a fair construction of such evidence leads to the following conclusion: That when the whistle was sounded near the Wiberg Lane, Kunz heard the signal, and presumed, as he had the right to do in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, that the train would not be run at a greater velocity than 6 miles an hour, which would allow him ample time to cross the track; that he attempted to do so, when his horses unexpectedly balked on the railroad and could neither be urged forward nor forced backward; and that in this situation he saw the train rapidly approaching and signaled the engineer to stop the locomotive. The horses driven by Kunz being gentle, good, and true, as disclosed by the testimony, it is reasonably to be inferred that he could not have supposed that the team would refuse to proceed across the railroad track when the place of danger had been reached. Whether or not the engineer saw the team on the track at such a reasonable distance that he knew the horses had sufficient time to pass over the crossing before the locomotive could reach that place and hence had the right to assume, in the absence of any knowledge to the contrary, that Kunz was in the possession of all his faculties and had seen or heard the approaching train, and that the horses were tractable and would proceed across the intersection, is not disclosed by the testimony. If the facts thus supposed were true, and the engineer, seeing the team standing on the track, under the circumstances mentioned, immediately used all available appliances to stop the train, the question as to the measure of such care would nevertheless be for the jury to determine.

Though the negligence of one party cannot be set up by the other as an excuse for the want of care on the part of the latter (Wood, Railroads, 1537), yet, when, in the trial of a cause instituted to recover damages for a personal injury, it appears from plaintiff's testimony that the harm was caused by the negligence of the agents or servants of a railway company in operating a train, a judgment of nonsuit ought not to be given unless it is manifest that the person hurt was guilty of contributory negligence. 7 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law (2d Ed.) 434; Bluedorn v. Missouri Pac. Ry. Co., 108 Mo. 439, 18 S. W. 1103, 32 Am. St. Rep. 615. As this degree of proof is not disclosed by the construction which we have given to the testimony of Mrs. Moss, the judgment is reversed, and a new trial ordered.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. Dec. 7, 1907.)

TAXATION—TAX DEED—VALIDITY.

In this case it is held that a tax deed which had been of record more than five years before any suit was commenced attacking it is not void on its face because it omits the word "publicly" from the clause in the statutory form reading "at the sale begun and publicly held," etc.; or because it substitutes the words "no person bid" for the words "said property could not be sold," in stating the necessity for a sale to the county; or because instead of using the statutory language relating to the assignment of the tax sale certificate and all the right, title, and interest of the county in the property it merely states that the county clerk duly assigned all the right, title and interest of the county in the property. Bowman v. Cockrill, 6 Kan. 311 (1870), and numerous subsequent cases decided by this court cited and followed.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 45, Taxation, §§ 1510, 1515.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from District Court, Seward County; Wm. Easton Hutchison, Judge.

Action between John W. Baughman and A. B. Harvey and wife. From the judgment, Baughman brings error. Affirmed.

Geo. L. Hay, for plaintiff in error. Thos. A. Scates, W. W. Sutton, and W. L. Harvey, for defendants in error.

BURCH, J. The principal question in this case is whether a tax deed which had been of record more than five years before it was attacked is void on its face. It deviates from the statutory form in several particulars. One of the recitals in the statutory form is as follows: "Whereas, the treasurer of said county did on the — day of —, A. D. —, by virtue of the authority in him vested by law, at the sale begun and publicly held on the first Tuesday of May, A. D. —, expose to public sale at the county seat of said county," etc. The deed omits the word "publicly," italicized for emphasis in the extract from the statute. The statutory form contains the following: "Whereas, at the place aforesaid said property could not be sold for the amount of taxes and charges thereon and was therefore bid off by the county treasurer for said county for the sum of — dollars and — cents, the whole amount of taxes and charges then due." The tax deed states that, "Whereas, at the said sale no person bid the said amounts of taxes and charges on said tracts of land and the said tracts were bid off to the county of Seward for the total amount of taxes above stated, which was the least quantity bid for." Another prescribed recital is this: "And, whereas, for the sum of $ — paid to the treasurer of said county on the — day of —, the county clerk did assign the certificate of sale of said property and all the interest of said county in said property to said — of the county of — and state of Kansas." The deed fails to state in so many words that the county clerk assigned the certificate of sale, but it states that he duly assigned all the right, title, and interest of the county in the land.

In numerous cases in this court similar questions have been presented. An examination of them will disclose the policy of the court in dealing with tax deeds which have been of record and unassailed for five years or more, the rules of interpretation which have been applied to them and the reasons which have led to the upholding of departures from the statutory form when the substance of the form has been preserved.

In the case of Bowman v. Cockrill, 6 Kan. 311, decided in 1870, the deed used the word "named" where it should have used the word "made" in the following clause: "In substantial conformity with all the requirements of the statute in such cases made and provided." The blank following the words "for and in consideration of the sum of" was filled, but with a sum less than the proper amount; and the deed used the words "subject however to all the rights of redemption as provided by law" instead of "subject however to all rights of redemption provided in this act." In holding the instrument valid on its face the court called attention to the fact that the law nowhere requires that a tax deed shall be in the exact language of the statute. All that is necessary is that it shall be in substantial conformity to the model given. The statute to the effect that no mere irregularities of any kind shall invalidate the title conveyed by a tax deed was applied to the tax deed itself as a part of the proceedings whereby the landowner is divested of his property, so that the foundation was laid for the statement in Morrill v. Douglass, 17 Kan. 291, that "a mere irregularity counts for nothing as against a tax deed in Kansas." Words meaning the same thing were said to be equally as good as those found in the statutory form. It was held that an inaccuracy in stating the consideration which could do no possible injury to the original landowner would not render the deed void on its face; and decisions from states whose Legislatures have enjoined literal compliance with the prescribed form were rejected as having no authoritative application here where no such requirement is made.

The case of Haynes v. Heller, 12 Kan. 381, decided in 1874, involved a tax deed executed under the law of 1862, prescribing a form which, in respect to the offer to purchase, reads thus: "And whereas at the time and place aforesaid," etc. The deed omitted the words "time and." The court, speaking through Justice Brewer, said that a tax deed like any other instrument is to be construed as a whole. If any uncertainty in one part is made certain by another the deed as a whole is sufficient, and a tax deed is to be construed according to the ordinary and natural meaning of the words used. Premising so much, the learned justice analyzed a public sale into its constituent parts of offer for sale, bid, striking off, and payment of price, and said: "Now, of these four parts, the first three must be contemporaneous. The bid must be made while the property is being offered for sale, otherwise the sale, if made, is a private, and not a public, sale; and for the same reason the property must be struck off to the bidder before the public offer is withdrawn or ended. So that a deed which recites the time at which property is offered for sale at public sale, and then that a bid therefor was made and the property struck off to the bidder, shows the time of these last two acts as clearly as though it recited that the bid was made at 'said time,' and the property struck off at 'said time.' The deed in controversy recites the time that the sale for delinquent taxes commenced, and the day upon which this particular lot was put up for sale. It does not say that it was exposed for sale upon this and subsequent days; nor under the rule, 'expressio unius, exclusio alterius,' can there be any other understanding of the words of the deed than that the property was put up for sale only upon that day. It then says that certain parties bid for the property and it was struck off to them. As heretofore stated, these two acts must have taken place during the time of the offer, and therefore on the day named, or the sale was not a public sale. But it may be said, is not the language used consistent with the idea that no offer or sale was made at the time it was exposed to public sale, and that thereafter an offer was made and a private sale effected? Not at all. To speak of property sold at private sale as having been struck off to the highest bidder is, to say the least, an extraordinary and unnatural use of language."

The significant feature of this decision is that from recitals enjoined by the statutory form and shown in the deed the substance of other prescribed recitals may be deduced, although not expressly appearing.

The case of McCauslin v. McGuire, 14 Kan. 234, related to a tax deed witnessed by one witness. The statutory form contained the word "witnesses" at the bottom where witnesses to instruments usually sign, and the law provided that a tax deed "duly witnessed and acknowledged shall be prima facie evidence," etc. The court said: "It will be perceived that the statute quoted does not expressly require that a tax deed shall be witnessed, nor does the statute state how it shall be witnessed, whether by one, two, or a dozen witnesses. The statute simply says that 'such deed duly witnessed,' etc., 'may be recorded with like effect as other conveyances.' Now what does 'duly witnessed' mean? We think it means 'witnessed according to law.' And how does the law require that a deed of conveyance should be witnessed? It in fact does not require that a deed of conveyance shall be witnessed at all. The common law never did require that deeds of conveyance should be witnessed by attesting witnesses. * * * And no statute can be found in this state that requires any such thing. Tax deeds were unknown to the common law, and our statutes do not require that they shall be witnessed in any different manner from other deeds, but leave the matter entirely optional with the parties executing and receiving them. The statutes above quoted were borrowed almost literally from Wisconsin, where attesting witnesses were necessary to all deeds; and this accounts for the words 'witnessed' and 'witnesses' being used. In this state the certificate of the officer taking the acknowledgment of a deed, with his signature, and seal if he has one, is considered as sufficient attestation of any deed; and with such a certificate and deed may be read without other proof."

In the case of Stebbins et al. v. Guthrie and Horton, 4 Kan. 353, it had been said that a tax deed duly acknowledged is sufficient without witnesses, so that by the two decisions something which appeared to be a part of the statutory form was virtually eliminated. A recitation in the McGuire deed that the certificate of sale which had been issued to the county was duly assigned was held to raise the presumption that the purchase money and all that was necessary had been paid, the argument being that the certificate and all the right, title, and interest of the county in the land could not have been "duly assigned" unless the purchase money were paid. Although in the same deed the word "at" was omitted before the words "an adjourned sale of the sale begun," etc., and although the pronoun "me" was inserted instead of the name of the acknowledging officer in the blank left for the purpose in the certificate of acknowledgment, it was said the deed plainly exhibited the necessary facts and that its meaning was unmistakable. This decision was rendered in opposition to the following argument in the brief for McCauslin (page 237): "A tax deed is not substantially in the form required by statute when it omits any averment therein required. The phraseology may be changed in many respect without substantially changing the form, provided equivalent averments are inserted; but when the fact to be required to be inserted is omitted, it loses a part of the substance. If courts can dispense with one requirement they can, with equal propriety, dispense with another, which they may think the Legislature has unwisely or unnecessarily required, and thus by gradual steps assume the entire legislative powers upon the subject."

In the case of Morrill v. Douglass, 14 Kan. 293, it was in effect held that whatever is ascertainable by a mathematical calculation from data furnished by the law and the deed is as clearly shown as if the result of the calculation were stated. Indeed it was queried whether, under such circumstances, an erroneous amount inserted in the deed would vitiate it, the true sum being present in the data for the calculation. The principle of this case was applied in the case of Fullington v. Jobling, 75 Kan. 817, 88 Pac. 908.

In the case of Harris v. Curran, 32 Kan. 580, 4 Pac. 1044, the tax deed recited that the land was sold on May 6, 1870, "at the sale begun and publicly held on the first Tuesday of May, 1870." The first Tuesday of May, 1870, was May 3d, and May 6, 1870, fell on Friday. In denying that this deed was void on its face, the court said that the sale made on May 6th was "obviously" at a sale begun and publicly held on the first Tuesday of May and continued to May 6th.

In the case of Mack v. Price, 35 Kan. 134, 10 Pac. 521, the words "of the sale" were omitted from the following sentence of the statutory form, "at an adjourned sale of the sale begun," etc., the recitation being that "the treasurer of said county did on the 15th day of May, 1863, by virtue of the authority in him vested by law at an adjourned sale begun and publicly held on the first Tuesday of May, 1863, expose to public sale," etc. Also, in the conclusion of the deed, the words "by virtue of authority aforesaid" and the words "the official seal of said county" were omitted so that it read as follows: "In witness whereof I, Charles W. Rust, county clerk as aforesaid, have hereunto subscribed my name, and affixed my official seal on this 7th day of December, 1869. Chas. W. Rust, County Clerk." From the fact that the deed showed an adjourned sale succeeding the first Tuesday of May, 1863, the court concluded that the sale must of necessity have been an adjourned sale of the sale begun on that day. Because Charles W. Rust signed the deed as county clerk, it was said "my official seal" evidently referred to his official seal as county clerk, and therefore "the official seal of said county"; and the substance of "by virtue of authority aforesaid" was held to be fully expressed in other recitations, considering all parts of the deed together.

In discussing another subject the word "duly" was given the same force as in McCauslin v. McGuire, 14 Kan. 234, and it was held the words "was the least quantity bid for" should be omitted in deeds based upon sales to the county. The court also referred at length to the fact that no equities existed in favor of the original owner who had abandoned the land, paid no taxes, and made no effort to regain possession, for 20 years.

In the case of Heil v. Redden, 38 Kan. 255, 16 Pac. 743, the syllabus reads as follows: "A tax deed is valid upon its face, when its only irregularity is the omission of the word 'remaining,' where it should be stated that the land is offered for sale for the payment of the taxes, interest and costs then due and [remaining] unpaid." The deed followed the statutory form in all respects except the one noted, and the court, in the opinion, said: "We do not feel inclined to attempt to discover a distinction between taxes, etc., then due and unpaid at the time of offering for sale and the taxes then remaining due and unpaid, while at the same time the other recitals in the deed are full and complete; at most, it was but an irregularity that certainly ought not to be regarded as a defect that could be raised after the five years contemplated by the statute have passed."

In the case of Sanger v. Rice, 43 Kan. 590, 23 Pac. 633, the tax deed stated that "the said county of Bourbon did, on the 15th day of September, A. D. 1881, duly assign the certificate of sale," etc., the sale having been made to the county. The law and the statutory form contemplate an assignment by the county clerk. The court said that the deed showed by necessary implication that the tax certificate was assigned by the county clerk, because it could not be duly assigned by Bourbon county unless it was assigned by the county clerk. The deed in this case having been of record more than five years before it was attacked the court said: "Ordinarily, tax deeds should be strictly construed, but under the circumstances of this case we think the present tax deed ought to be liberally construed for the purpose of upholding and enforcing it." The rule that public officers are always presumed to do their duty was also invoked.

In the case of Douglas v. Bishop, 45 Kan. 200, 25 Pac. 628, 10 L. R. A. 837, the opinion reads: "In the certificate of acknowledgment to the tax deed, under which H. P. Bishop claims, the words 'in and for said county' were omitted. The question presented is whether this omission renders the deed invalid. We think not. The caption shows that the acknowledgment was taken in Jackson county, and in this state, and the certificate also shows that the tax deed was assigned by E. D. Rose, the county clerk of Jackson county in this state, and that as such clerk he appeared before W. S. Hoaglin, a justice of the peace, in Jackson county and the state of Kansas, and acknowledged the execution of the tax deed, as clerk of Jackson county, in this state, for the purpose therein expressed. We think that, even in the absence of the words 'in and for said county,' the presumption is that W. S. Hoaglin exercised his functions as a justice of the peace within his jurisdiction, that is, within his township, in the county of Jackson and state of Kansas." This decision was adhered to in the case of Douglas v. Carmean, 49 Kan. 674, 31 Pac. 371.

In the case of Neenan v. White, 50 Kan. 639, 32 Pac. 331, the deed contained the following recital: "And whereas, the said J. J. Locker did, on the 10th day of June, A. D. 1863, duly assign the certificate of the sale of the property as aforesaid, and all his right, title and interest to said property, to Saml. Gard, of the county of Atchison and state of Kansas; and whereas, Hugh D. Fisher, administrator, did, on the 17th day of December, A. D. 1890, duly assign the certificate of the sale of the property as aforesaid, and all his right, title and interest to said property, to P. L. Hubbard, of the county of Atchison and state of Kansas." It was claimed that no assignment from Gard to Hubbard was shown. The court held that the deed was entitled to a liberal interpretation, for the purpose of upholding it and protecting the equities of claimants of the land in possession under it. The facts implied were the death of Gard, that Fisher was the administrator of Gard, probate proceedings resulting in the appointment of Gard, and an order authorizing Gard to assign the certificate. True, evidence was introduced on the trial in the district court showing the death of Gard and the appointment of Fisher as his administrator, but the decision, which sustained the deed, is apparently rested upon the ground stated, the question being if the deed was void on its face. In the case of Morris v. Bird, 71 Kan. 619, 81 Pac. 185, however, it was held that a clear break in the chain of assignments rendered the deed there under consideration void on its face.

In the case of Penrose v. Cooper (on rehearing) 71 Kan. 725, 84 Pac. 115, express recitals of the amount for which the land was bid off, that it was bid off for the county, and that separate tracts were offered for sale separately, were omitted, but it was held that the substance of such recitals might be supplied by inferences drawn from other statements in the deed liberally construed to that end. Following this case it was held in Gibson v. Trisler, 73 Kan. 397, 85 Pac. 413, that a deed left no room for doubt that the land was bid off for the county although the recital to that effect prescribed by the statutory form was omitted. The same ruling was made in the case of Fullington v. Jobling, 75 Kan. 817, 88 Pac. 903.

In the case of Ham v. Booth, 72 Kan. 429, 83 Pac. 24, the legal presumption that a corporation resides in the state of its creation was indulged to supply the omission of an express recital of the residence of an assignment of the tax-sale certificate. As a part of its due execution a tax deed must bear the seal of the county. Reed v. Morse, 51 Kan. 141, 32 Pac. 900. But in Clarke v. Tilden, 72 Kan. 574, 84 Pac. 139, it was held that the presence of the words "seal of the county clerk of Decatur county, Kansas," in the center of the seal affixed to a deed, did not overcome other indications that the instrument was properly executed. This decision was followed in Kruse v. Fairchild, 73 Kan. 308, 85 Pac. 303. A tax deed must show upon its face the time of the sale or it is void. Haynes v. Heller, 12 Kan. 331. In John v. Young, 74 Kan. 865, 86 Pac. 205, the blanks in the statutory form "did on the _____ day of _____, A. D. 189—" were not filled, but immediately following the blanks the deed recited that the sale was begun and held on the first Tuesday of September, A. D. 1890. The court declined to presume that the sale extended beyond the day named, or that the land was sold on any other day than the one named, and held that the time of the sale was indicated with substantial certainty.

In the case of Havel v. Decatur County Abstract Co. (Kan.) 91 Pac. 700, the blanks left in the statutory form for stating the residence of the assignee of the tax-sale certificate were not filled. It was held that the matter indicated by the blanks is not a recital in the proper sense of the term, and may be omitted without prejudice to the landowner and without vitiating the deed. This decision forecloses any possible inference to the contrary which might be drawn from a casual observation made by the writer of the opinion in the case of Kruse v. Fairchild, 73 Kan. 308, 311, 85 Pac. 303. Whenever in stating the facts with reference to a tax sale words of the statutory form which, under the circumstances, are inappropriate, happen to be retained in a deed, they may be rejected as surplusage. Thompson v. Colburn, 68 Kan. 819, 75 Pac. 506; Clarke v. Tilden, 72 Kan. 574, 84 Pac. 139; Fike v. Nagle, 74 Kan. 838, 85 Pac. 948, 88 Pac. 876.

In the light of these decisions it is clear the deed involved in this case is not void on its face. The treasurer could not expose the land to public sale, as the deed says he did, unless such sale were publicly held. To speak of a private sale as publicly held would involve an "extraordinary and unnatural use of language." Haynes v. Heller. The words "no person bid" contain the necessary implication that the land "could not be sold" to a private bidder. They express the precise idea to be conveyed by the statutory recital, and are, therefore, "equally good." Bowman v. Cockrill. The recital in the statutory form that the county clerk "did assign the certificate of sale of said property and all the interest of said county in said property" is not the statement of two independent facts, but of a single fact with its legal consequence. An assignment of the certificate operates as an assignment of all the right, title, and interest of the county, and an assignment of all the right, title, and interest of the county necessarily involves an assignment of the certificate. A recital of either one includes the other. Besides this, the inference regarding the manner in which the title and interest of the county was assigned is strengthened by the use in the deed of the word "duly." True, the county clerk exercises a naked statutory power, and it is not enough that he state his mere conclusion that he has complied with the law. The deed should recite facts and not opinions. Duncan v. Gillette, 37 Kan. 156, 14 Pac. 479. But under the rule of liberal interpretation which must be applied to all tax deeds which have been recorded for five years, the word "duly" frequently has some descriptive force. McCauslin v. McGuire; Mack v. Price; Sanger v. Rice. Thus, in Sanger v. Rice the statement that the certificate was duly assigned by the county was held to be a substantial statement of the fact that the assignment by the county was by the county clerk. So here, the statement that the right, title, and interest of the county was duly assigned is a substantial statement that such assignment was accomplished by an assignment of the certificate of sale. In the Sanger case the agent was indicated. In this case the instrument is indicated. The sale having been made to the county, the words "which was the least quantity bid for" are surplusage and should be disregarded.

A minor question presented is decided adversely to the plaintiff in error, because the writings exhibited do not disclose a contract of sale.

The judgment of the district court is affirmed.

(78 Kan. 221)

MISSOURI PAC. RY. CO. v. BENTLEY.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. Dec. 7, 1907.)

1. TRIAL—DEMURRER TO EVIDENCE—WAIVER.

Error in overruling a demurrer to evidence is of no avail, where the defendant, instead of standing upon the demurrer, offers proof which supplies the deficiencies of plaintiff's evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 46, Trial, § 981.]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT—INJURY TO SERVANT—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

A track repairer who omits to look and listen for approaching trains while engaged in the line of his duty at work on the track is not necessarily guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law. Whether such omission constitutes negligence is ordinarily for the jury to determine under all the circumstances.

3. SAME—INSTRUCTION.

In an action for damages for the death of a railroad employé who was run over by an engine while at work on the track, where there is no evidence to show whether he looked and listened, an instruction that, if the employé in charge of the engine could by the exercise of reasonable diligence have seen the deceased on the track in sufficient time to have stopped the engine and thus avoided the injury, plaintiff would be entitled to recover notwithstanding the deceased was negligent in failing to see the approach of the engine, is erroneous. In view of the other instructions as to contributory negligence and the special findings of the jury, the giving of such an instruction in this case is held not to have been prejudicial error.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, §§ 1148-1161.]

4. NEGLIGENCE—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction which leaves the impression upon the jury that the defense of contributory negligence must fail, unless established by defendant's own testimony, is erroneous. An instruction open to this objection held not prejudicial for reasons stated in the opinion.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from District Court, Sumner County; C. L. Swarts, Judge.

Action by Paulina Bentley against the Missouri Pacific Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

J. H. Richards and C. E. Benton (C. E. Elliott, of counsel), for plaintiff in error. W. T. McBride and Ivan D. Rogers, for defendant in error.

PORTER, J. Plaintiff recovered judgment for the death of her husband, who was an employé of the railroad company. Defendant brings error.

On January 28, 1904, Robert T. Bentley, a track repairer, was run over and killed by an engine and tender in the yards of the company at Conway Springs. At the time of the accident, the railroad company maintained at Conway Springs a roundhouse situated on a switch leading to the main track, and on the main track a coal chute and storage bins where engines were supplied with coal. The chute was a high, covered structure, having a track extending through the center, equipped with pockets in which various amounts of coal were placed for the purpose of dumping the same into the tenders of engines when needed. The main track extended east and west, and the chute was on the north side of this track. The switch leading to the roundhouse joined the main track at a point 750 feet west of the place where the deceased was struck, which was on the main track near the coal chute. For 600 feet west of this place the track was straight, thence curving slightly to the north. It was the custom each morning at about 8 o'clock for an engine to leave the roundhouse, enter the main track at the switch, and go to the chute for coal. After entering the main track, the whistle would be sounded, the number of blasts indicating to the men at the chute the number of tons of coal required. Thereupon one of the men in charge at the chute would quit his work, and descend by a stairway from the chute, and take a position in front of the pocket containing the required amount of coal. The morning of the accident was cold, with a strong wind blowing from the northwest. The engine left the roundhouse in charge of the roundhouse foreman and a hostler's helper. After entering the main line, it started east, and four blasts of the whistle were sounded as a signal for the amount of coal required. Steam was cut off, and the engine was running at four to five miles an hour. The track was slightly downgrade to the place where the accident occurred. The deceased had been at work that morning with other employes at a point near where he was struck. The foreman was not with them at that time. There was some difficulty found in tightening one of the bolts, and they left this place, and were all at work on the track, about 250 feet west of the chute, when the foreman returned. The deceased took the foreman back to the former place to show him where the trouble was, and the testimony of the foreman, who was a witness for defendant, is that, after examining the bolt, he directed the deceased to go to the hand car, which stood 165 feet east, and get a track chisel. This was two minutes before the accident. After giving the order, he turned and left deceased there, and never saw him again alive. The foreman was walking along the track 250 feet west of where he left the deceased when the engine passed him going for coal. The testimony showed that the track chisel had not been taken from the hand car. The track wrench, with which deceased had been at work, was found lying north of the rail near the place where the bolt was out, and some spots of blood were found on the north rail a few feet east of the same place. The deceased was not seen by any one until his body was discovered under the engine by the man who had left the coal chute upon hearing the signal for coal, and who had come down to the ground and taken a position at one of the coal pockets.

It is contended that the evidence failed to show that deceased was at work on the track at the time he was struck; that the inference from plaintiff's testimony is that deceased was either walking upon or stepped upon the track directly in front of the approaching engine, and was therefore guilty of contributory negligence. It is argued on these grounds that the court should have sustained a demurrer to the evidence. We think there was sufficient evidence to warrant the court in submitting to the jury the question whether the deceased was at work on the track, and also whether there was contributory negligence. Defendant not only failed to stand upon the demurrer, but offered proof showing that the deceased had been at work at this place on the track within two minutes of the time he was struck, and that he was specially interested in tightening the bolt there. It is conceded in the brief that defendant's testimony "served to clear up some of the circumstances surrounding the accident." As the situation of the deceased could only be shown by circumstantial evidence, we think defendant supplied any deficiency there might have been in plaintiff's proof, and is not in position to claim error in overruling the demurrer. Pine v. Bank, 63 Kan. 462, 465, 65 Pac. 900; Woodmen Circle v. Stretton, 68 Kan. 403, 75 Pac. 472.

In answer to special questions the jury found that the engine was running at from four to five miles an hour; that no other signal was given, except the signal for coal, which was sounded from 550 to 750 feet west of the place of accident; that the employes in charge of the engine failed to keep a lookout, and never saw deceased; that he had not gone after the chisel, but was at work on the track at a point about 40 feet west of the coal chute, and was prevented from hearing the approach of the engine by the wind blowing about the coal bins and chute. We are asked to say that as a matter of law the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence. This we cannot do. The evidence, though circumstantial, supports the finding of the jury that he was at work on the track in the discharge of his duty. True, his position was one of danger, but whether he was negligent in failing to take such precautions as would warn him of the approach of the engine was a question for the jury to determine under the circumstances in evidence. Comstock v. U. P. Ry. Co., 56 Kan. 228, 42 Pac. 724. The same degree of diligence is not required of one whose duty compels his presence upon the track as is required from a traveler about to cross. Ominger v. N. Y. C. & Hudson R. R. Co., 4 Hun (N. Y.) 159; Goodfellow v. Boston, Hartford & Erie Railroad Company, 106 Mass. 461; Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. Peterson, 156 Ind. 364, 59 N. E. 1044; McMarshall v. Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co., 80 Iowa, 757, 45 N. W. 1065, 20 Am. St. Rep. 445; Jordan v. Chicago, St. P., M. & O. Ry. Co., 58 Minn. 8, 59 N. W. 633, 49 Am. St. Rep. 486; Noonan v. N. Y. Cent. & H. R. R. Co., 62 Hun. 618, 16 N. Y. Supp. 678; St. Louis, I. M. & S. Ry. Co. v. Jackson, 78 Ark. 100, 93 S. W. 746, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 646; Austin v. Fitchburg Railroad, 172 Mass. 484, 52 N. E.

527; Northern Pacific Railroad v. Everett, 152 U. S. 107, 14 Sup. Ct. 474, 38 L. Ed. 373; Shoner v. Pennsylvania Company, 130 Ind. 170, 28 N. E. 616, 20 N. E. 775; 2 Thompson's Commentaries on the Law of Negligence, § 1756. This author says, in reference to the duty of track repairers, track walkers, and similar employes: "As a general rule, it is not contributory negligence as a matter of law for a person so employed not to be on a constant lookout for approaching trains." A fair statement of the law is that the employé must exercise such care as the danger of his surroundings would suggest to a man of ordinary prudence and caution; and it is obvious that conduct which would be negligent on the part of one who is about to cross a railroad track, though an employé at work in the yards, might not constitute negligence on the part of one whose duty requires him to remain upon the track. Dyerson v. Railroad Co., 74 Kan. 528, 87 Pac. 680, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 132. "Nor does the principle apply to employes whose duties require their presence upon the track, the performance of which duties necessarily precludes their paying the strictest attention to the approach of trains." 23 A. & E. Enc. of Law, 768. In the case cited, supra (Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. Peterson, Adm'r), the following language is used: "The mere fact that a track repairer omits to look and listen for approaching trains while engaged in the line of his duty on the track does not render him guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law; the question whether such omission constitutes negligence being for the jury." From what has been said it is manifest that the court properly refused the request for a peremptory instruction to find for defendant. Complaint is made of the refusal to give a number of other instructions asked; but the propositions involved therein appear to have been fully covered in the instructions given. Two of the instructions given require comment. Instruction No. 9 told the jury that, if the employé in charge of the engine could, by the exercise of reasonable diligence, have seen the deceased on the track in sufficient time to have stopped the engine, and thus avoided the injury, plaintiff would be entitled to recover notwithstanding the deceased was negligent in failing to discover the approach of the engine. In other words, it informed the jury that plaintiff might recover notwithstanding the negligence of the deceased was of the same character as the negligence of the man in charge of the engine, or even if his negligence was of a higher degree than that of the other employé. It is said in the brief that this instruction follows the law declared in Railway Co. v. Arnold, 67 Kan. 260, 72 Pac. 857. But the doctrine of "the last clear chance" obviously has no application to the facts of this case. There was no evidence showing when the negligence of Bentley ceased, if he were negligent, nor was there any evidence to show that, after it ceased, the negligence of defendant continued. In Dyerson v. Railroad Co., supra, Mr. Justice Mason, in commenting upon Railway Co. v. Arnold, supra, and the doctrine of "the last clear chance" as stated in 20 American and English Encyclopedia of Law, 137, used the following language: "This may be accepted as a correct statement of a principle of universal application, according with both reason and authority, provided the words 'after its occurrence' be interpreted to mean after the person concerned had ceased to be negligent. The rule that, under the circumstances stated, the neglect of one party to discover the omission of the other is to be held to be the sole proximate cause of a resulting injury is not an arbitrary, but a reasonable, one. The test is: What wrongful conduct occasioning an injury was in operation at the very moment it occurred or became inevitable? If just before the climax only one party had the power to prevent the catastrophe, and he neglected to use it, the legal responsibility is his alone. If, however, each had such power, and each neglected to use it, then their negligence was concurrent and neither can recover against the other." The opinion further quotes the following extract from volume 2 of the Supplement to the American and English Encyclopedia of Law, p. 64: "This so-called exception to the rule of contributory negligence (i. e., the doctrine of 'the last clear chance') will not be extended to cases where the plaintiff's own negligence extended up to and actually contributed to the injury. To warrant its application, there must have been some new breach of duty on the part of the defendant subsequent to the plaintiff's negligence." The instruction was erroneous as applied to the facts of this case, but we are unable to say that it was prejudicial in view of the other instructions as to contributory negligence, and especially in view of the findings of the jury, in substance, to the effect that Bentley was not negligent in failing to discover the approach of the engine. The jury found that he was engaged at work on the track, and did not hear the whistle or the approach of the engine on account of being "busy at work," and the wind whistling through, around, and under the coal bins. If he was not negligent at all, the instruction had no application, and must be held to have had no effect upon the general verdict.

Instruction No. 14 was as follows: "The burden of proof is upon the defendant to show negligence upon the part of the deceased, Robert T. Bentley, which contributed to his death." An instruction very similar, though slightly different in language, was held to be reversible error in Railway Co. v. Merrill, 61 Kan. 671, 60 Pac. 819, because it left the impression upon the jury that the defense of contributory negligence must fail, unless established by defendant's own testimony. In that case plaintiff was a witness, and testified at great length in respect of his actions and conduct at the time he received the injury. There was much room in that case for the jury to be misled by the instruction. In Railroad Co. v. Johnson, 74 Kan. 83, 86 Pac. 156, we refused to extend the doctrine of Railway Co. v. Merrill to a case where there was no evidence offered by plaintiff which showed contributory negligence, and where the jury could not have been misled. In the present case it is difficult to see how the instruction could have prejudiced defendant. There was no sharp conflict between the evidence of plaintiff and that of defendant on this proposition. No person saw the deceased immediately before the accident, and neither the evidence of plaintiff nor that offered by defendant told the jury what his conduct was. The evidence of both practically left him at work on the track a very short space of time before the accident. The presumption is that he failed to see or hear the approach of the engine. Whether he was negligent in this is a matter of inference arising from all the circumstances, aided by natural presumptions. In other words, if the instruction had been qualified as it should have been, and the jury had been told that they might find from the evidence of plaintiff alone that deceased was guilty of contributory negligence, the result must have been the same. The fact could only be determined from all the circumstances by inferences and presumptions; and the circumstances shown by plaintiff did not differ from those shown by defendant. The jury were quite fully instructed as to what would constitute contributory negligence of the deceased and prevent a recovery by plaintiff, and were expressly told in instruction No. 8 to consider all the evidence in the case in determining this question.

For these reasons, we are not inclined to reverse the judgment for the errors in these two instructions. The case was otherwise fairly tried. There is evidence to support the verdict and special findings, and the judgment must be affirmed.

ST. LOUIS & S. F. R. CO. v. MORRIS.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. Dec. 7, 1907.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT—INJURY TO SERVANT—APPLIANCES.

Where the rules of a railroad company require the employes in case of danger to the company's property to unite to protect it, and where, in a case of apparent danger to such property, a conductor orders his brakeman to stop a moving car from which such danger by an impending collision with a pile driver may be fairly anticipated, the brakeman, if he has no knowledge or notice to the contrary, may act upon the assumption that such car is furnished with the ordinary and proper appliances for the safety of employes in performing their duties.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, §§ 675-677.]

2. SAME—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Where a master orders a servant into a situation of danger, and in obeying the command the servant is injured, he will not be charged with contributory negligence or with an assumption of the risk, unless the danger was so glaring that no prudent man would have encountered it, even under such orders, provided he acts with reasonable prudence in executing such orders.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, §§ 648-651, 778-783.]

3. SAME—EVIDENCE.

Whether the hazard is so great that a reasonably prudent man would not undertake the service required, and whether, when undertaken, the employe proceeded with reasonable care, are, where the evidence is conflicting as in this case, questions of fact for a jury, and the finding of a jury thereon, where proper instructions were given, must be sustained.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, § 1129; vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 3935-3937.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from District Court, Sedgwick County; Thos. C. Wilson, Judge.

Action by H. J. Morris against the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

The plaintiff in the district court, H. J. Morris, suffered personal injuries causing the loss of his leg below the knee. The action was for damages for the injury. He alleged negligence on the part of the defendant company as follows: "In failing to provide suitable handholds and brakes and apparatus on the car which he was directed to handle, * * * and in carelessly handling said cars and sending plaintiff to a place of danger, and requiring him to act in an emergency without warning and without taking proper precaution against injuring him; * * * that paragraph 5 of the general rules of the Frisco System provided, 'in case of danger to the company's property, employes must unite to protect it'; * * * that punishment was provided for servants disobeying said rule; * * * that the plaintiff undertook to stop the moving car in question in accordance with, and in obedience to, said rules, and in accordance with his general duties as brakeman, and with the direction of the conductor of his train; * * * that the car which plaintiff tried to stop was a freight car, which was then and there in use by the work crew in charge thereof, and said car was without any proper handholds, brakes, or appliances usual and necessary for use by brakemen in handling, controlling, or stopping such car; that the hand brake had been removed therefrom and no air brake was accessible or available, and plaintiff first ascertained these facts when he reached the end of the car for the purpose of applying the brakes. * * * Plaintiff says that if the handholds or the brake itself had been on said car, in proper condition, he could have held the same and stopped the car, and saved himself, as well as defendant's property, from injury." The plaintiff was a brakeman on the local freight train of the defendant railroad company running from Wichita to Ellsworth. This train was standing on the main track at Burton, while the track in front or to the north was being cleared of flat cars, part of a work train consisting of a pile driver and accompanying tool cars and flat cars used in carrying piles. The pile driver and two tool cars stood on the side track west of the local train, and about two or three car lengths south of the engine of the latter. The engine of the work train was shoving a flat car from the main track about 400 feet north of the pile driver to the side track. The pile driver stood on this side track with the leads or guides in front, so that a car coming down the track from the north, if not stopped, would collide with these guides, and might injure the pile driver. On the west side of the side track, and just north of the pile driver, were piles to be loaded on the flat cars. When the engine had pushed the flat car past the connecting switch, and upon the side track, it was cut off by order of the conductor, and the car was left to roll down the track—there being a slight downgrade there—towards the guides of the pile driver. As the car passed by the side of the local train, the conductor and a brakeman of that train were walking along with it and on the east side of the moving car, thrusting blocks under the wheels endeavoring thereby to stop it, but apparently without success. It was moving at the rate of about four miles per hour. The plaintiff, Morris, passed around in front from the east side of the engine of the local train to the west side. As to what then occurred he testified as follows: "Just as I got there, I saw somebody about the car. Somebody had lost control of it, and was trying to stop it with chunks, and my conductor said, 'For God's sake, stop that car.' It was going towards the guides on the pile driver. I ran over. I thought the brake was laying down on the car, as they often do on flat cars, and, when I got around the end, I turned and grabbed for the brake. There was no brake, and I grabbed for the handhold, and there was no handhold, and I grabbed the chain, and it was still fastened to the brake rod, but disengaged from the lever, and it came all at once and I fell, and scrambled along a few feet, and I fell and caught this leg and crushed it right across there." The brake staff had been removed for convenience it seems in loading piles, and this was known to the conductor. The handhold had been broken off or removed in some way, but when the evidence does not show. There was an uncoupling rod with pin lever on that end of the car. The car was stopped immediately after the plaintiff was injured. The cries of the plaintiff attracted the attention of the trainmen, who found him just outside of the west rail, having pulled back the mangled leg before the second wheel could reach it. It appears that upon a former trial the plaintiff had testified that it was his purpose to steady himself by the handhold with one hand, and try to stop the car by pulling on the chain with the other, when, the chain coming "all at once," he stumbled and fell. On this trial on cross-examination he admitted that he had so testified, and that in taking hold of the chain he thought he could assist in stopping the car in that way; that it naturally came into his mind to do so; and that he was walking backward, pulling the chain, when he so stumbled and fell. In further explanation of the occurrence the plaintiff testified: "Q. Now, why did you go in to stop that car? A. Well, the rules demand that I should protect the company's property in case of danger to it, and my conductor ordered me to do so. Q. What property were you seeking to protect? A. Company's property. Q. What property? A. The pile driver, in particular. Q. What use did you seek to make of this handhold when you grabbed for it? A. To steady myself. Q. In what way? A. Well, just to keep from—that is what that is naturally therefor. Q. What is a handhold for? A. For that purpose, to steady yourself and to protect you from falling underneath the cars. Q. And working between the cars? A. And working between the cars. Q. Well, if there had been a handhold there, after you found there was no brake, what use could you have made of that handhold? A. Could have held myself up easily.

* * * A. No; I got clear across the track and came up to the car, could see that the brake wasn't there just as I turned around and saw the beam there. It all came to me all at once. In looking for the brake staff, there the car came up to me, and I grabbed for what was there. No grab iron and no brake staff. * * * A. When I ran around the car, the first thing I looked for was the wheel on the outside of the end of the car, saw the wheel was not there, and naturally my eye would glance on toward the injured part of the car to see what the rest of the defects was, and, when it got closer up, I grabbed for the grab iron. Q. You had considered when you went there, whether the grab iron was there? A. I was considering it. In the impulse grabbed for the brake wheel. Grabbed for that; naturally would be the first thing that stuck out from the car. I glanced, and it was not there, and glanced along where the brake staff would have been laid, and seen the brake staff completely gone, and, as the car came up to me, I grabbed for the grab iron, and it was gone too, and the first thing my hand fell on was the chain.

* * * Q. You did not attempt to step west of the car? A. Well, I attempted to shove myself away from the car. Q. How much? A. Of course, the car coming toward me nothing there to get hold of to spring against to get away, any more than putting your hand against a flat surface and shove yourself sideways from it. * * * Q. You say you lost your balance? A. Yes, sir. Q. How did you come to lose your balance? A. Naturally, when you come to the car, you take hold of the grab iron. There was no grab iron there, and I grabbed hold of the chain, and in order to use the chain to steady me, and lost my balance for the reason that the chain came all at once, and I fell down. Could probably have steadied myself much better if I hadn't grabbed hold of the chain, if I had thrown my hand against the car or something; but grabbed hold of the chain, and the whole chain coming—the whole thing being disconnected was really what lost my balance. Q. Is that the way you lost your balance? A. It is. Q. Cannot tell just how you lost your balance? A. Yes, sir. I grabbed the chain to steady myself. * * * Q. If that brake wheel had been bent down, would not the brake wheel have been west of the west line of the car? A. A few inches. Yes, sir. Q. Three inches west of the west alignment of the car? A. Yes, sir. Q. And to attempt to turn that brake wheel for the purpose of winding the brake chain and setting the brake shoes on the wheels upon it properly, and so as to take hold of the brake wheel with both hands to turn it? A. That is probably true; but there was piling laying outside the rail, so I could not walk along this piling and do that." The plaintiff noticed that the brake staff was not standing when he started around the car, but supposed that he would find it laying down. He had been in railroad service about ten years—three years as brakeman. The conductor, Sheuerhoff, testified that he did not give the order to stop the car, and the conductor and the brakeman of the work train testified that they did not hear such an order given, and the brakeman at the front wheels testified that he did not remember such an order. The conductor of the work train, and the plaintiff's fellow brakeman, testified that the plaintiff said, when they went to him after the injury, in response to an inquiry, that he had climbed on the brake beam, pulled the brake chain, and slipped and fell. The fireman of the local train said that, looking out of his cab window, he saw him climb on the car, pull the chain, and fall off. On the other hand, the brakeman who was at the front wheels on the opposite side of the car, and nearest to him said that plaintiff did not ride the brake beam, adding: "I do not think that he did."

The jury found for the plaintiff, assessing his damages at $2,000, and returned the following findings: "Q. 1. When plaintiff first discovered the absence of the brake staff from the car, had he approached so near to the moving car that he could not safely attempt to get away from the car? A. Yes; could attempt, but not safely. Q. 2. When the plaintiff discovered the absence of the brake staff from the moving car, was the car moving more rapidly than plaintiff could walk? A. Yes; in his position. Q. 3. When the plaintiff discovered the absence of the brake staff from the moving car, did he attempt to get away from the car? A. Yes. Q. 4. If the foregoing question three is answered in the affirmative, then state in what manner the plaintiff attempted to get away from the car. A. By grabbing for handhold to steady himself. Q. 5. When plaintiff discovered the absence of the brake staff from the moving car, what distance was the car from the pile driver as near as you can determine from the evidence? A. 40 to 50 feet. Q. 6. When plaintiff discovered the absence of the brake staff from the moving car, did he take hold of the brake chain with his hand? A. Yes; to steady himself. Q. 7. When plaintiff discovered the absence of the brake staff from the moving car, did he take hold of the brake chain, and pull it? A. Yes. Q. 8. After plaintiff discovered the absence of the brake staff from the moving car, did he take hold of the brake chain intending to pull the chain while moving along in front of the car. A. No; to steady himself. Q. 9. When plaintiff took hold of the brake chain, did he at the same time discover that the handhold was not on the car? A. Yes; at the same time. Q. 10. When plaintiff pulled the brake chain, had he looked to see whether or not the handhold was on the car? A. Yes; at the same time. Q. 11. Did plaintiff lose his balance when he pulled on the brake chain? A. No; previous to that time. Q. 12. When plaintiff lost his balance, did he struggle to protect himself from falling in front of the car? A. Yes. Q. 13. Did plaintiff fall in front of the car while struggling to protect himself from such fall after he had pulled the brake chain? A. Yes."

A motion for judgment for the defendant on the findings was overruled. Also a motion for a new trial. The company assigns error upon these rulings; also upon the refusal of the court to give the following instruction: "The jury are instructed that, in order, to justify a finding in this case against the defendant that it was negligence to omit having a handhold in the usual place on the end of the car when plaintiff attempted to stop said car, it must appear from the evidence to the satisfaction of the jury; (a) that it was bound to anticipate that its trainmen would seek to stop such a car by the use of the means adopted by the plaintiff in this case; (b) and that it was necessary that a handhold be provided in the usual place on the end of the car in order to protect such employé from injury while attempting to stop the car by such means; (c) and that it would be dangerous to attempt to stop the car by the use of such means without such handhold or some equivalent device being provided at the usual place of such handhold on the end of the car where such attempt might be expected to be made; (d) and that defendant failed to provide such handhold or any other device which could with reasonable safety be used for the purpose of protecting such employé from injury while attempting to stop the car by the use of the means adopted by the plaintiff in this case as shown by the evidence."

C. F. Parker, H. C. Sluss, and W. F. Evans, for plaintiff in error. Houston & Brooks, for defendant in error.

BENSON, J. (after stating the facts as above). The first error specified by the defendant company is in refusing the instruction requested and quoted above. The instruction, if given, would have limited the province of the jury in determining the question of negligence to a situation where the company would be bound to anticipate just such an accident occurring in the precise manner that this occurred. This rule, if adopted, would unduly restrict the functions of a jury. It may be conceded that the defect, in order to be the basis of an action, should be such that injuries therefrom might reasonably be anticipated; yet it is not necessary that the particular circumstances attending such injuries should be anticipated. The unusual nature of the accident and the attending circumstances are factors to be considered by the jury in determining the master's exercise of due care. Labatt, Master & Servant, § 145. The instructions given were clear and comprehensive, and fairly presented the issues to the jury in the light of all the evidence, and no error is presented in the refusal to charge further as requested.

It is urged that judgment for the defendant should have been rendered upon the findings. It is argued that the first five findings, taken in connection with the admissions of the plaintiff in his testimony, would support such a judgment. It is stated that the plaintiff ran in front of the car without looking to see whether there was a brake or handhold upon it or not, and that he negligently went so close to the car that he could not get away without injury, or that he negligently failed to attempt to get away. A careful reading of the evidence, in connection with the findings, leads to the conclusion, however, that the findings have their warrant and support in the evidence, although the evidence is conflicting.

The principal reliance of the defendant company in asking for a reversal seems to be the alleged error of the court in refusing a new trial. It is claimed that the plaintiff failed to show any negligence of the company, and upon all the evidence contributory negligence on his part was shown. Attention is called to the fact that the absence of a handhold does not prove negligence, because there was no evidence as to the time when it had been removed, and the rule announced in Railway Co. v. Dorr, 73 Kan. 486, 85 Pac. 533, that unless the defects were of such a nature or had existed for so long a time that they should have been discovered and remedied, applies. In this case, however, if the theory of the plaintiff was sustained by the evidence, the employé was suddenly called to a place of danger by the order of his superior. In such a situation the master is presumed to know whether the place or instru-mentality is reasonably safe, and the servant may rely upon that assumption, unless the danger is so obvious that a prudent man in the same circumstances would not encounter it, even with the assurance that such presumption affords. The servant, acting in good faith, upon an order of his superior, may rely upon the instrumentalities being in their usual condition and fit for use, where he does not have knowledge, and is not chargeable with notice, to the contrary. In such a situation he may rightly rely upon the assumption that his employer has done his duty by furnishing reasonably safe machinery, appliances, and surroundings. Thompson on Negligence, § 3765; Mo. Pac. Ry. Co. v. Barber, 44 Kan. 612, 24 Pac. 969. The order is considered to be an implied assurance that there is no abnormal danger. Labatt, Master & Servant, § 440c. Whether the plaintiff was negligent in the performance of the duty assigned to him must be determined in the light of the situation in which he was placed. If his act was such as a reasonably prudent man would have done, it was not negligent, although some other course would have been absolutely safe. Brinkmeier v. Railway Co., 69 Kan. 738, 77 Pac. 586. It must be remembered that this was a sudden call to a dangerous service which had to be performed then, or not at all. He was bound to use the discretion and judgment that a prudent man would in that situation. If it was a palpably reckless or foolhardy risk, he cannot be excused. If it was such as a prudent man would have performed, he might undertake it, although hazardous. The same rule applies to the manner in which the service was performed. Called to the service, he was bound to use such means as reasonable prudence dictated in the emergency in which he was placed. Whether he ought to have undertaken the work, and whether he made use of reasonable means in performing it, were questions properly submitted to the jury.

Labatt on Master & Servant, § 358, says: "In other cases the essence of the situation to be considered is that the servant was confronted by a serious danger; that he had not sufficient time to deliberate upon the comparative safety to the alternative courses of action open to him for the purpose of avoiding injury; and that the alarm or nervous excitement produced by the conjuncture impaired his reasoning faculties to such a degree that it was unjust to gauge the quality of his conduct by the ordinary standards. It is well settled that a servant who is suddenly exposed to great and imminent danger is not expected to act with that degree of prudence which would otherwise be obligatory; or, as the doctrine is also expressed, a servant is not necessarily chargeable with negligence because he failed to select the best means of escape in an emergency." Where a conductor ordered a brakeman to cut off cars from a moving train, it was held that, even If he was not directed to go in between the cars, he might nevertheless do so, if such a mode appeared to him, in the exercise of ordinary care to be necessary. Hannah v. Connecticut River Railroad, 154 Mass. 529, 28 N. E. 682. The same rule was applied when on a dark, stormy night a brakeman, who was required to act promptly, complied with an order to use a defective link. Denver, T. & G. R. Co. v. Simpson, 16 Colo. 55, 26 Pac. 339, 25 Am. St. Rep. 242. In Wurtenberger v. Railway Co., 68 Kan. 642, 75 Pac. 1049, it was held: "Where a master orders a servant into a situation of danger, and, in obeying the command, he is injured, the law will not charge him with contributory negligence, or with an assumption of risk, unless the danger was so glaring that no prudent man would have encountered it, even under orders from one having authority over him." In Railroad Co. v. Langley, 70 Kan. 453, 78 Pac. 858, it was said: "Again, where one, by the negligent act of another, is placed in a position of danger which requires immediate and rapid action, without time to deliberate as to the better course to pursue, he is not held to the strict accountability that is required of one situated in more favorable circumstances. Contributory negligence is not necessarily chargeable to one who fails to exercise the greatest prudence, or best judgment, in a case where he is required to act suddenly or in an emergency." The following cases are illustrative of the duties of a railroad company and its employes in similar cases: Settle v. St. L. & S. F. Ry. Co., 127 Mo. 336, 30 S. W. 125, 48 Am. St. Rep. 633; Fox v. C., St. P. & K. C. Ry. Co., 86 Iowa, 368, 53 N. W. 259, 17 L. R. A. 239; Mason v. Railroad Co., 111 N. C. 482, 16 S. E. 696, 18 L. R. A. 845, 32 Am. St. Rep. 814; Coates v. Boston & Maine Railroad, 153 Mass. 297, 26 N. E. 864, 10 L. R. A. 769. The company by its rule required the plaintiff to unite with other employes to protect its property. He was suddenly called to that duty by his superior. He was not only bound to use ordinary care, but he was also bound to make all reasonable effort to save his employer's property. He was required to be loyal as well as to be careful.

The facts were fairly submitted to a jury, and, finding no error in the proceedings, the judgment is affirmed.

MOORE et al. v. HERD.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. Dec. 7, 1907.)

WILLS — ELECTION — RIGHTS OF SURVIVING HUSBAND.

The statute (Gen. St. 1901, § 7979) requiring a widow to elect whether to accept the provisions of her deceased husband's will or to take what she is entitled to under the law of descents and distributions applies also to a husband for whom provision is made by the will of his deceased wife. In view of its origin and its intimate connection with the act relating to descents and distributions, it must be deemed to be affected by the language of section 28 thereof (Gen. St. 1901, § 2529) that provisions of that act in relation to the widow of a deceased husband shall be applicable to the husband of a deceased wife.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from District Court, Douglas County; C. A. Smart, Judge.

Action between Albert G. Moore and others and James Herd. From the judgment, Moore and others bring error. Affirmed.

W. J. Sturgis and Bishop & Mitchell, for plaintiffs in error. John Q. A. Norton, for defendant in error.

MASON, J. The parties to this proceeding agree that it turns upon this question: Does the statute relating to the election by a widow to accept the provisions of her husband's will, or to take what she is entitled to under the law of descents and distributions, apply, also, to a husband for whom provision is made by the will of his deceased wife? The statute reads: "If any provision be made for a widow in the will of her husband, and she shall not have consented thereto in writing, it shall be the duty of the probate court, forthwith after the probate of such will, to issue a citation to said widow to appear and make her election, whether she will accept such provision or take what she is entitled to under the provisions of the law concerning descents and distributions, and said election shall be made within thirty days after the service of the citation aforesaid; but she shall not be entitled to both." Gen. St. 1901, § 7979. A section of an Iowa statute substantially similar to this, so far as relates to the matter under consideration, was held to require an election by a husband who wished to take the benefit of his wife's will. Everett v. Crosby, 92 Iowa, 333, 60 N. W. 732, citing Shields v. Keys, 24 Iowa, 298. That section, however (section 2452, Iowa Code 1873), was a part of a chapter in another portion of which (section 2440) this language occurred: "All provisions made in this chapter in regard to the widow of a deceased husband shall be applicable to the surviving husband of a deceased wife." Practically the same language is found in the Kansas act concerning descents and distributions (Gen. St. 1901, § 2529), which was adopted in 1859 (chapter 63, p. 381, Laws 1859), being taken with but slight changes from the Iowa statute. In this state, however, the whole subject of wills, including the matter of the election by the widow, is treated in a different chapter, enacted at a later date. It is therefore difficult to find in the bare words of the statute justification for extending to the husband a provision relating in terms only to the wife. When, however, the matter is considered broadly, in the light of the history of this particular enactment and of the spirit of equality and uniformity which pervades all our legislation affecting the parties to the marriage contract, it is difficult to reach any other conclusion than that the real intention of the Legislature was that their reciprocal rights should be precisely the same with regard to wills, as in all other matters. There would be less occasion to depart from the literal reading of the statute if nothing more were involved than the manner of election—if the question were merely whether the husband should indicate his choice formally, as is required of a widow, or might do so by any method ordinarily open to a devisee who has rights inconsistent with the terms of a will, one, for instance, whose property the testator assumes to dispose of. But the issue is more important than this. The question is not how the husband shall elect, but whether he shall be required to elect at all.

The Kansas act relating to wills (chapter 117, Gen. St. 1901) was framed by the commissioners appointed for the revision of the statutes in 1868, and passed in that year. It was borrowed very largely from the Ohio law. Chapter 123, Rev. St. Ohio, 1860. There was inserted, however, a new section (section 7972, Gen. St. 1901), forbidding either spouse to bequeath away from the other, except by written consent, more than one-half of the property of the testator. The section of the Ohio statute upon which that now under consideration was based read as follows: "If any provision be made for a widow, in the will of her husband, it shall be the duty of the probate judge, forthwith after the probate of such will, to issue a citation to said widow to appear and make her election, whether she will take such provision, or be endowed of the lands of her said husband, and said election shall be made within one year from the date of the service of the citation aforesaid; but she shall not be entitled to both, unless it plainly appears by the will to have been the intention that she should have such provision in addition to her dower." Section 43, c. 123, Swan & Critchfield's Rev. St. Ohio, 1860. It will be observed that two of the changes made were rendered necessary by the addition of the new section referred to, and by the fact that the estate of dower had already been abolished in Kansas. The words, "and she shall not have consented thereto in writing," were added, and for the phrase, "or be endowed of the lands of her said husband," there was substituted, "or take what she is entitled to under the provisions of the law concerning descents and distributions." The only other change aside from that reducing the time for election from 1 year to 30 days was the dropping of the words, "unless it plainly appears by the will to have been the intention that she should have such provision in addition to her dower," thereby making the rule absolute that the widow could not have the benefit of the will and the law both. The Legislature cannot have regarded the provisions relating to this rule either as surplusage, or as merely declaratory. At common law the wife was permitted to claim her dower while accepting devises under her husband's will. 2 Underhill on the Law of Wills, § 744; 1 Jarman on Wills (Bigelow's Ed.) 463, star p. 429. "It is well established, as general doctrine, that, since dower is a legal right, the intention to exclude that right, by a devise or bequest of something else, must be demonstrated, if not by express words, at least by (what appears to the court to amount to) necessary implication. It is only where the claim of dower would be inconsistent with the will, or plainly tend to defeat some other part of the testator's disposition of his property, that the widow can be compelled to elect whether she will take her dower or the interest devised to her." 1 Cooley on Blackstone (1st Ed.) p. 138, note 34. The same is said to be true as to a statutory right granted in lieu of dower. "It is a general rule in equity, as regards the widow's dower, that the court will not compel her to elect between her dower or other statutory right and interest which she may have in the estate of the testator, and a provision made for her in the will, unless, first, it shall appear in express terms that the bequest or devise was given in lieu or satisfaction of her dower; or, second, unless it appears by clear and manifest implication on the circumstances of the case that the testator intended her to elect. She will not be compelled to elect unless her claim of dower is plainly inconsistent and irreconcilable with the will of the testator, and so repugnant to it that both her claim of dower and the devise in the will cannot consistently be upheld. She has a right to take both, despite the fact that the benefit given by the will may be much greater in fact than her dower." 2 Underhill on the Law of Wills, § 744.

It seems naturally to follow that if, in the absence of a statute to the contrary, a wife might claim the half of her deceased husband's estate under the law of descents and distributions and also take the benefit of his will, the husband could do the same with respect to his deceased wife's estate, where the law gives each the same interest in the other's property. If the section now under consideration is to be applied to the widow exclusively, it must be upon the assumption that the lawmakers intended to deny such a privilege to the wife, while suffering the husband to continue in its enjoyment. Such an intention ought not to be imputed to the Legislature if any reasonable alternative is presented; for it is entirely at variance with the purpose manifested in every other part of the Kansas statutes affecting the relations of husband and wife—a purpose to give the same property rights to each. Rather than accept such an interpretation, the court may well conclude, and does conclude, that the framers of the act regarded it as so intimately connected with the chapter on descents and distributions, as to be affected by the rule there laid down, that provisions in relation to the widow of a deceased husband should be applicable to the husband of a deceased wife. Of course, if the statute is to be construed as forbidding the husband as well as the wife to take under the will and under the law at the same time, it necessarily follows that all its provisions relating to the election, including the method by which it shall be made known, must be held to apply in the one case as well as in the other. If the revision commissioners in 1868 had undertaken to draft in their own language a statute regarding election adapted to the rights of the husband and wife as they exist in Kansas, they would doubtless have made it refer, in terms, to both spouses. But they evidently chose to accomplish their purposes by making only such changes in the Ohio law as seemed necessary to that end. Proceeding in this manner, it is not surprising that they should have omitted an express mention of the privileges and duties of the surviving husband, upon the assumption that other parts of the statutes would make it clear that they were the same as those specified in the case of the widow.

This view of the question discussed requires an affirmance of the judgment of the district court

(76 Kan. 928)

STATE v. WAY.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. Dec. 7, 1907.)

1. INFORMATION—CONVICTION OF LESSER OFFENSE.

A conviction for an offense less than that defined in the statute upon which a prosecution is primarily based may be sustained, if the information alleges the existence of all the essential facts constituting such less offense; and under such circumstances a more liberal construction is allowed than is ordinarily applied to criminal pleadings.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 27, Indictment and Information, §§ 580, 581.]

2. SAME—VERDICT—ABSENCE OF ACCUSED.

The right of the defendant to be present when a verdict is returned, secured to him by the statutory provision that "no person indicted or informed against for felony can be tried unless he be personally present during the trial," is one that may be waived, and if, while at liberty on bond, he is voluntarily absent, without having been excused by the court, when the jury reaches an agreement, a verdict against him may lawfully be received in his absence.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from District Court, Montgomery County; Thos. J. Flannelly, Judge.

Grant Way was convicted of betting on a game of chance, and appeals. Affirmed.

H. A. Scott and J. B. Tomlinson, for appellant. F. S. Jackson, Atty. Gen., and J. R. Charlton, for the State.

MASON, J. Grant Way was prosecuted upon a charge of setting up and keeping a gambling device, and was convicted of the inferior offense of betting upon a game of chance at a gambling resort. He appeals, and presents two grounds of error: (1) That the court erred in instructing the jury that the information charged a violation of the statute upon which the verdict was based; and (2) that the verdict should have been set aside because it was returned in the absence of the defendant. These contentions will be considered in their order.

The information was obviously drawn under section 2228 of the General Statutes of 1901, reading as follows: "Every person who shall set up or keep any table or gambling device commonly called ABC, faro bank, EO, roulette, equality, keno, wheel of fortune, or any kind of gambling table or gambling device, adapted, devised and designed for the purpose of playing any game of chance for money or property, or shall induce, entice or permit any person to bet or play at or upon any such gambling-table or gambling device, or at or upon any game played at or by means of such table or gambling device, either on the side of or against the keeper thereof, or shall keep a place or room to be used as a place for playing any game of cards for money or property, or keep a common gaming-house or keep a house, room or place to which persons are accustomed to resort for the purpose of gambling, shall, on conviction be adjudged guilty of felony, and punished by imprisonment and hard labor for a term not less than one year nor more than five years." The verdict as obviously referred to section 2232, for it pronounced the defendant guilty of "betting money on a game of chance with cards and chips at a place where persons were accustomed to resort for gambling purposes." This section reads: "Every person who shall either directly or indirectly bet any money or property at any common gaming-house, or at any place to which persons are accustomed to resort for gambling purposes, or at any place kept for the purpose of being used as a place for gambling, whether such betting be upon any game of skill or chance, either with or without cards or dice, or by use of any kind of device or contrivance whatsoever for determining chances, shall be guilty of a felony, and upon conviction shall be punished by imprisonment at hard labor in the penitentiary for a term not less than one year nor more than three years." The information charged that the defendant: "Did * * * keep, set up and maintain * * * a gambling device and devices composed of playing cards and red, white and blue celluloid chips, commonly known as poker chips, said cards and chips then and there being adapted, devised, and designed for the purpose of playing a game and games of chance, commonly known as poker, for money and property and * * * did * * * induce, solicit, request, and permit persons to bet, offer, and wager lawful money of the United States of America and to play with, and by means of said gambling device and devices, the game commonly known as poker with and against said defendants, and that through this gambling device, and devices, lawful and current money of the United States of America and property were lost and won by chance."

From this statement of the statutes, the information, and the verdict, it appears that the section upon which the conviction was had is directed against betting under certain circumstances, and that the defendant was not in direct and express terms charged with having bet upon anything. A conviction may always be had upon any less offense which is included within that charged (Gen. St. 1901, § 5564), or, as said in State v. Burwell, 34 Kan. 312, 8 Pac. 470: "Wherever a person is charged upon information with the commission of an offense under one section of the statutes, and the offense charged includes another offense under another section of the statutes, the defendant may be found guilty of either offense." Some liberality of interpretation is permitted in such cases. The rule is thus stated in 22 Cyc. 467: "While it is not necessary to make a specific charge of all the offenses included in the charge for which the indictment is drawn, a conviction cannot be had of a crime as included in the offense specifically charged, unless the indictment in describing the major offense contains all the essential averments of the less, or the greater offense necessarily includes all the essential ingredients of the less." In several instances it has been held that words used in the statute defining the inferior offense need not be used in the information, where the statements there made in charging the greater offense necessarily show the existence of all the facts essential to constitute the less. For example, a conviction under a statute (section 2029, Gen. St. 1901) against administering medicine with the intent to procure abortion has been sustained under an information which did not use the word "abortion," being drawn under a statute forbidding the giving of medicine to a woman pregnant with a quick child with the intent to destroy such child; the reasoning being that the destruction of a quick child necessarily involved the procuring of an abortion. State v. Watson, 30 Kan. 281, 1 Pac. 770. The exact question to be here determined is therefore whether the acts charged in the information necessarily involved those found in the verdict. The allegations that the defendant set up a gambling device, and induced persons to play for money by means thereof, sufficiently imply that the place where it was maintained was one to which persons were accustomed to resort for the purpose of gambling, and which was kept for that purpose. And to say that the defendant "did * * * induce * * * and permit persons to bet and to play by means of said gambling device (cards and chips) * * * the game commonly known as poker with and against said defendant, * * * and that through this gambling device * * * money and property were lost and won by chance," is to say, in effect, that the defendant bet money on a game of chance played with cards and chips. "If two persons play at cards for money, they are said to be gambling or gaming; but they are gaming because they lay a wager or make a bet on the result of the game, and therefore to say they are betting is equally appropriate." People v. Weithoff, 51 Mich. 203, 210, 16 N. W. 442, 445, 47 Am. Rep. 557. "The legal meaning of the term 'bet' is the mutual agreement and tender of a gift of something valuable, which is to belong to one of the contending parties according to the result of the trial of chance or skill, or both." Mayo v. State (Tex. Cr. App.) 82 S. W. 515. If the defendant permitted others to play with him in a game at which money was lost and won by chance, he necessarily bet money upon a game of chance. The court concludes that, although the crime for which a conviction was had was not charged with the directness and distinctness that should ordinarily characterize criminal pleadings, the defendant suffered no substantial prejudice thereby; all the essential constituents of that crime being included in the graver charge upon which the prosecution was primarily based.

The record shows these to have been the circumstances attending the reception of the verdict: The case was submitted to the jury at about 5 o'clock in the afternoon. At about 6 o'clock the court took a recess, as stated in the journal entry, "to await the return of the verdict," or, as recited in the bill of exceptions, "contingent upon the incoming of the jury." At about 6:45 the jury announced that they had agreed and were brought into court. The defendant, who was out upon bond, was absent, as were also his attorneys. By order of the court, the bailiff "went to the window and called in a loud voice" each of them; but none of them appeared. They had not been excused from attendance, and had left no word with the court as to where they could be found. The verdict was then received in their absence. The defendant, in support of a motion for a new trial, made an affidavit stating that, in pursuance of the instructions of his attorneys, he had held himself in readiness to be called and to be present whenever the jury should return, and that he was within half a block of the courthouse when the verdict was received, but did not hear the bailiff call him. It is clear from this statement that the defendant was voluntarily absent from the court without permission, and thereby waived his right to be present when the verdict was received, if that right can ever be waived. The statute provides that "no person indicted or informed against for a felony [and the conviction here was for a felony] can be tried unless he be personally present during the trial." Gen. St. 1901, § 5649. The effect of the adjudications on the subject is thus stated in 12 Cyc. 527: "Some of the courts have held that the right to be present during the trial of an indictment for a felony cannot be waived by defendant in a capital case, and some have applied the same rule in the case of any felony, whether capital or not, so that a trial or any material step therein, or reception of the verdict, in defendant's absence, in such cases is error, although he has escaped or is otherwise voluntarily absent. Most of the courts, however, have held that defendant may waive his right to be present when the felony is not capital; that he does so if, having been released on bail, he absconds or is voluntarily absent after his arraignment and plea; and that in such a case the trial may proceed, and the verdict be received notwithstanding his absence." In notes appended to this text, the cases are very fully collected and classified. Some of those holding that a verdict may properly be received without the presence of the defendant if his absence is voluntary turn upon constitutional or statutory provisions less explicit than that quoted, which, however, is regarded as but declaratory of the common law. Other recent cases supporting the view that the defendant's conduct does not affect the matter are Wells v. State (Ala.) 41 South. 630, from which it appears that in Alabama the reception of a verdict in the defendant's absence is tantamount to an acquittal, and State v. Mannion, 19 Utah, 505, 57 Pac. 543, 45 L. R. A. 639, 75 Am. St. Rep. 733; while State v. McGinnis, 12 Idaho, 336, 85 Pac. 1089, has a contrary tendency. See, also, notes in 5 L. R. A. 835 and 2 Am. St. Rep. 303.

In Commonwealth v. McCarthy, 163 Mass. 458, 40 N. E. 766, which is based upon a statute substantially the same as ours, it is said: "It is a general rule, both in England and in this country, that a trial for a felony cannot be had without the personal presence of the accused. * * * The trial is not concluded until the verdict is received and recorded. * * * In this commonwealth, we have a statute which embodies the same general rule. Pub. St. 1882, c. 214, § 10. * * * Under this statute, as well as at the common law, it may well be held that, when a defendant is in custody under an indictment for a felony, the verdict cannot properly be taken in his case without his personal presence, even if he has been in attendance in all previous stages of the trial, and that, whether he is in custody or on bail, the trial cannot properly be begun in his absence. But whether a defendant who is on bail, and who has been present during his trial until the case has been given to the jury, can nullify the whole proceedings by absenting himself until it becomes necessary to discharge the jury, is a very different question. We have seen no well-considered case that decides this question in the affirmative. In most of the reported cases the defendant was in custody, and the failure of the authorities to have him present when the verdict was taken deprived him of a right. * * * But it has been repeatedly held, upon careful consideration, that while it is a right of the defendant indicted for a felony to be present when the verdict is rendered, as well as during the earlier parts of the trial, and while it is irregular and improper to begin the trial in such a case without the presence of the accused, yet if he is on bail, and is present at the commencement of the trial, and afterwards voluntarily departs without leave, and is absent when the verdict is returned, he may be defaulted, and a verdict which will be binding upon him may be taken in his absence. * * * Such a case is treated as an exception to the general rule, and as a waiver by the defendant of his right to be present. * * * It would be unreasonable to hold that he can attend until the case is given to the jury, and, when he sees indications that the verdict is to be against him, can make it impossible to complete the trial, and thus nullify all that has been done by absconding. If he could do this, it would be necessary upon his return to try him again de novo, when perhaps it would be impossible to procure the evidence which was introduced at the first trial, and when, if he were again admitted to bail, he might a second time defeat the ends of justice by again departing. His departure, under such circumstances, ought to be deemed a waiver of his right to be present at the taking of the verdict. If the commonwealth has done all that it can reasonably be required to do to secure him his rights, our statute, and the common law of which it is declaratory, ought to be so construed as to prevent the return of the verdict. * * * No detriment can ever come to a defendant from this construction of our statute, and a different construction of it would make it in some cases an instrument of great injustice."

In Frey v. Calhoun, Circuit Judge, 107 Mich. 130, 64 N. W. 1047, involving a similar statute, the court reaches the same conclusion upon a full review of the authorities, saying: "The general rule is that a trial for a felony cannot be had without the personal presence of the accused. We have a statute which recognizes and embodies this rule. How. Ann. St. § 9568. It is also well settled that the trial is not concluded until the verdict is received and recorded. There are cases which hold that a verdict rendered in the absence of the prisoner, whether he be in custody or out on bail, is void. * * * Few cases will be found which go to this extent, and, in nearly all of the cases where a verdict rendered in the absence of the accused has been held erroneous, the respondent has been in custody, and has therefore been prevented from attending. When, however, the absence of the prisoner is not an enforced absence, but is voluntary, as when he is out on bail, and has been present pending the trial, but voluntarily leaves the courtroom pending the deliberations of the jury, or neglects to appear at the adjourned hour of the court, the clear weight of authority favors the rule that a verdict, rendered under such circumstances, is valid and binding."

The substance of the argument employed by the Massachusetts court is thus forcibly stated in Barton v. State, 67 Ga. 653, 44 Am. Rep. 743: "It is the right of the defendant in cases of felony * * * to be present at all stages of the trial, especially at the rendition of the verdict, and, if he be in such custody and confinement by the court as not to be present unless sent for and relieved by the court, the reception of the verdict during such compulsory absence is so illegal as to necessitate the setting it aside on a motion therefor. * * * The principle thus ruled is good sense and sound law, because he cannot exercise the right to be present at the rendition of the verdict when in jail, unless the officer of the court brings him into the court by its order. But the case is quite different, when, after being present through the progress of the trial and up to the dismissal of the jury to their room, he voluntarily absents himself from the courtroom, where he and his bail obligated themselves that he should be. * * * And the absolute necessity of the distinction, or the abolition of the continuance of the bail when the trial begins, is seen, when it is considered that otherwise there could be no conviction of any defendant, unless he wished to be present at the time the verdict is rendered. From the charge of the court, from the countenances of the jury, from the course of the argument, from the hints or misgivings of counsel, from information leaking out of the jury room, the defendant might see that the jury would convict him, and absent himself until the verdict was rendered, and thus have its rendition made entirely nugatory by his own act. The forfeiture of the bond is nothing. Appearance at the next term would save his bail, and trivial costs only would be the penalty paid, while the whole case must be tried again, or the defendant be discharged altogether. A second trial at the next term could be made at his option, to result in the same way at the same trivial costs, and so on ad infinitum. Can this be the law? We think that it cannot be as certain as that it ought not to be."

There seems to be no escape from the force of this reasoning. It is true that in Kansas the bail is only exonerated from liability upon surrendering his principal after a default, if he presents a satisfactory excuse therefor. Gen. St. 1901, § 5591. But this results from a recent amendment, and therefore cannot affect the interpretation of the statute under consideration. That the practical evils of the rule so vigorously denounced by the Georgia court are not exaggerated is shown by what is said of its application in People v. Beauchamp, 49 Cal. 41: "It appeared that the verdict by which the prisoner was found guilty of the felony charged in the indictment had been received by the court below, and recorded in its minutes, and the jury discharged, while the prisoner was not personally present in court. The statute (Pen. Code, § 1148) distinctly provides that, in order to the validity of such a verdict, the prisoner must be personally present in court when it is returned. In this case the prisoner seems to have absconded after the cause was given to the jury, and before their return into court. The growing frequency of occurrences of this character, thwarting the administration of criminal justice, would suggest the propriety in all trials for felony of promptly ordering the prisoner, regardless of his previous admission to bail, into actual custody, at the commencement of the trial, or immediately upon the retirement of the jury to consider their verdict." The Supreme Court of Missouri, from which state the statute was transplanted to Kansas in 1855, held that under it the voluntary absence of the defendant in a felony prosecution vitiated the verdict (State v. Braunschweig, 36 Mo. 397); but the decision was not made until 1865, and therefore has no controlling force here. The law was subsequently changed by legislation; the proviso being added "that in all cases the verdict of the jury may be received by the court, and entered upon the records thereof, in the absence of the defendant, when such absence on his part is wilful and voluntary." This addition is said to have been made "to prevent a defendant from securing a mistrial and continuance by escaping, if in custody, or absconding, if on bail, after the cause has been submitted to the jury, and before verdict rendered." State v. Hope, 100 Mo. 347, 13 S. W. 490, 8 L. R. A. 608.

The question has not heretofore been directly passed upon by this court. In State v. Adams, 20 Kan. 311, 326, in holding that a defendant could waive his constitutional privilege to appear and defend in person in all prosecutions, attention was called to the difference between the language of the Constitution and that of the statute—in the one case, "he shall be allowed"; in the other, "no person can be tried." But no ruling was necessary or was made against the right to waive the benefit of the statutory provision. In State v. Myrick, 38 Kan. 238, 16 Pac. 330, it was held that the absence of the defendant during a part of a felony trial was not cured by the presence of his counsel and their consent to the proceeding. There, however, the defendant was at the time confined in the county jail, and knew nothing of the matter. To hold that his statutory privilege could be regarded as waived under such circumstances would be to say that representation by an attorney is in all respects a complete substitute for personal presence, the right to which is guaranteed by the statute. In State v. Smith, 44 Kan. 75, 24 Pac. 84, 8 L. R. A. 774, 21 Am. St. Rep. 266, State v.

Jarrett, 46 Kan. 754, 27 Pac. 146, and State v. Clifton, 57 Kan. 448, 46 Pac. 715, which follow the Myrick Case, the defendants were all in confinement while the proceedings complained of took place. In State v. Moran, 46 Kan. 318, 26 Pac. 754, the verdict was set aside because a witness had been permitted to testify in the absence of the defendant. The decision is rested squarely upon State v. Myrick, without further discussion, and fails to disclose any intention to enlarge the doctrine of that case. The report does not clearly show whether or not the defendant was in custody, but the record indicates that he had given bail. However, the opinion recites that he was absent with the consent of the court, and the record contains the statement that his absence was necessary. The situation was therefore entirely different from that here presented. Excusing the defendant temporarily from attendance upon the court for a necessary purpose fairly implies that the trial is not to be proceeded with until his return. He would be justified in so understanding, and his withdrawing, under such circumstances, cannot be said to be a voluntary absence during a part of the trial. So in State v. Mulr, 32 Kan. 481, 4 Pac. 812, a misdemeanor case, it was held to be error to receive a verdict on Sunday, in the absence of the defendant and his counsel, without their being called, but expressly upon the ground that, except upon notice, they were not bound to be in attendance upon the court on a nonjudicial day. The question therefore being an open one in this state, the court prefers to follow what is clearly the weight of authority, as well as what seems to be the better reason, and to decide that the right of the defendant to be present during a felony trial is one that may be waived, and that if, while at liberty on bond, he is voluntarily absent, without having been excused by the court, when the jury reaches an agreement, a verdict against him may lawfully be received in his absence. On all accounts reasonable exertion should always be made to procure the attendance of the defendant, but it cannot be said that in the present instance any effort in that direction was omitted to which he was entitled as a matter of right.

The judgment is affirmed.

(76 Kan. 920)

SEAVERNS v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. Dec. 7, 1907.)

APPEAL—DISMISSAL—INCONSISTENT PROCEEDINGS.

The occupant of a tract of state school land instituted proceedings to purchase it as a settler. The probate court denied his petition, and he appealed. He then purchased the land of the state at a public sale. Subsequently the district court dismissed his appeal. Held, the conduct of the appellant in purchasing the land at public sale was inconsistent with a claim of error in the judgment of the probate court, and the appeal was rightfully dismissed.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from District Court, Wallace County; J. H. Reeder, Judge.

Proceedings by W. H. Seaverns against the state of Kansas to acquire land as a resident settler. Petition denied, and appeal to the district court. Petition dismissed, and petitioner brings error. Affirmed.

Lee Monroe and Geo. A. Kline, for plaintiff in error. F. S. Jackson, G. E. Ward and Roark & Roark, for the State.

BURCH, J. About the year 1889, the plaintiff in error, W. H. Seaverns, entered upon a tract of state school land, and in the years following occupied and improved it. In the year 1902 he leased the land from the state under a lease expiring in January, 1906. Before the expiration of his lease, he assisted in circulating a petition to the county superintendent of public instruction to expose the land to sale, in consequence of which appraisers were appointed, who, on January 22, 1906, returned the land as unimproved and of the value of $1.25 per acre. At that time he estimated the value of his improvements at $2,000. Following the return of the appraisal, Seaverns instituted proceedings to acquire the land as a resident settler, alleging settlement thereon as of March 1, 1905. After a hearing in the probate court, his petition was denied, and on February 23, 1906, he duly perfected an appeal to the district court. Before the hearing in the probate court occurred, the county treasurer made the first publication of a notice that he would on February 26, 1906, sell this land, and other tracts, to the highest bidder. After taking his appeal, Seaverns objected to a sale of the land, told the county treasurer not to sell it, and stated to the treasurer that he intended to carry his case through. The treasurer, however, held a public sale, as advertised, at which Seaverns caused the land to be bid in by an agent at the price of $6.17½ per acre. The treasurer gave a receipt for the first installment of the purchase price, which reads as follows: "No. 44. March 7, 1906. By whom paid.—W. H. Seaverns. Description of land, S. W. ¼ of 36-15-39. First annual installment, $98.80. Paid under protest." Subsequently, when the appeal was reached in the district court, it was dismissed on the ground that, after it had been perfected, Seaverns had voluntarily purchased the subject-matter of the litigation from the state of Kansas at public auction, and thereby had waived the right to urge that error had been committed in the proceedings of the probate court. Because of the order dismissing his appeal, Seaverns prosecutes this proceeding in error.

Quite early in the history of this court, the position was taken that a party who complains of a judgment must be consistent in his conduct with reference to it, and, if he recognizes its validity, or acts contrary to the assumption that it is erroneous, he will not be heard to say on appeal that it is erroneous. Babbitt v. Corby, 13 Kan. 612. In applying this rule, less liberality of conduct has been permitted to appellants than many other courts of last resort are disposed to allow when dealing with the same subject; but manifestly the case must be determined according to those principles which have long been adopted and followed here. Appellant cites no decision of this court favoring his estimate of his rights, although the general question has been considered many times. In the following cases, which present the question of estoppel in various ways, it was decided that the parties appealing from adverse judgments had assumed inconsistent attitudes respecting them: Bradley v. Rogers, 33 Kan. 120, 5 Pac. 374; Price v. Allen, 39 Kan. 476, 18 Pac. 609; State Journal Co. v. Commonwealth Co., 43 Kan. 93, 22 Pac. 982; Railroad Co. v. Murray, 57 Kan. 697, 47 Pac. 835; Samuel v. Samuel, 59 Kan. 335, 52 Pac. 889; Sheldon v. Motter, 59 Kan. 776, 53 Pac. 127. In the following cases, the inconsistent conduct lay chiefly in the acceptance of some benefit from the judgment: Babbitt v. Corby, 13 Kan. 612; Hoffmire v. Holcomb, 17 Kan. 378; Wolf v. McMahon, 26 Kan. 141; Savings Bank v. Butler, 56 Kan. 267, 43 Pac. 229; Perkins v. Bunn, 56 Kan. 271, 43 Pac. 230. In the following cases the inconsistency arose from a compliance with the judgment either in whole or in part: Fenlon v. Goodwin, 35 Kan. 123, 10 Pac. 553; State v. Conkling, 54 Kan. 108, 37 Pac. 992, 45 Am. St. Rep. 270; York v. Barnes, 58 Kan. 478, 49 Pac. 596; Knight v. Hirbourn, 64 Kan. 563, 67 Pac. 1104; Waters, Treas., v. Garvin, 67 Kan. 855, 73 Pac. 902. In the cases of Rasure v. McGrath, 23 Kan. 597, and Zeigler v. Hyle, 45 Kan. 226, 25 Pac. 568, the controversies were settled, and the court refused to hear the appealing parties further. Under the peculiar facts of Newman v. Lake, 70 Kan. 848, 79 Pac. 675, it was held that a partial compliance with an order of court did not defeat a proceeding in error challenging the validity of the order, and in the following cases it was decided that the conduct of the appealing party was not inconsistent with a claim of error in the proceeding sought to be reviewed: Headrick v. Yount, 22 Kan. 344; Seckler v. Delfs, 25 Kan. 159; Mack v. Price, 35 Kan. 134, 10 Pac. 521; Railway Co. v. Bagley, 65 Kan. 188, 69 Pac. 189, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 259.

In the probate court, the position of Seaverns was that, having complied with certain provisions of the law, he possessed an exclusive right to purchase the land as a settler, and that the state was under an obligation to him not to dispose of the land to any other person or in any other way. By undertaking to sell the land at public auction, the state impliedly asserted that the judgment of the probate court denying Seaverns' right to purchase as a settler was valid, conclusive, and just. By attending the public sale, engaging in competitive bidding with others, and buying the land, Seaverns necessarily abandoned his special claim as a settler and acknowledged the right of the state to sell to any one who would bid the highest price. The purpose of the appeal was to reopen the controversy adjudicated in the probate court. After the land had been purchased by Seaverns at public sale, all controversy regarding his right to purchase as a settler was at an end, and he had no standing to assert the contrary. The situation of Seaverns is very like that of the plaintiff in error in the case of Sheldon v. Motter, 59 Kan. 776, 53 Pac. 127. The opinion in that case is not printed in the Kansas reports, but it appears in 53 Pac. 127, and reads as follows: "This proceeding is brought in this court to review an order confirming a sale of real estate at which the defendant, Motter, was the purchaser. Since the petition in error was filed, the plaintiff in error and her husband have accepted a lease from Motter for the land sold, and have attorned and paid rent to him for the same. This is a recognition of his title inconsistent with the prosecution of this proceeding. The petition in error will therefore be dismissed." The confirmation of the sale cut off Sheldon's rights, and gave title to Motter. So, here, the judgment of the probate court cut off Seaverns' rights as a settler, and left the state at liberty to sell at public sale. The act of taking a lease from Motter necessarily involved a recognition of his title. The act of purchasing from the state at public sale necessarily involved a recognition of the state's right to dispose of the land in that manner. After leasing from Motter, Sheldon could not on appeal reopen the question of title. After buying at public sale, Seaverns could not on appeal reopen the question regarding his right to purchase as a settler. In the case of State Journal Co. v. Commonwealth Co., 43 Kan. 93, 22 Pac. 982, a part of the relief prayed for was the foreclosure of certain chattel mortgages given by the defendant, and upon the application of the plaintiff a receiver for the mortgaged property was appointed. A motion was made to set aside the appointment of the receiver, which was denied; but the court ordered that, upon the filing of a bond to satisfy any judgment the plaintiff might recover, the receiver should be discharged, and the property restored to the defendant. The defendant voluntarily gave the bond and was given possession of the property. In a proceeding in error in this court, it was held the defendant could not claim the order appointing the receiver was erroneous. The propriety of a sequestration of the property having been recognized by giving a bond which took the place of the property, consistency forbade that the original order should afterward be assailed. In the case of Samuel v. Samuel, 59 Kan. 335, 52 Pac. 889, a husband brought an action against his wife for a divorce. The wife also asked for a divorce and a division of the property. No divorce was granted, but the property was divided, and the plaintiff appealed. Afterward he commenced another action for a divorce against his wife in Oklahoma, which went to judgment in his favor, and his wife was barred of all interest in his property. The proceeding to reverse the first judgment was dismissed by this court because the plaintiff had renounced his right to relief and had undertaken to remedy the state of his affairs in another way. Other decisions of this court cited above are equally conclusive against the plaintiff in error in the pending proceeding.

It is true that, in buying the land at public sale, Seaverns obeyed no express command of the probate court, and he took no benefits under the judgment of that court, for it gave him none; but neither of these facts is essential to an estoppel. It is sufficient that he yielded to the state's contention and to the judgment adverse to him, and undertook to obtain the land in a manner incompatible with the maintenance of his former attitude. He had the option to abide by his appeal, or to renounce the right which it conserved and adopt a different course to further the interests. Having elected, he must endure the consequences.

It is urged that the conduct of the treasurer in bringing on a public sale of the land coerced Seaverns to purchase in order to protect himself from loss. The sale, however, was not a forced judicial sale, which would pass title to a purchaser whatever became of the appeal. If the appeal were well founded, the appellant could not lose the land. The objection and protest of Seaverns against that to which he nevertheless voluntarily determined to submit was, of course, nugatory. Price v. Allen, 39 Kan. 476, 18 Pac. 809; The State v. Conkling, 54 Kan. 108, 37 Pac. 902, 45 Am. St. Rep. 270.

The judgment of the district court is affirmed.

BRUNER et al. v. MARTIN.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. Dec. 7, 1907.)

1. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—CAUSE ARISING IN FOREIGN STATE.

The words "when a cause of action has arisen" in a foreign state, as used in the statute of limitations (Code Civ. Proc. § 22, Gen. St. 1901, § 4450), mean when the cause of action has accrued in a foreign state, or, in other words, when the plaintiff has the right to sue the defendant in the courts of such foreign state, and they have no reference to the origin of the transaction out of which the cause of action arose.

2. SAME.

An action on a promissory note cannot be maintained here under section 22 of the limitation act (Gen. St. 1901, § 4450), where both the plaintiff and the defendant were nonresidents of Kansas when the cause of action accrued, and the defendant resided in a foreign state until the cause of action was barred by the laws of that state.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from District Court, Meade County;
M. H. Madison, Judge.

Action by Jennie S. Martin against Esther Bruner and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants bring error. Reversed and remanded.

E. L. Foulke and Vandever & Martin, for plaintiffs in error. Francis C. Price, for defendant in error.

PORTER, J. Action by Jennie S. Martin against Esther Bruner et al., to foreclose a mortgage on real estate. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring these proceedings in error.

The sole question involves the construction of the statute of limitations. There was a stipulation as to the facts, from which it appears that the plaintiff resides in New Jersey and has never been a resident of Kansas. She acquired the note and mortgage by purchase from another nonresident. The note and mortgage were executed in Kansas, July 2, 1888, by Charles and Lucy B. Veatch, husband and wife, who were the owners of the real estate. The note was payable five years after date at the city of New York to the Kansas & New Jersey Loan Company, a Kansas corporation, and contained a clause providing that it should be construed in all respects according to the laws of Kansas. The mortgage was duly recorded in Meade county, Kan., where the land is situated. It contained the usual conditions. In 1889, before the maturity of the note, Charles Veatch and wife, makers of the note and mortgage, conveyed the real estate to Francis M. Bruner, and removed to the state of Missouri, where they have since resided, and have never returned to or been within this state. The note and mortgage were before maturity indorsed and transferred to a nonresident of Kansas, and by subsequent indorsement and transfer became the property of plaintiff. The limitation laws of Missouri bar an action upon a promissory note 10 years after the cause of action thereon accrues. The principal defendants are the heirs of Francis M. Bruner, who purchased the land from Charles Veatch, subject to the mortgage. They are all residents of the state of Iowa, and have resided there continuously. The defense relied upon is the statute of limitations. The answer alleged that the cause of action for the foreclosure of the mortgage arose at the time the note became due, and was therefore barred by the five-year statute of limitations; that the cause of action upon the note arose in Missouri, where the makers resided at the time the note matured, and set out the provisions of the Missouri statute of limitations. Section 22 of the Civil Code (Gen. St. 1901, § 4450), in so far as it is directly involved, reads as follows: "Where the cause of action has arisen in another state or country, between nonresidents of this state, and by the laws of the state or country where the cause of action arose an action cannot be maintained thereon by reason of lapse of time, no action (can be) maintained thereon in this state." In its last analysis the case turns upon the meaning of the words "cause of action has arisen" and "cause of action arose" as used in the foregoing section. The trial court construed the word "arisen" to mean "originate," and upon this construction held, and it is the contention of defendant in error, that the cause of action in this case arose within the state of Kansas where the contract was made, and that section 22 has no application, but that the preceding section 21 applies. The latter section reads as follows: "If when a cause of action accrues against a person he be out of the state, or has absconded or concealed himself, the period limited for the commencement of the action shall not begin to run until he comes into the state, or while he is so absconded or concealed; and if after the cause of action accrues he depart from the state, or abscond or conceal himself, the time of his absence or concealment shall not be computed as any part of the period within which the action must be brought."

There is a conflict of authority upon the precise question involved, and has never, we believe, been decided in this state. Some courts in construing statutes containing the exact language of ours, and others in construing statutes of almost identical language, have held that a different meaning attaches to the words "cause of action has arisen" as used in section 22 and the words "cause of action accrues" used in section 21. These courts have declared that a cause of action arises when and where the transaction occurs from which it originates, that is, where the contract is made. See the following authorities: Chevrier v. Robert, 6 Mont. 319, 12 Pac. 702; John Shillito Co. v. Richardson, 102 Ky. 51, 42 S. W. 847; Powers Mercantile Co. v. Blethen, 91 Minn. 339, 97 N. W. 1056; Doughty, Receiver, v. Funk, 15 Okl. 643, 84 Pac. 485, 4 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1029. The Oklahoma statute, construed in the latter case, is copied literally from the Kansas statute, and the opinion which cites the cases upholding this view presents the reasons thereof as well as any to which our attention has been called. The decisions referred to are against the better reasoning, in our opinion, and unquestionably opposed to the great weight of authority. The phrase "cause of action" has often been defined. It cannot exist without the concurrence of a right, a duty, and a default; or, stated differently, an obligation must exist upon one party in favor of the other, the performance of which is refused. Bouvier defines it as a right to bring an action. To the same effect see Bucklin v. Ford, 5 Barb. (N. Y.) 393; Myer v. Van Collem, 28 Barb. (N. Y.) 230; Lewis v. Hyams, 26 Nev. 68, 63 Pac. 126, 64 Pac. 817, 99 Am. St. Rep. 677. "Cause of action is the right to prosecute an action with effect." Douglas v. Forrest, 4 Bing. 686. In Veeder v. Baker, 83 N. Y. 156, is defined as follows:

"It may be said to be composed of the right of the plaintiff and the obligation, duty, or wrong of the defendant; and these combined, it is sufficiently accurate to say, constitute the cause of action." Pomeroy in his Code Remedies, § 453, uses the following language: "Every judicial action must therefore involve the following elements: A primary right possessed by the plaintiff, and a corresponding primary duty devolving upon the defendant; a delict or wrong done by the defendant which consisted in a breach of such primary right and duty; a remedial right in favor of the plaintiff, and a remedial duty resting on the defendant springing from this delict, and finally the remedy or relief itself. Every action, however complicated, or however simple, must contain these essential elements. Of these elements, the primary right and duty and the delict or wrong combined constitute the cause of action in the legal sense of the term, and as it is used in the Codes of the several states. They are the legal cause or foundation whence the right of action springs." Many other definitions by courts and text writers, which are substantially the same, may be found collated in the able dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Young in Colonial & U. S. Mortg. Co. v. Northwest Thresher Co., 14 N. D. 147, 103 N. W. 915, 70 L. R. A. 814, 823-824.

It would be difficult to find a better or more apt statement of where and when a cause of action arises than is found in the following extract from the opinion in Durham v. Spence, L. R. 6 Exch. 46: "Now the cause of action must have reference to some time as well as to some place. Does then the consideration of the time when the cause of action arises give us any assistance in determining the place where it arises? I think it does. The cause of action arises when that is not done which ought to have been done, or that is done which ought not to have been done. But the time when the cause of action arises determines also the place where it arises; for when that occurs which is the cause of action, the place where it occurs is the place where the cause of action arises." In Patterson v. Patterson, 59 N. Y. 574, 17 Am. Rep. 384, the court said: "Nor is there room for difference as to what is meant by the phrases 'cause of action has accrued,' or 'cause of action has arisen,' since the death of the testator. They do not mean the contracting of the indebtedness, for a cause of action does not accrue or arise from the making of the indebtedness alone, but out of the nonperformance of it as well." In Lewis v. Hyams, supra, the same question was involved, and it was there held that the phrase "when the cause of action has arisen" means exactly the same as if the statute had said "when the cause of action has accrued." In a further opinion upon an application for a rehearing (Lewis v. Hyams, 26 Nev. 68, 63 Pac. 126, 64 Pac. 817) it is stated that after an exhaustive and careful re-examination the court was unable to reach a different conclusion.

The New York Code of Civil Procedure provides that an action may be maintained by one foreign corporation against another "where the cause of action arose within the state." The words "where the cause of action arose within the state" were construed in Shelby Steel-Tube Co. v. Burgess Gun Co. (Sup.) 40 N. Y. Supp. 871. The goods were ordered by letter from Buffalo. The acceptance was in the state of Ohio. The court, after stating that the contract was actually made in Ohio, used the following language: "It does not follow, however, that because the contract was not made within this state a cause of action could not arise there. No cause of action arose anywhere upon this contract until the defendant had made some default in the payment of the contract price of the goods purchased."

The statute of Washington is substantially the same as ours. It was construed in reference to these phrases in the case of Freundt v. Hahn, 24 Wash. 8, 63 Pac. 1107. The contention there was that the words "has arisen" and "arose" were used in the sense of "originated," and with a meaning entirely different from "accrued" as used in the other section. The court in a well-considered opinion, construed the words to mean the same thing, and that the cause of action arose where and at the time it accrued. To the same effect see the following cases: Osgood v. Artt (D. C.) 10 Fed. 365; Hower v. Aultman, 27 Neb. 251, 42 N. W. 1039; Minneapolis Harvester Works v. Smith, 36 Neb. 616, 54 N. W. 973; Harrison v. Union National Bank, 12 Neb. 499, 11 N. W. 752; Humphrey v. Cole, 14 Ill. App. 50; Luce v. Clarke, 49 Minn. 358, 51 N. W. 1162; Drake v. Bigelow, 93 Minn. 112, 100 N. W. 664; Orr v. Wilmarth, 95 Mo. 212, 218, 8 S. W. 258; Zoll v. Carnahan, 83 Mo. 35; Scroggs v. Daugherty, 53 Mo. 407; Frost v. Witter, 132 Cal. 421, 64 Pac. 703, 84 Am. St. Rep. 53. The case of Osgood v. Artt, supra, opinion by Judge Blodgett, follows Hyman v. McVeigh, 10 Chic. Leg. N. 157. The latter case is followed and approved in Hyman v. Bayne, 83 Ill. 256; Berry v. Krone, 46 Ill. App. 82; Wooley v. Yarnell, 142 Ill. 442, 32 N. E. 891; and in Strong v. Lewis, 204 Ill. 35, 68 N. E. 558, where the words "cause of action has arisen" are held to mean, "when the plaintiff has the right to sue the defendant in the courts of such foreign state, regardless of the place where the cause of action had its origin."

The transaction by which a promissory note is executed and delivered creates no cause of action, nor can a cause of action be said to originate thereby. If, as in the vast majority of instances, the note is promptly paid at maturity, no cause of action exists. If there be a default when the note matures, and the payee is dead, no cause of action exists until an administrator be appointed, for the reason that before there can be a cause of action there must be a party entitled to enforce some obligation owing to him by some one who refuses to perform. In a case where the note is not paid when it matures, and the payee is alive, or, if dead, there is a personal representative, a cause of action arises out of the failure of the payor to perform the obligation. The place where it arises is the place where some court has jurisdiction of the subject-matter and the party against whom the cause of action has arisen. The cases referred to, holding that the cause of action arises where the contract was entered into, ignore the true definition of a cause of action, and confuse the cause with the subject of the action. The execution of the note is but a part of the transaction out of which the cause of action arises. The failure to keep the obligation and to perform the promise is the main thing which creates the cause of action, and unless there be such a failure no cause of action ever arises. "The true test, therefore, to determine when a cause of action has accrued, is to ascertain the time when plaintiff could first have maintained his action to a successful result." 25 Cyc. 1067. In the language of the court in Freundt v. Hahn, supra: "If the notes had been paid at maturity, no legal cause of action would have existed. It could neither have originated nor arisen until the breach of the contract to pay the money." A cause of action cannot be said to have arisen until it actually exists. In other words, a cause of action has not arisen until it has accrued. The words are synonymous. The subject of the action in this case was the promissory note and mortgage. They were executed in Kansas. The subject of the action originated in Kansas, but there was no cause of action until the maker failed to pay at maturity.

It is insisted that this construction destroys the effect of section 21; that the Legislature by the use of different expressions in the two sections intended by section 21 to furnish protection to citizens of Kansas and also to persons temporarily within the state with whom contracts should be executed in the state under Kansas laws; that by section 22 it was intended to provide protection for the citizens of this state who made contracts in another state with citizens of such other state upon which a cause of action arose in the other state. The same reason is assigned by the court in Chevrier v. Robert, supra, for the holding in that case, and the same contention was urged in many of the other cases cited, where the courts construed the two sections as we construe these. We find no difficulty in giving to section 21 the effect and operation given to it every day, and which it has always had. It applies only to cases where defendant resides in the state when the cause of action accrues, but is either out of the state or has absconded or concealed himself. It provides that the time of his absence or concealment shall not be computed in his favor. In Orr v. Wilmarth, supra, it is held that the provision of the Missouri statute, which is practically the same as our section 22, has no application to cases where the defendant was a nonresident when the cause of action accrued, and that the section corresponding with our section 21 only applies to those cases where the defendant resided in the state when the cause of action accrued—citing Thomas v. Black, 22 Mo. 330; Scroggs v. Daugherty, supra; Fike v. Clark, 55 Mo. 105. To the same effect is Berry v. Krone, supra. In Wooley v. Yarnell, supra, the note was held not barred for the express reason that when it matured the maker was a resident of Illinois. The case is, upon this ground, distinguished from Hyman v. Bayne, and Hyman v. McVeigh, supra.

We conclude, therefore, that as the action was barred by the statute of Missouri where the cause of action arose, no action can be maintained thereon in this state by reason of the provisions of section 22 of the limitation act. It is unnecessary to cite authorities to the effect that the note being barred no action can be maintained upon the mortgage.

For these reasons the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

HENLEY et al. v. MYERS.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. March 11, 1907.
On Rehearing, Dec. 7, 1907.)

1. CORPORATIONS — STOCKHOLDERS — DOUBLE LIABILITY—JUDGMENT FOR TORT.

The statute (sections 1302 and 1315 of the General Statutes of 1901) which declared the double liability of stockholders to be an asset of an insolvent corporation, and authorized the appointment of a receiver to enforce it for the benefit of corporate creditors, protected the owner of a judgment founded on tort, as well as claimants whose demands originated in contract.

2. SAME — ENFORCEMENT — JUDGMENT FOR TORT.

In virtue of the general saving clause (Gen. St. 1901, § 7342, par. 1), which provides that the repeal of a statute shall not affect any right which accrued under it, the holder of a judgment rendered against a Kansas corporation in an action founded on tort, upon which an execution had been issued and returned nulla bona before the repeal of the act (Gen. St. 1901, § 1302) providing that under such circumstances the liability of stockholders might be enforced for the benefit of creditors by means of a receiver to be appointed for that purpose, may have such remedy notwithstanding such repeal.

3. SAME—APPOINTMENT OF RECEIVER.

The statute (Gen. St. 1889, §§ 1200, 1204) which authorized an action to be brought on a corporate debt directly against the stockholder of a corporation that had ceased business for a year conferred no right of action upon one having a claim founded on tort against a corporation whose operations ended January 15, 1899, for the reason that such statute was repealed January 11, 1899, and after its repeal no remedy against stockholders remained to such a claimant, excepting that by the appointment of a receiver.

4. SAME—LIMITATIONS.

Under the statute (Gen. St. 1901, § 1302) which authorized the appointment of a receiver of an insolvent corporation to enforce the personal liability of stockholders for the benefit of corporate creditors whenever an execution on a judgment against the corporation should be returned nulla bona, in the absence of special circumstances demonstrating insolvency in some other manner, the statute of limitations did not begin to run against a creditor who wished to invoke that remedy until the rendition of a judgment and the issuance and return of an execution, provided he showed reasonable diligence in causing these steps to be taken. Where the court at the time of giving judgment stayed execution for five months pending the making of a case for review, the fact that the plaintiff consented to such stay will not be deemed to show a want of diligence; and an action was begun in time if brought within three years from the expiration of such stay.

5. SAME—TRANSFER OF STOCK—EFFECT.

The statute (Gen. St. 1901, § 1283) providing that as soon as a transfer of stock is shown upon the books of a corporation the president and secretary shall file with the Secretary of State a statement of such change, and that no transfer of stock shall be legal or binding until such statement is so made, imposed upon those who at the time of its enactment owned corporate stock, and thereafter sold it, the duty, in order to relieve themselves of liability for debts of the company, of procuring a record thereof to be made in the office of the Secretary of State; and although one who sold stock caused a transfer thereof to be duly entered on the books of the company, thereby charging the corporate officers with a duty under the statute to cause the public record to be made, unless he took some further step to secure the performance of such duty, he remained chargeable with the corporate debts.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 12, Corporations, §§ 960-962.]

6. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — OBLIGATION OF CONTRACTS.

So interpreted, the statute did not so impair the obligation of the stockholder's contract resulting from his ownership of the stock as to render it obnoxious to the federal Constitution.

On Rehearing.

7. CORPORATIONS—LIABILITY OF STOCKHOLDERS—"DUES."

In the provision of the Kansas Constitution (section 2, art. 12, repealed in 1906) that "dues from corporations shall be secured by individual liability of the stockholders to an additional amount equal to the stock owned by each stockholder," the word "dues" was used in a sense broad enough to cover a judgment rendered against a corporation in an action founded upon tort.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 12, Corporations, §§ 920, 925.]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 3, pp. 2258, 2259.]

8. SAME—JUDGMENTS FOR TORTS.

In view of such interpretation of the constitutional provision referred to, section 1192 of the General Statutes of 1889 (repealed in 1899), authorizing the owner of a judgment against a corporation upon which an execution had been returned unsatisfied to proceed against any of the stockholders and hold them liable thereon to the extent of the amount of their stock, applied to judgments founded on tort as well as upon contract, notwithstanding that elsewhere in the same act the person to whom the right is given is described as a creditor of the corporation and the claim against it as a debt.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 12, Corporations, §§ 920, 925.]

9. SAME—EXTENT OF LIABILITY.

Said section imposed upon the stockholder a liability for the payment of corporate obligations, including those founded upon tort, to the extent of the stock owned.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 12, Corporations, § 920.]

10. SAME—ACTION BY RECEIVERS—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—OBLIGATION OF CONTRACTS.

Section 1302 of the General Statutes of 1901 (repealed in 1903), which substituted for all other methods of enforcing the individual liability of stockholders an action to be brought by a receiver, was available against stockholders who became such prior to its enactment. Its application to them did not constitute an impairment of the obligation of the contract arising out of their membership in the corporation, even although the new remedy might be more efficient than the old, and might incidentally under some circumstances prove somewhat more burdensome, so long as it involved no actual increase in their liability.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to District Court, Douglas County; C. A. Smart, Judge.

Action by E. E. Myers, receiver, against A. Henley and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

Geo. J. Barker, W. W. Nevilson, and Bishop & Mitchell, for plaintiffs in error. R. E. Melvin, for defendant in error.

MASON, J. May 1, 1900, W. H. Stevenson recovered a judgment against the Consolidated Barb Wire Company, a Kansas corporation, in an action founded upon a tort. December 7, 1900, an execution was issued, which was returned unsatisfied January 2, 1901, because no property could be found on which to levy. June 27, 1903, Stevenson filed a motion for the appointment of a receiver to close up the affairs of the corporation. September 12, 1903, E. E. Myers was appointed as such receiver. October 6, 1903, the receiver sued several stockholders to collect the amounts for which they were liable in addition to their subscriptions; the action being based upon sections 1302 and 1315 of the General Statutes of 1901 (now repealed), which authorized such procedure for the benefit of creditors. He recovered a judgment, from which the defendants prosecute error.

The most difficult question presented is whether the statute referred to protected the owner of a judgment founded on tort, as well as claimants whose demands originated in contract. So much of it as is here important reads as follows:

"Sec. 1315. The stockholders of every corporation, except railroad corporations or corporations for religious or charitable purposes, shall be liable to the creditors thereof for any unpaid subscriptions, and in addition thereto for an amount equal to the par value of the stock owned by them, such liability to be considered an asset of the corporation in the event of insolvency, and to be collected by a receiver for the benefit of all creditors."

"Sec. 1302. If any execution shall have been issued against the property or effects of a corporation, except a railway or a religious or charitable corporation, and there cannot be found any property upon which to levy such execution, such corporation shall be deemed to be insolvent; and upon application to the court from which said execution was issued, or to the judge thereof, a receiver shall be appointed, to close up the affairs of said corporation. Such receiver shall immediately institute proceedings against all stockholders to collect unpaid subscriptions to the stock of such corporation, together with the additional liability of such stockholders equal to the par value of the stock held by each. All collections made by the receiver shall be held for the benefit of all creditors, and shall be disbursed in such manner and at such times as the court may direct."

This statute was enacted while section 2 of article 12 of the state Constitution was in force, reading: "Dues from corporations shall be secured by individual liability of the stockholders to an additional amount equal to the stock owned by each stockholder, and such other means as shall be provided by law; but such individual liabilities shall not apply to railroad corporations, nor corporations for religious or charitable purposes." The constitutional provision was not self-operating (Woodworth v. Bowles, 61 Kan. 569, 90 Pac. 831), but may aid in the interpretation of the act passed in pursuance of it.

A similar question arising upon similar statutes has frequently received the attention of the courts, but the authorities are not in entire harmony on the subject. In 1 Cook on Corporations, § 217, it is said: "The statutory liability imposed upon the stockholders in corporations is a liability exclusively for debts and demands accruing against the corporation by reason of its contracts. It cannot, therefore, be enforced to pay damages recovered against the corporation in an action in tort." And in 26 A. & E. Encycl. of L. 1024, 1025: "Unliquidated damages arising from the commission of a tort by the corporation or its agents are usually held not to be 'debts,' within the meaning of that term as used in the statutes imposing liability upon stockholders. But in Ohio and South Carolina they have been held to be 'dues,' within the purview of their statutes." On the other hand, the discussion of the subject in the valuable article on Corporations by the late Seymour D. Thompson in the Cyclopedia of Law and Procedure (10 Cyc. 684) includes this statement: "A judgment against a corporation is certainly a debt of the corporation, without reference to the question whether it was founded upon a tort or upon a contract. Hence, where it is sought merely to subject what remains unpaid by the shareholder in respect to his shares, it is clear that any demand against the corporation which has been reduced to a judgment will be available as a basis of such a proceeding, without reference to the nature of the original claim. If it is merged in the judgment, it becomes a 'debt of record' in the language of the common law; and upon this point there will be no difference of judicial opinion. So, as already seen, constitutional provisions and statutes securing to creditors dues from corporations by a superadded individual liability of their shareholders are remedial in their nature, and hence embrace judgments against the corporation for damages in actions for its torts."

Manifestly the question whether a stockholder must respond to a demand of the character here involved depends upon the language of the constitutional or statutory provisions in virtue of which the liability is asserted. The decisions for the most part turn upon the force to be given to the word "debt." While the statute under consideration does not use that word, much the same effect is produced by its employment of the term "creditors" to describe those for whose benefit the remedy is furnished. The word "debt" has several recognized meanings. Any financial obligation is a debt in a broad and general sense; but, where the term is used technically and restrictively, it implies an ascertained amount, and sometimes, as well, a foundation in contract. The same distinction exists in the use of the word "creditor," which may mean one having any character of claim against another, or one having a liquidated demand based on an agreement. Illustrations of the various uses of these words may be found in 2 Words and Phrases Judicially Defined, 1713, 1714, 1718-21, 1891, 1892; 8 Words and Phrases Judicially Defined, 7628. The cases in which stockholders have been held not liable for demands against the corporation arising out of tort are collected in the works from which the foregoing quotations are made. They proceed upon the theory that such liability exists only with respect to obligations originating in contract. Where that view prevails, it can make no difference that the claim has been placed in judgment, although that consideration is often spoken of as affecting the matter; for a judgment is not a contract in the sense that it can be regarded as in the nature of an agreement. 23 Cyc. 673, 674. Nearly all of these cases are controlled by one or the other of these two reasons: (1) That the statute to be construed is penal, the stockholder's liability being incurred only as a penalty for some act or omission of the directors, and on that account a strict construction is required; (2) that the statute uses some expression beyond the mere word "debt"—for instance, "debt contracted"—indicating that only contractual obligations are within its purview. Neither of these reasons can have any application here. The statute quoted is clearly remedial, and beyond the bare use of the word "creditors" there is nothing in its language to suggest a limitation of its benefits to any particular class of claimants; indeed, the clause making the double liability an asset of the corporation tends strongly against such restriction.

In Ward v. Joslin, 44 C. C. A. 456, 105 Fed. 224, it was held that under the Kansas laws as they existed prior to 1899 a judgment against a corporation, to be available as a demand against a stockholder, must have been based, not only upon a contract, but upon such a contract as the corporation had legal authority to make; and the decision was affirmed by the supreme court. 186 U. S. 142, 22 Sup. Ct. 807, 46 L. Ed. 1093. The statute there considered (section 1200, Gen. St. 1889) provided that if any execution against a corporation proved fruitless liability should attach to the stockholders; but in other sections of the same act (sections 1204, 1206, Gen. St. 1889) the liability was described as one for the payment of debts. In each opinion the word "dues," occurring in the Constitution, was treated as relating only to contractual obligations. The statute now under consideration differs materially from the earlier one, and the presence of the provision making the double liability an asset of the corporation affords especial ground for applying the arguments thus made in favor of giving the word "dues" a broad meaning in Rider v. Fritchey, 49 Ohio St. 285, 30 N. E. 692, 15 L. R. A. 513: "Can the stockholders of an Ohio corporation be held for obligations of the corporation growing out of torts? It follows, from what has already been stated, that we must assume that this street railroad company was organized under a law which imposed upon stockholders just such liability as the constitutional provision requires. We look, therefore, to the Constitution as our guide. The provision (section 3, art. 13) is: 'Dues from corporations shall be secured by such individual liability of the stockholders and other means as may be prescribed by law; but in all cases each stockholder shall be liable, over and above the stock by him or her owned, and any amount unpaid thereon, to a further sum, at least equal in amount to such stock.' The question turns upon the import of the word 'dues.' It has been contended that provisions creating individual liability on the part of the stockholders are in derogation of the common law, and are therefore to be construed strictly. Authorities in support of this rule are not wanting, and, in so far as such liability is attached by way of penalty for the omission of some act required by the statute, as in some of the states, it is probable that the weight of authority favors the proposition. But all concede that this is a remedial provision, and to hold that there must be applied to it the same test as if it were a penal law is to hold that all remedial laws must be so construed; for every remedial law must of necessity be in derogation of the common law. Where the provision is simply remedial, though it does impose an obligation which did not attach at common law, we see no reason to insist upon what is called a strict construction, but believe that the ordinary rule, which requires the court to inquire simply as to the intent of the lawmakers, reading the provisions as they were intended to be read, will best attain the ends of justice. This leads us to look to the intent of the section quoted. Speaking in general terms, it must be manifest that the intent was to provide that those who derive advantage from the authority of the state given by our incorporation laws shall at the same time assume responsibility for the acts of the artificial creature which they have called into legal being, affecting the rights of others. Having in mind this general intent, and the provision being remedial, it should, we think, be construed with a view to remove the evil and extend the benefit proposed. * * * It would seem to be the undoubted duty of the court to give the word 'dues,' as found in the section quoted, such construction as will secure the apparent object of the Constitution makers in its adoption. Constitutions are necessarily couched in terse language, and we look there for the use of words in a broad, comprehensive sense. * * * It is difficult to see any reason why the framers of the Constitution should intend to afford one who gives credit for goods or money to a corporation a right to demand compensation of the stockholders in case of insolvency, and deny a like right to one who intrusts it with the care of his person, as in the case of a passenger, or to one, even a stranger, who, without fault on his part, is injured by the negligence of the corporation's agents. It may well be asked: Are the rights of things more sacred than the rights of persons? Is there any rule of public policy which would justify the protection of rights arising ex contractu, which would not equally call for protection of rights arising ex delicto, or any claim for unliquidated damages? * * * As a conclusion we are of the opinion that the word 'dues' should receive a beneficial construction—one which will include within its scope as well a demand for unliquidated damages for a tort as a claim for a debt arising upon contract."

This reasoning is approved and adopted in Flennikin v. Marshall, 43 S. C. 80, 20 S. E. 788, 28 L. R. A. 402. We regard it as sound and convincing, and in principle decisive of the question here presented in favor of the view taken by the trial court.

A further contention made by plaintiff in error is that, granting a judgment against a corporation for a tort to be an obligation for which, under any circumstances, a stockholder might be held upon his additional liability, the present action cannot be maintained, because the section referred to was repealed before its benefit had been invoked by the making of an application for a receiver. See chapter 152, p. 284, Laws 1903, effective March 17, 1903. As the judgment was not based upon a contract, the Legislature doubtless had power, by taking away the remedy, to deprive the creditor of the means of enforcing its payment. Louisiana v. Mayor of New Orleans, 109 U. S. 285, 3 Sup. Ct. 211, 27 L. Ed. 936. But such power was not attempted to be exercised in this instance; for, while the repealing act itself contains no saving clause, there must be read into it a reservation in favor of any right accrued, as well as of any proceeding commenced, in consequence of the first paragraph of section 7342 of the General Statutes of 1901, which reads: "The repeal of a statute does not * * * affect any right which accrued, any duty imposed, any penalty incurred, nor any proceeding commenced, under or by virtue of the statute repealed." When the judgment had been rendered and the insolvency of the corporation had been demonstrated by the issuance and return of an execution nulla bona, a right at once accrued to its owner, under the existing statute, not only to have a receiver appointed for the corporation, but by this means to enforce the stockholders' liability to him. This right, by the terms of the statute quoted, survived the repeal, although no proceeding had been begun to assert it. This proposition is substantially covered by the decision in Wire Co. v. Stevenson, 71 Kan. 64, 79 Pac. 1085, although there the question presented was only whether a receiver could be appointed; his right to maintain an action against the stockholders not being involved.

It is next claimed that, if any cause of action of the character here presented ever existed against the defendants, it had been barred by the statute of limitations before steps were taken to enforce it. The corporation permanently suspended business January 15, 1899. It is argued that with the expiration of one year from that date a right accrued to Stevenson to bring action directly against the stockholders of the corporation under sections 1200 and 1204 of the General Statutes of 1889, which authorized such a proceeding; that this right was barred by limitation, because not exercised within three years; and that under the authority of Cottrell v. Manlove, 58 Kan. 405, 49 Pac. 519, when the bar was permitted to fall against this remedy, it excluded every other as well. A fatal fault with this argument is that the section referred to was repealed January 11, 1899, several days before the corporation ceased to do business, and more than a year before such cessation had continued long enough to warrant a direct action against the stockholders. Section 17, c. 10, p. 36, Laws 1898. Therefore no right of action accrued to Stevenson under it prior to its repeal, and after its repeal the only remedy against stockholders left to corporate creditors whose claims were based upon torts was that by the appointment of a receiver. Henley v. Stephenson, 67 Kan. 4, 72 Pac. 518. To pursue this remedy it was necessary that he should first of all reduce his claim to judgment. This he accomplished May 1, 1900, and no want of diligence can be attributed to him prior to that time.

It is further contended, however, that it was incumbent upon Stevenson to cause the commencement of an action against the stockholders, or at least to apply for the appointment of a receiver, within three years from the time judgment was obtained. The application was not made until September 12, 1903, and the action was not begun until October 6, 1903. Before he could ask for a receiver, however, it was necessary that the insolvency of the corporation should be exhibited by the issuance and return of an execution. It was within the power of the judgment creditor to cause these preliminary steps to be taken at any time, and he could not extend the statute of limitations indefinitely by neglecting to act. It was incumbent upon him to perfect his right of action within a reasonable time, which could never be more than the statutory period. West v. Bank, 66 Kan. 527, 72 Pac. 252, 63 L. R. A. 137, 97 Am. St. Rep. 385. He took out an execution December 7, 1900. Whether this would under all circumstances be deemed reasonable promptness need not be determined. Pending the settlement of a case-made, a stay of execution was granted, which expired October 9, 1900. Until that time, therefore, no attempt could have been made to enforce the judgment. The record shows that the plaintiff consented to the stay order; but, even if this can be regarded as a voluntary submission to a suspension of proceedings, the delay so occasioned, in view of its purpose to facilitate a review, cannot be deemed an unreasonable one. The interval between the expiration of the stay and the issuance of an execution—from October 9th to December 7th—was hardly long enough to show a lack of diligence; but even this need not be decided, for the present action was begun, not only within three years from the return of the execution, but within three years from the end of the stay, and was, therefore, brought within due time, irrespective of any further allowance for the taking of the preliminary steps.

The defendants were stockholders in the Consolidated Barb Wire Company from some time in 1887 until January 15, 1899, when they sold their stock in good faith. The transfer was duly entered upon the books of the company, but no statement of such change of ownership was ever filed with the Secretary of State. Section 1283 of the General Statutes of 1901, which took effect January 11, 1899, provides: "It shall also be the duty of the president and secretary of any such corporation organized under the laws of this state, as soon as any transfer, sale or change of ownership of any such stock is made as shown upon the books of the company, to file with the Secretary of State a statement of such change of ownership, giving the name and address, of the new stockholder or stockholders, the number of shares so transferred, the par value, and the amount paid on such stock. No transfer of such stock shall be legal or binding until such statement is made as provided for in this act." In the original act (section 12, c. 10, p. 32, Laws 1898) there followed this proviso, which has since been repealed, but which is of importance as indicating clearly that the restriction on the transfer of stock was intended to affect the matter of the personal liability of stockholders: "Provided, however, that no transfer of stock shall release the party so transferring from the liability of the laws of this state as to stockholders of corporations for profit, for ninety days after such transfer and the filing and recording thereof in the office of the Secretary of State."

The ground of the claim against the defendants is that by reason of the statute quoted the sale of their stock was not effective to relieve them from liability for the debts of the corporation because no record of it was ever made in the office of the Secretary of State. English and federal cases hold that, where one who has transferred his stock remains charged with corporate debts because the transfer is not properly registered, it is upon the principle of negligence on his part, and that he can relieve himself from liability by showing that he has been reasonably diligent in the matter and that the fault has been that of the company's officers. 10 Cyc. 716, 717. The statute here involved is too explicit to leave room for construction. It makes the liability absolute until the required statement is filed. The duty to supply such record is imposed upon the president and secretary, and not upon the stockholders; but this is true as well of the ordinary requirement that, to be effective, transfers must be entered in the books of the company. In either case it can hardly be doubted that the transferee can, if necessary, have the aid of the courts to see that the duty is performed. 19 A. & E. Encycl. of L. 881, 882. Probably, if a stockholder were driven to that remedy, the registration, when made in pursuance of an order so obtained by him, would by relation be effective from the time his proceeding was begun; or it may be that any affirmative action on his part—a mere request or demand that the officers perform their duty—might relieve him from liability. But no such question is here presented, for it is not shown that any step was taken by the defendants to compel or to urge a compliance with the law.

The argument is strongly pressed, however, that the statute is invalid as to those who already owned corporate stock at the time of its enactment, for the reason that it seeks to change their contractual liability—to impair the obligation of the contract which resulted from such ownership. We cannot agree to this contention. Before the act was passed one who had sold stock of a corporation, in order to relieve himself from liability for its debts, was obliged to see that the transfer was noted by its officer upon its books. The enactment merely imposed an additional duty to see that a similar notation was made upon a public record. The change imposed no restraint upon the transfer of the stock, but related only to the means by which it should be accomplished and the manner in which it might be evidenced. It is essentially a matter of method, of procedure, rather than of ultimate substantial rights. "Whether the state may impose added conditions or duties upon individuals with regard to their contracts depends upon the nature of such requirements. If they amount to a change of the obligation itself, they are, of course, ineffectual; but an obligation cannot be said to be impaired by a statute which merely imposes an additional duty on the owner in order that he may preserve it. Therefore recording acts and acts of kindred nature are constitutional." 8 Cyc. 904.

The judgment is affirmed. All the Justices concurring.

On Rehearing.

In the original opinion in this case, in holding that the plaintiffs in error as stockholders could be held upon their double liability for the payment of a judgment against the corporation founded upon a tort, some stress was placed upon the fact that the statute of January 11, 1890, provided that such liability should be considered an asset of the corporation in the event of insolvency. Gen. St. 1901, § 1315. The court overlooked the consideration, which seems sufficiently obvious, that to base the decision upon the language of that statute would involve an assumption that the Legislature could change the essential character of the liability of one who had already become a stockholder. Upon this phase of the matter being suggested, a rehearing was granted with special reference to this question: "Under the Constitution and statutes of Kansas as they existed prior to January 11, 1890, could a stockholder ever be held liable beyond the amount of his subscription for the payment of a corporate obligation which originated in tort?" The affirmance of the judgment of the trial court was based, as the opinion showed, upon an approval of the reasoning of the Ohio court in giving a broad meaning to the word "dues" as used in the Constitution. The language of the statute of 1890 expressly providing that the stockholders' liability should be deemed a corporate asset was referred to as affording a special ground for applying the arguments quoted from Rider v. Fritchey, 49 Ohio St. 285, 30 N. E. 692, 15 L. R. A. 513, and also as a basis for distinguishing the present case from Ward v. Joslin (C. C.) 100 Fed. 676, 44 C. C. A. 456; Id., 105 Fed. 224, 44 C. C. A. 456, affirmed 186 U. S. 142, 22 Sup. Ct. 807, 46 L. Ed. 1093. The effect of the decision in that case, however, was somewhat overstated. The precise matter there determined was that a stockholder could not be compelled to contribute to the payment of a judgment against the corporation founded upon a contract which the corporation had no power to make, but against which it was estopped to defend. Such a liability was said not to be one of those the risk of which was assumed by the contract of membership in the corporation; and, while the argument employed might be thought to apply as well to the case of a corporate liability based upon tort, that question was not involved or directly discussed.

Upon the grounds indicated in the original decision this court is of the opinion that the word "dues," as used in the Constitution, was not intended to be limited to contractual obligations. Granting that no liability could be fastened upon the plaintiffs in error by the act of 1890, the question remains whether they were liable under the statute which that act superseded. So far as here important it read: "If any execution shall have been issued against the property or effects of a corporation, * * * and there cannot be found any property whereon to levy such execution, then execution may be issued against any of the stockholders, to an extent equal in amount to the amount of stock by him or her owned, together with any amount unpaid thereon; but no execution shall issue against any stockholder, except upon an order of the court in which the action, suit or other proceeding shall have been brought or instituted, made upon motion in open court, after reasonable notice in writing to the person or persons sought to be charged; and, upon such motion, such court may order execution to issue accordingly; or the plaintiff in the execution may proceed by action to charge the stockholders with the amount of his judgment." Section 1192, Gen. St. 1889. "If any corporation, created under this or any general statute of this state, be dissolved, leaving debts unpaid, suits may be brought against any person or persons who were stockholders at the time of such dissolution, without joining the corporation in such suit." Section 1204, Id. "Any * * * corporation shall be deemed to be dissolved for the purpose of enabling any creditors of such corporation to prosecute suits against the stockholders thereof to enforce their individual liability, if it be shown that such corporation has suspended business for more than one year." Section 1200, Id. "No stockholder shall be liable to pay debts of the corporation, beyond the amount due on his stock, and an additional amount equal to the stock owned by him." Section 1206, Id. The language of section 1192 in terms covers an execution in any case regardless of the character of the claim out of which the judgment grew. Two of the other three sections refer to "debts" in describing the obligations for which stockholders shall be held, and the third refers to the claimants as "creditors." As all are parts of the same chapter, doubtless the subsequent sections should be looked to in interpreting the first one. Therefore, although that purports to be complete in itself, perhaps it should be interpreted as though it, too, described the remedy it provided as one for the enforcement of corporate debts. Even so, in view of the meaning already assigned to the constitutional provision, the word "debts" must be deemed to have been used in a broad sense, so as to include judgments founded upon torts.

Upon the rehearing the plaintiffs in error seek to press the argument with regard to the impairment of the obligation of their contract one point further. They not only maintain that the legislation of 1899 could not make them liable for the torts of the corporation, if they had previously been liable only for its contracts, but they also contend that the procedure it provided for the enforcement of whatever liability did exist is not available against them, because it is more burdensome than that of the earlier statute which was in effect when they acquired their stock. This exact contention was upheld in Evans v. Nellis (C. C.) 101 Fed. 920, decided by the United States Circuit Court for the Northern District of New York. It was there held that the later law visited additional hardships upon the stockholder, first, in depriving him of the right to avail himself of any defense he might have against the particular creditor pursuing him; second, in subjecting him to an action for the full amount of his stock, whether the corporate indebtedness was large enough to require so large a payment or not; and, third, in compelling him to pay a part of the expenses of the receivership. That case having been taken by writ of error to the Circuit Court of Appeals, the questions involved were from there certified to the Supreme Court, where the matter was disposed of by answering only one question—whether the receiver was entitled to maintain the action; the court saying, upon the authority of Waller v. Hamer, 65 Kan. 168, 69 Pac. 185, that he could not do so, because no action had been brought against all the stockholders. The court expressed no opinion regarding the validity of the statute as applied to conditions existing at the time of its enactment. Evans v. Nellis, 187 U. S. 271, 23 Sup. Ct. 74, 47 L. Ed. 173. It is settled that a corporate creditor who became such while the earlier statute was in force could not be deprived of his right to proceed thereunder by the enactment of the new law. Woodworth v. Bowles, 61 Kan. 569, 60 Pac. 331. But it does not follow that one who became a stockholder prior to 1899 is exempt from being proceeded against under the later act. The constitutional prohibition against legislation impairing the obligation of a contract protects a creditor from a change of procedure that makes his remedy substantially less effective, but does not protect a debtor against a change that merely affords better facilities for compelling him to perform his engagement. Phelps v. Trust Co., 62 Kan. 529, 64 Pac. 63; Trust Co. v. Phelps, 66 Kan. 775, 71 Pac. 1129; 8 Cyc. 995, note 15. The state Constitution, prior to its amendment in 1906, contained this provision: "Dues from corporations shall be secured by individual liability of the stockholders to an additional amount equal to the stock owned by each stockholder, and such other means as shall be provided by law." At the time the plaintiffs in error became members of the corporation a statute had been passed in pursuance of this provision fixing the individual liability of stockholders at double the amount of their stock. The act of 1899 did not affect the measure or character of their liability, but merely changed the manner of its enforcement. The change did not make their contract more burdensome, except as any change of remedy might incidentally do, so. In a particular case some possible hardship might result; but in its general application the new procedure was obviously more equitable than the old, and better adapted to protect the rights of the stockholders.

Substantially the question here presented has been considered in a series of cases arising upon a change in the Minnesota statute providing remedies for the enforcement of the stockholders' liability for debts of the corporation. Of this question it was said, in Straw & Ellsworth Mfg. Co. v. L. O. Kilbourne B. & S. Co., 80 Minn. 125, 83 N. W. 36 (adhered to after reargument in London & N. W. A. M. Co. v. St. P. P. O. Co., 84 Minn. 144, 86 N. W. 872): "There is no merit in the claim of counsel that the statute of 1899 impairs the obligation of a contract, because as to stockholders who became such prior to its passage it makes a radical and unwarranted change from the former practice of an action in equity to enforce the shareholder's double liability. The power of the Legislature to modify or change a remedy, provided no substantial right is impaired, cannot be questioned. And there is no such thing as a vested right to a particular remedy. The Legislature may always alter the form of administering right and justice. No substantial right is affected by the law in question, for in no manner does it increase the liability of the stockholder. It may afford a new remedy—a different course of procedure; but this fact does not make it obnoxious to the fundamental law which forbids the impairment of contracts." The court then quoted from Commonwealth v. Cochituate Bank, 85 Mass. 42: "It will at once be perceived that no objection to a change of remedy can be successfully urged on account of its being more speedy and effectual. That objection might be urged as to all changes in the forms of proceeding or the organization of legal tribunals to act thereon. Every statute extending the equity powers of this court would be obnoxious to objections of this character. The objection, to be tenable, must go beyond this, and show that the statute increased the actual liabilities of the stockholder, and was something more than a change in the mode of enforcing a pre-existing liability. * * * The proceedings under this statute may require the action of the court upon the estimated value of such assets, rather than an absolute ascertainment of the amounts; but the principle to be applied is the same, varying only in the mode of arriving at the result as to the deficiency chargeable upon stockholders."

The same statute was involved in Converse v. Aetna Nat. Bank, 79 Conn. 163, 64 Atl. 341. The court there said: "It [the stockholder, itself a corporation] therefore incurred, by becoming a shareholder in a Minnesota corporation, a liability to perform such contractual obligations as were attached by the laws of Minnesota to the ownership of its capital stock. * * * One of these obligations was to be answerable for the debts of the corporation, in case of a deficiency of corporate assets to the extent of the par value of its shares of stock. * * * The amount of this liability could not be thereafter increased by subsequent legislation. The mode of enforcing it could be varied within reasonable limits. * * * To enlarge the remedies of its creditors, whether against the corporation or its shareholders, impairs the obligation of no contract." A part of the new statute, however, was held to be inoperative, upon the theory that it added to the liability of the stockholder by compelling him to respond to an assessment the amount of which was increased by an estimate of expenses to be incurred in prosecuting future actions. But in Bernheimer v. Converse, 206 U. S. 516, 27 Sup. Ct. 755, 51 L. Ed. 1163, the Supreme Court of the United States upheld even this portion of the later act, saying: "By becoming a member of a Minnesota corporation, and assuming the liability attaching to such membership, he [the stockholder] became subject to such regulations as the state might lawfully make to render the liability effectual. * * * It is further urged that, in imposing upon the stockholder the additional expense in a proceeding where the expenses incident to the enforcement of the liability in other states and against other parties are taken into consideration and included in the estimate, there is an unwarranted increase in the amount which could be recovered against the stockholder under the former statute. But, remembering at all times that the obligation of the shareholder was the creature of the Constitution of Minnesota, we think the fact that the additional expenses were included in the assessment cannot operate to defeat it. Such expenses are incident to the ascertainment of the trust fund, which it is necessary to realize from the liability of stockholders, and as long as these expenses are kept within the amount of the original liability no legal right is violated."

A special consideration based upon the history of this litigation would of itself compel a denial of the contention of plaintiffs in error that the procedure of the act of 1899 cannot be invoked against them. Stevenson, the judgment creditor, originally attempted to reach them under the provisions of the repealed statute, claiming, under the authority of Woodworth v. Bowles, supra, that the repeal was not effective as to him. But this court held that, as he had not shown that his judgment was founded upon a contract, he was not within the rule there declared, and denied him relief, saying that the only remedy open to him was that given by the new law. Henley v. Stevenson, 67 Kan. 4, 72 Pac. 518. Pursuant to this ruling he instituted the present proceeding. Under these circumstances the question of his right to do so cannot be regarded as still open.

In the original opinion it was said that sections 1200 and 1204 of the General Statutes of 1889 were repealed by the act of 1899. Upon the rehearing attention was called to the fact that section 1200 has never been repealed. The statement referred to was technically inaccurate, but substantially correct so far as affects the present case. Section 1204 provided that if a corporation should be dissolved, leaving debts unpaid, suits might be brought thereon directly against the stockholders. Section 1200 in its original form (Gen. St. 1868, c. 23, § 40) undertook to tell how a corporation might be dissolved, mentioning but two ways—by the expiration of the time limited in its charter, and by a decree of a court. In 1883 it was amended by adding a provision that for the purpose of enabling a creditor to prosecute suits against the stockholders to enforce their individual liability a corporation should be deemed to be dissolved whenever it had suspending business for more than one year. This addition manifestly referred to suits brought under the provisions of section 1204, and when that section was repealed the new part of section 1200 necessarily became entirely inoperative; there being nothing left to which it could apply. The section itself was not repealed, but appears as section 1310 of the General Statutes of 1901. That portion of it which defines generally the methods by which a corporation may become extinct is still in force. But the rest of it, which merely fixed a time when a cause of action should arise under section 1204, for all practical purposes disappeared when that section was wiped out.

In the course of the first opinion it was remarked that, as the judgment was not based upon a contract, the Legislature doubtless had power, by changing the law, to deprive the creditor of the means of enforcing its payment, citing Louisiana v. Mayor of New Orleans, 109 U. S. 285, 3 Sup. Ct. 211, 27 L. Ed. 936. The court held that the Legislature had not attempted this. Therefore the question whether such an attempt could have been successful was, of course, outside of the case. The expression could not have amounted to a decision, and was intended rather as a concession for the purpose of the argument than as even an intimation of opinion. As it has been brought in question in the re-argument, it may be regarded as withdrawn.

The judgment is affirmed.

HALL et al. v. HALL.(Supreme Court of Kansas. Dec. 7, 1907.
Rehearing Denied Jan. 16, 1908.)1. GIFT—INTER VIVOS—PERSONALTY.

The unconditional delivery of personal property by the owner to another, with intent that such other shall immediately and permanently become the owner thereof, and acceptance of the same by such other, constitutes a gift inter vivos.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 24, Gifts, §§ 1-4.]

2. SAME—DELIVERY.

Where the donee is absent or unable to take the gift personally, delivery as above stated to a third person for the benefit of such donee will make the gift complete and valid as if accepted by the donee in person.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 24, Gifts, § 30.]

3. TRUST—GIFT TO THIRD PERSON.

A gift made to a third person for the benefit of another creates a trust which will be administered and controlled like other ordinary trusts.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from District Court, Linn County; Walter L. Simons, Judge.

Action by Amos Hall and others against Edith Hall. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs bring error. Reversed, with directions.

James D. Snoddy, for plaintiffs in error.
John H. Crain and John C. Cannon, for defendant in error.

GRAVES, J. Austin W. Hall and Carolin F. Hall were husband and wife, and resided at Trading Post in Linn county. Carolin F. Hall died September 24, 1884, leaving personal property of the value of $4,016.50. This property passed into the possession of her husband, Austin W. Hall, who retained it until his death. After his death the defendant, Edith Hall, his surviving widow, was appointed administratrix of his estate. The plaintiffs in error are the children of Austin W. Hall and Carolin F. Hall, and on July 2, 1903, they commenced this action in the district court of Linn county to recover the value of the personal property left by their mother, Carolin Hall, claiming that before her death she gave said personal property to them, leaving it in the hands of a trustee for them; that their father obtained possession of it from such trustee, and converted it to his own use. The only questions presented here are whether or not the transaction relied upon by the plaintiffs as a gift from their mother constitutes a gift inter vivos, or a gift causa mortis, and if the former, for how much is the defendant in error liable. The facts which are claimed to constitute the gift, briefly stated, are these:

Prior to the transaction in controversy Carolin Hall received the personal property in question from her father, and for that reason she prized it very highly and guarded its safety with great anxiety. She refused to let her husband take charge of it, or have it in his possession. She had a sister who resided at Montpelier, Vt., to whom she was deeply attached, and in whom she had great confidence. This sister's name was Marguerite Carlton, and was familiarly known as "Marg." In September, 1884, Carolin Hall was sick, which sickness she believed would prove fatal. She sent for her sister "Marg" to come to visit her. On the 19th of September her sister had started and was on her way to Trading Post. Mrs. Hall grew worse and feared that she would not live until "Marg" would get there. The personal property in question consisted of notes and mortgages, kept by Mrs. Hall in a tin box which fastened with a padlock. During her sickness she kept this box near her all the time, under her personal control. When she decided that death was near at hand, her mind turned to her box and its contents. At this time Mrs. Noyes, a cousin of Mrs. Hall, was at the house assisting in caring for her, and Mrs. Thompson, formerly Owens, who had, for several years before her marriage, been employed by Mrs. Hall, and who was then her trusted friend, was also present giving her assistance. Other friends and neighbors were constantly present, also, to watch and wait upon her. Upon this 19th of September Mr. A. W. Hall was also present. Mrs. Hall feared that she might not live until "Marg" would come, or, if alive, might be unable to make known her wishes as to this property. She stated to those present, including her husband, that she wanted the property to go to her boys, the plaintiffs in error, who, at that time, were of the ages of 11, 8, and 4 years, respectively. To cover contingencies she prepared a written memorandum of her wishes, which reads: "I want the contents of this trunk to be evenly divided evenly between my three boys and want their father and my sister Mrs. Carlton to be the ones to decide about the best way of dividing it for them and it is all mine from my father but the mortgage is not on record at town clerk office for the Gibson farm but Austin says that shall be done immediately and other securities turned in satisfy the outstanding indebtedness on the place and I want Marg to use the interest as far as it will go for the children every year after the debts are all paid for the children until of age. Praying that what I have said is right an affectionate mother Carolin." When this paper was written, she handed it to her husband, who read it and said: "There, that will do. I presume. I will see after it"—and returned it to Mrs. Hall. She placed this memorandum with the notes and mortgages in the box, and locked it. She then handed the locked box to Mrs. Noyes, with the request to keep it until "Marg" comes and then give it to her. The key to the box she delivered to Mrs. Thompson, with a like request to keep it until "Marg" comes and then give it to her. Mrs. Noyes never allowed the box to be out of her possession after she received it. She carried it with her from room to room, and kept it at all times within her reach. Mrs. Thompson kept the key in the same way until "Marg" came, when both the box and the key were delivered to her in the presence and sight of Mrs. Hall, who was not yet in a seriously weakened condition, either physically or mentally, although she died within five days thereafter. "Marg" kept possession of the box from the time she received it until after the death of Mrs. Hall. Nothing was said or done by Mrs. Hall after the box was delivered to Mrs. Noyes to indicate any desire to change the disposition of this property from that then made.

After the burial of Mrs. Hall, and Mrs. Carlton was about to return to her home at Montpelier, Vt., she had a talk with A. W. Hall, who stated that it was his desire to carry out in every particular the wishes of his deceased wife with respect to the personal property, which Mrs. Carlton then held, and would, to the best of his ability, work to that end. Mrs. Carlton thought Mr. Hall was in earnest and would conscientiously do as he said. She therefore concluded that the wishes of her deceased sister could be better carried out by him than by herself, and arranged to deliver the property to him as administrator of the estate of Mrs. Carolyn Hall. They together visited the probate judge of Linn county, and presented the whole matter to him. A. W. Hall told the probate judge that he desired to carry out the wishes of his wife in every particular. Mrs. Carlton stated that she believed that Mr. Hall would do so, or she would not consent to let him have the property. There was no occasion for the judge to object, and Hall was then and there appointed administrator of the estate of Carolyn F. Hall, deceased, and received from Mrs. Carlton the notes and mortgages from the tin box, and gave a receipt therefor, which receipt, with the memorandum made by Mrs. Carolyn F. Hall at the time she last locked the box, was placed therein. Mrs. Carlton retained possession of these and took them with her when she returned home. A. W. Hall returned an inventory of the property of Carolyn F. Hall, received by him from Mrs. Carlton, at the value of $4,016.50. Afterwards, and during the administration of the estate, which closed July 6, 1887, he received as interest on the notes the additional sum of $474.72, making the aggregate sum of $4,491.22. Out of this he paid in taxes and in releasing a mortgage on real estate belonging to the plaintiffs in error the sum of $1,418, leaving a balance due them on that date of $3,073.22. On the same day, July 6, 1887, he was appointed guardian for the plaintiffs in error, who were minors, and, as such, received the funds remaining in his hands as administrator. Upon the order of distribution made at the close of administration A. W. Hall was recognized as an heir of Carolyn F. Hall, and was awarded one-half of the estate in his hands. As the boys reached the age of majority, each received the amount due him as shown by the guardian's account. They owned a farm from which rent was collected, taxes paid thereon, interest collected on notes, all of which were mingled in the account so that it is difficult to ascertain from the facts before us what the true state of the account is. Out of this property Mr. Hall erected a monument to the memory of his wife, the expense of which was paid out of the personal property in controversy; also the educational expenses of a part of the boys. The youngest son, John A. Hall, lived with his aunt, Mrs. Carlton, at Montpelier, and afterwards at Lacygne, Kan. August 9, 1901, Mrs. Carlton died. A few days prior thereto she told John the story of his mother's death and of the tin box, and then delivered to him the box with his mother's memorandum therein. In December afterwards he informed his brothers. He, at that time, was attending school in Michigan, and his brothers were in Kansas. This was the first information either of the boys ever had concerning their mother's dying solicitude for their welfare. Mrs. Carolyn Hall left in addition to the personal property in question 250 acres of land which A. W. Hall conveyed by quitclaim deed to the plaintiffs in error.

From these facts we conclude that Mrs. Carolyn F. Hall conveyed all of her title to the personal property in controversy to the plaintiffs in error; that the transaction constituted a gift inter vivos, being an absolute, unconditional delivery of personal property by the donor to a third person as trustee for the donees, with the intent that such property should immediately and permanently vest in such donees. The only resemblance it bears to a gift causa mortis is that the donor realized that she was about to die, and probably if she had not believed that death was near at hand the gift would not have been made at that time. A person has the right to give away his property at any time while life lasts. Contemplation of the near approach of death is, no doubt, very often the cause which induces gifts to be made inter vivos. A. W. Hall knew when he received this property that it belonged exclusively to the plaintiffs in error, and he held it as trustee for them. He or his estate is responsible therefor. The probate court has no jurisdiction to administer the property of these minors as the estate of Carolyn F. Hall, and the action taken in such proceeding is not binding on the plaintiffs in error. The appointment of A. W. Hall as guardian, however, was proper, and whatever of this property went into the guardian's hands must be regarded as accounted for; but the guardian had no right to expend this trust fund for his own purposes, nor in payment of that for which the plaintiffs in error were not liable. They may have been pleased, as children, to have an expensive monument erected at the grave of their mother, but they were not liable therefor. Money paid to relieve their other property of liens and incumbrances would be equivalent to the payment of so much money. We have not been called upon to interpret the memorandum of Mrs. Hall, which accompanied the gift, as to how far its provisions might authorize expenses for educational purposes, and have not done so. We only decide that Mrs. Hall conveyed to these plaintiffs in error the property in controversy by a gift inter vivos, and it vested permanently in them before her death.

The judgment of the district court must therefore be reversed. We are not sufficiently advised to direct the proper judgment in favor of the plaintiffs in error. The judgment is reversed, with direction to enter judgment in favor of the plaintiffs in error for such amount as may, upon inquiry, in accordance with the views herein expressed, be just and proper.

HARPER v. IOLA PORTLAND CEMENT CO. et al.*

(Supreme Court of Kansas. Nov. 9, 1907.)

MASTER AND SERVANT—DANGEROUS PREMISES —DUTY OF MASTER—NEGLIGENCE OF FELLOW SERVANT.

The decision in the case of Brick Company v. Shanks, 69 Kan. 300, 76 Pac. 856, to the effect that a master's duty requires him to make and carry out regulations to render the work of his employes reasonably safe, that an employe does not impliedly assume the risk of injury from dangers against which the master has expressly undertaken to protect him, and that the fellow-servant rule has no application when the negligent employe is charged with a duty which the master is bound to fulfill, applied to a personal injury case growing out of the operation of a stone quarry.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from District Court, Allen County; Oscar Foust, Judge.

Action by George Harper against the Iola Portland Cement Company and Dan Lang. Judgment for defendant Lang, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed and remanded.

Bennett & Bennett and Lucas & Lucas, for plaintiff in error. Baxter D. McClain, for defendant in error.

BURCH, J. The defendant operates a stone quarry in connection with its cement manufactory. The quarry presents a face of solid rock some 20 feet in height. Rows of holes are drilled some distance back from the edge and loaded with dynamite, which is exploded with a battery. These "battery shots" disengage irregular fragments of rock, numbers of which are too large to be loaded at once into cars and transported to the crusher, and which must therefore be reduced. Many cannot be broken by use of the sledge, and these are blown to pieces by dynamite, the holes drilled for the purpose being called "pop holes," and the explosions being called "pop shots." Frequently a battery shot does not discharge all the battery holes, and fragments of rock thrown into the pit of the quarry will contain highly dangerous charges of unexploded dynamite. The plaintiff was an employe of the defendant, and his duty consisted in drilling pop holes. While he was so occupied, he exploded the charge of an unshot battery hole, and was injured. He sued the defendant for damages, claiming a violation of the duty to furnish him a reasonably safe place to work. The defendant denied that it was negligent, and pleaded contributory negligence and assumption of risk. A demurrer to the plaintiff's evidence having been sustained, he prosecutes error.

There was sufficient evidence to go to the jury that at the time of the accident the plaintiff's work was confined to the drilling of pop holes in fragments of rock which had been dislodged by battery shots, and had nothing to do with the drilling, loading, or shooting of battery holes; that, under regulations adopted by the defendant governing work in the quarry, it was the duty of the employe who loaded and shot battery holes to report the number loaded to the quarry foreman; that the foreman or the shooter, or both, counted the explosions as they occurred, to ascertain if all loaded holes were shot; that, if the charge in any hole failed to explode, it was the duty of the shooter to find it and explode it, and if he could not explode it at once to mark it, tell the workmen of its location, and do so at the next shooting; and that the plaintiff had been advised of this rule, and was working in reliance upon it when he was injured.

Further evidence was adduced to show that the plaintiff had no knowledge of the existence of the unexploded charge which injured him, and had no way of determining whether the rock upon which he undertook to work was loaded. It looked like any of the others there. Its surface was covered with a coating of ice, into which pieces of stone were frozen, and the quarry was not lighted sufficiently to make visible indications of a hole having been drilled in the rock if any had existed. Under this evidence the case is in all respects identical in principle with that of Brick Co. v. Shanks, 69 Kan. 300, 76 Pac. 856. The commonest kind of humanity required that pop drillers should not be sent unwarned to drill into rocks containing concealed charges of dynamite, and the law clearly required the defendant to adopt some kind of a regulation for their protection. If unexploded charges were readily discoverable by drillers of ordinary capacity perhaps they might be hired with the understanding they should locate such perils themselves; but, even then, the employment would be harsh, if legitimate, and not the kind in which plaintiff was engaged. The defendant expressly undertook to make the place where plaintiff was required to work safe by the adoption of the regulation described, and an implied agreement to assume the risk guarded by the regulation cannot be recognized. "There is no room for any implied agreement of the employé to assume the risk of danger in the presence of an express regulation upon the subject established by the pit boss for the very purpose of protecting him." Brick Co. v. Shanks, supra.

For the reasons stated at length in the case just cited, the plaintiff was not a fellow servant of the employé who was charged with the duty of discovering unexploded charges of dynamite, marking them, and warning other workmen of their location. No matter to whom the task might be assigned, or what the rank or grade of his service, the duty was one the master was bound to fulfill, and failure to do so constituted actionable negligence. Although the plaintiff was, as he admitted, familiar with the quarry and with the details of the various kinds of work performed there, his conduct, under the circumstances stated, was not such as to charge him with contributory negligence. In other respects, a cause of action was established, and the case should have been submitted to the jury.

The judgment of the district court is reversed, and the cause remanded.

MCKINNEY v. GRANT et al.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. Dec. 7, 1907. Rehearing Denied Jan. 16, 1908.)

1. SALE — CONTRACT — CONSIGNMENT—CONSIGNMENT.

The contract, copied in the statement of facts, is held to be an agreement providing for the consignment of musical instruments by the presumptive owner thereof to an agent for sale, and not a contract of sale and purchase.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 43, Sales, §§ 17, 18.]

2. REPLEVIN—QUESTION FOR COURT.

In a replevin action, either party is entitled to the verdict of a jury, under proper instructions, in the determination thereof. When, however, the parties in the trial of such action agree upon the determinative facts thereof, the judgment to be entered becomes a question of law for the court.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from District Court, Geary County; O. L. Moore, Judge.

Action by W. S. McKinney against J. U. Grant and A. A. Flower. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed and remanded.

The plaintiff in error brought this action against the defendants by filing an ordinary petition in replevin to recover two pianos. The defendants joined issue by a general denial. The plaintiff claimed that he had the title and right of possession to the pianos, and that he had placed them in the possession of one W. J. Shillito for the purpose of sale only in accordance with the terms of a written contract, a copy of which is as follows:

"December 9, 1902. The McKinney Music Co.—Gentlemen: I will take your pianos and organs on consignment for Junction City, Kan., and vicinity, to be accounted for at agreed prices, and upon the following conditions: First. The instruments and proceeds of sale are your property, subject to your order and free from any claim whatsoever. I agree to take good care of all instruments consigned to me and to be responsible for the safe keeping of the same; also to keep them insured for your benefit, with the policies made payable to you in case of loss, to an amount not less than the consignment price of same. Second. I agree to send the cash to you for each and every instrument separately, as soon as sold. Third. I agree to furnish all necessary funds for the payment of freight charges and other expenses connected with the handling of your goods, or expense incurred on account of your having consigned said goods to me, and will make no charge for repairing pianos or organs, or for such services as are for our mutual benefit, unless the charge be agreed upon and authorized in writing previous to the rendering of such service. Fourth. I agree to pay interest at 8 per cent. per annum on all goods unsold and on hand after three months from date of shipment, but it is expressly understood that the charging of said interest and the payment thereof shall in no sense be construed as constituting a sale of said goods to me. Fifth. Upon your demand or that of your authorized representative, I will deliver, as you may direct, free of charge, or expense to you of any kind, including return freight to Cincinnati, all of said consigned goods remaining unsettled for at the time of said demand. I agree, in addition to returning the said stock, to pay you an amount, for depreciation of value at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum, from date of original shipment, on the consignment prices quoted on said stock. Sixth. On the first of each month, I agree to send you a report of all instruments consigned and unsettled for, in stock and in the possession of prospective customers, giving the style and number of each instrument and its location, and will not expect orders for additional stock to be filled while such report is overdue. It is further understood that you reserve the right, without notice, to reject any request from me for consignments. Seventh. This agreement may be terminated at any time, by either party, by notice being given in writing of such termination. W. J. Shillito.

"Accepted: The McKinney Music Co.

"In consideration of the above, and the modifications or changes of the same, if any, and one dollar, I or we, or either of us guarantee that the said — will faithfully perform — part of the agreement, duly account for all money, notes, contracts, and property of whatsoever nature, belonging to the McKinney Music Company which may come into — hands, and further agree to hold, without litigation, the McKinney Music

Company harmless from loss in their dealings with the said ———, my liability or our liability not to exceed ——— dollars. I or we or either of us, hereby waive the benefit of all homestead and exemption laws. This guaranty to be valid and binding upon the party or parties executing the same without regard to their number.

The defendants, on the other hand, claim, and the court, ruling on the demurrer of defendants to plaintiff's evidence, which it sustained, held that the contract amounted to a sale of pianos by plaintiff to Shillito, with the not unusual reservation of title as security for the purchase price. A great deal of evidence, both oral and written, was introduced by both the plaintiff and the defendant, the transcript of which covers 78 pages of the record. Among the items of evidence the defendants introduced an admission of plaintiff's counsel, in substance, that defendants became surety for a debt of $1,525 to a bank, and that to secure them against loss thereby Shillito (who had prior thereto sold a one-half interest in his business and stock of merchandise to one Day) gave them a bill of sale of his one-half interest in the stock of merchandise and accounts, and that defendants immediately took possession of the stock, including the two pianos in question, and thereafter the defendants bought of Day his undivided one-half interest in the stock, including the two pianos, and took possession thereof; also that the defendants had no knowledge of the written agreement, and the same was not recorded.

Humphrey & Humphrey, for plaintiff in error. Roark & Roark, for defendants in error.

SMITH, J. (after stating the facts as above). We are unable to agree with the construction in the written opinion, filed in connection with its instruction to the jury to return a verdict for the defendant, of the written contract under which the pianos appear to have been consigned by plaintiff to Shillito. On the other hand, we see nothing therein, unless it be the agreement in the fourth and fifth paragraphs to pay interest on the value of the pianos upon certain contingencies, to indicate that the contract is other than the plaintiff claims for it, an arrangement under which the plaintiff could consign musical instruments to Shillito to be sold by him as the agent of the plaintiff. The provision requiring Shillito to pay interest on the value of the instruments, in certain contingencies, while perhaps unusual, is not sufficient to characterize the transaction as a sale in opposition to the expressed intention to the contrary and to several other provisions strongly indicating a contrary intention. The most that could be claimed for this provision for interest is that it rendered the contract ambiguous. It is evident from the whole contract, and especially considering the fifth paragraph thereof, that the word "interest" in the fourth paragraph was not used in the sense of rent for the use of money, but was used to designate a compensation for the deterioration in the value of the instruments incident to being kept in stock and exposed to sale.

Viewed in this light, the contract is not ambiguous. It did not create the relation of creditor and debtor between the plaintiff and Shillito when the instruments were consigned and received under the contract, and no money indebtedness then existed as a principal upon which interest, in the ordinary meaning of the word, could be computed. Shillito, by the terms of the contract, was to send the cash (the cash received) for each instrument separately, as soon as sold. This fairly implies that the instruments were to be sold only in the usual course of trade and for cash. That the contract does not prescribe the price at which the consigned instruments were to be sold is not unusual in a contract of this character, which contemplates the consignment of numerous articles of different values. In short, we interpret the contract to be an unambiguous agreement, and to be for the consignment of musical instruments by the presumptive owner thereof to an agent to sell for cash only, at prices to be agreed upon. Shillito, then, had no title under the contract in the pianos in question, and no right of possession thereto which was not terminable by the demand of the plaintiff therefor. The defendants derived all their claims of right thereto from Shillito, and the stream cannot rise higher than its source.

The judgment of the district court is therefore reversed, and the case is remanded, for further proceedings in accordance with the views herein expressed.

BOARD OF COM'RS OF JOHNSON COUNTY v. HEWITT.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. Dec. 7, 1907. Rehearing Denied Jan. 16, 1908.)

1. TAXATION—PERSONAL PROPERTY—SITUS.

Promissory notes belonging to a resident of Kansas, given by residents of Missouri, and secured by trust deeds of real estate in Missouri, which never have been brought into Kansas, but which are left for safe keeping only in the vault of a bank in Missouri, constitute personal property in this state, which has its location in the county, township, and school district of the residence of its owner, within the meaning of the act relating to the assessment and collection of taxes.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 45, Taxation, §§ 430-441.]

2. SAME—CORRECTION OF FALSE STATEMENT—ASSESSOR'S RETURN.

If, by proceedings instituted and conducted under section 7599, Gen. St. 1901, authorizing the correction of false tax statements, it be discovered that an owner who appears and resists the inquiry omitted to list specific items of taxable personal property in the statement which he gave to the assessor, and such property is duly valued, and the proper amount of taxes thereon is charged against the owner on the tax roll, an omission of the county clerk formally to correct the assessor's return is a mere irregularity, which does not vitiate the tax.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from District Court, Johnson County; W. H. Sheldon, Judge.

Action by C. B. Hewitt against the Board of County Commissioners of Johnson county. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Remanded, with instructions to modify.

Ohas. C. Hoge, John T. Little, and J. P. Thorne, for plaintiff in error. Brown, Harding & Brown and J. W. Parker, for defendant in error.

BURCH. J. The plaintiff sued to recover taxes paid under protest upon certain promissory notes and real estate mortgages securing them. The district court made findings of fact and conclusions of law as follows:

"Findings of Fact.

"1. On the 1st day of March, 1903, the plaintiff, C. B. Hewitt, was, and at all times since has been, a resident of School District No. 32 in Mission township, Johnson county, Kan.; and for the year 1903 he was assessed by the township assessor of said township and listed for assessment and taxation certain personal property.

"2. On March 1, 1903, plaintiff was the owner of certain promissory notes amounting to $3,000, which were executed and delivered to him in Jackson county, Mo., by parties living in said county and state. These notes were all secured by trust deeds, executed and delivered to plaintiff in said county and state, and the land covered by said trust deeds was all in Jackson county, Mo. On March 1, 1903, all of said notes and trust deeds were in a box, in the vault of the First National Bank of Kansas City, Mo., in Jackson county, where they had theretofore been left by plaintiff, and have ever since remained, said notes and trust deeds never having been actually in the state of Kansas.

"3. The notes and trust deed mentioned in finding No. 2 were not listed by plaintiff with the assessor of Mission township, Johnson county, Kan., for the purposes of taxation for the year 1903, when he was assessed and listed other personal property for that year.

"4. On March 1, 1904, plaintiff was the owner of certain promissory notes, amounting to $6,000, which were executed and delivered to him in Jackson county, Mo., by parties living in said county and state. These notes were all secured by trust deeds, executed and delivered to plaintiff, in said county and state, by parties living in said county and state, and the land covered by said trust deeds was all in Jackson county, Mo. On March 1, 1904, all of said trust deeds were in a box, in the vault of the First National Bank of Kansas City, in Jackson county, Mo., where they had theretofore been left by plaintiff, and have ever since remained, said notes and trust deeds never having been actually in the state of Kansas.

"5. The notes and trust deeds mentioned in finding No. 4 were not listed by plaintiff with the assessor of Mission township, Johnson county, Kan., for taxation for the year 1904, when he was assessed and listed other personal property.

"6. The notes and trust deeds referred to in findings of fact Nos. 2 and 4 were left in this box in the vault of the First National Bank of Kansas City, Mo., by the plaintiff, and were kept there by permission of the officers of the bank, the plaintiff having had the use of said box in said vault for about 10 years. The bank has a key to the vault, and the plaintiff a key to the box in which the notes and trust deeds were left for safe keeping by plaintiff, and to which box he gains access by obtaining the key to the vault from the officers of the bank, then using the key he has to open the box in which the notes and trust deeds are kept.

"7. March 1, 1903, the notes referred to in finding No. 2 were worth and of the value of $3,600; and the notes mentioned and referred to in finding No. 4 were worth and of the value of $6,600 on March 1, 1904.

"8. The rate of taxation in School District No. 32 in Mission township, Johnson county, Kan., for the year 1903, was 31.7 mills on the dollar, and for the year 1904 it was 38.1 on the dollar.

"9. In the years 1903 and 1904 the basis of valuation agreed upon by the assessors of Johnson county, Kan., was, on horses, mule, and cattle, one-third of their cash value; on money, shares of stock in bank, stock in any company or corporation, personal notes and mortgages, 40 per cent. of their cash value.

"10. The testimony does not disclose whether any of the notes owned by plaintiff, and in said box in 1903, were there in 1904, or whether they were different notes.

"11. Plaintiff did not pay tax on said notes and trust deeds in Missouri in 1903 and 1904.

"12. During the time hereinafter mentioned, Roscoe Smith was the county clerk of Johnson county, Kan., A. E. Moll was county treasurer, as well had the county a board of county commissioners, made defendants herein.

"13. In January, 1905, Roscoe Smith, county clerk of Johnson county, Kan., being advised that plaintiff owned certain notes and trust deeds on March 1, 1903, and on March 1, 1904, that he had not listed for taxation with other personal property returned to the assessor of Mission township in said county, and on the 11th day of January, 1905, he caused written notice to be served upon plaintiff that on January 19, 1905, he would have a hearing at the office of the county clerk of Johnson county, Kan., touching the question as to whether said notes and trust deeds had not escaped taxation and should be entered by him upon the tax roll of Johnson county, Kan., for taxation for said years; and in pursuance of said notice plaintiff appeared before said county clerk at said hearing, and objected to said notes and trust deeds being entered by said county clerk for taxation in said county and state.

"14. As a result of said hearing before said county clerk, and on February 20, 1905, Roscoe Smith, county clerk of Johnson county, Kan., entered up against the plaintiff under the name of Calvin B. Hewitt, in a book kept by the officers of said county, designated as "Omitted Personal Property Tax Roll," the following entries:

No.	Date	Name	School Dist.	Year	Valuation	Rate	Total tax.
6	Feb. 20 1905	Calvin B. Hewitt	32	1908 1904	1440 2640	$1.7 38.1	45.64 100.58

"The county clerk made no further or other record or entry of said matter in his office at said time. Afterwards an entry was made in said Omitted Personal Property Tax Roll, as follows:

Am't Paid	Date	By whom	Costs paid	Remarks
$150.52	7-14-05	C. B. Hewitt	$4.30	Paid under protest.

"This roll, designated as an 'Omitted Personal Property Tax Roll,' was a book kept for the purpose of entering omitted personal property by said county clerk and the entering of the payment of tax by the county treasurer when the tax was paid. Said Omitted Personal Property Tax Roll was delivered to the county treasurer that he might collect the taxes so as aforesaid by the county clerk entered against plaintiff, and plaintiff was notified by the county clerk that he had entered said notes and trust deeds for taxation.

"15. The plaintiff did not appear before the board of equalization of said county at the June meeting of said board in 1905, and make complaint as to the valuation on said notes and trust deeds entered by the county clerk on said Omitted Personal Property Tax Roll.

"16. On July 14, 1905, plaintiff, under protest, to avoid forcible collection under a tax warrant, paid to defendant, A. E. Moll, county treasurer of Johnson county, Kan., $150.52, the amount so charged against him for taxation, for tax and costs, and by said county clerk so as aforesaid entered up against plaintiff on said Omitted Personal Property Tax Roll, and said county treasurer gave him a receipt therefor with the indorsement thereon, 'Paid under protest.'

"17. At the time, and immediately before paying said sum of $150.52 to said county treasurer on July 14, 1905, plaintiff delivered to said county treasurer a written protest against the payment of said tax and costs, claiming that it was illegal and void.

"18. On July 27, 1905, plaintiff filed with and in the office of the county clerk of Johnson county, Kan., and presented against said county, a bill and demand, duly verified, asking the allowance and repayment to him of said sum of $150.52 so as aforesaid paid by him under protest to the county treasurer of Johnson county, Kan., on the 14th day of July, 1905, which claim was not allowed, but was by said board of county commissioners rejected; and this action was commenced August 8, 1905. The case was tried before the court January 25, 1906, both parties asking the court to make separate findings of fact and conclusions of law. Just before the trial commenced defendants in open court offered to let plaintiff take judgment for the sum of $4.30, with interest thereon from July 14, 1905, at 6 per cent. per annum, being the amount of costs charged against plaintiff by the county clerk on said hearing to discover omitted property and interest thereon, which offer plaintiff declined to accept.

Conclusions of Law.

"1. That the tax paid by plaintiff to the county treasurer of Johnson county, Kan., under protest, July 14, 1905, was illegal.

"2. That the notes and trust deeds upon which said tax was levied were not subject to taxation in Mission township, Johnson county, Kan., for the years 1903 and 1904.

"3. Said tax having been paid under protest, the plaintiff should recover in this action from the defendant county the sum of $150.52, with interest thereon from July 14, 1905, at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, and costs."

A judgment was rendered according to the conclusions of law, to reverse which the commissioners prosecute this proceeding in error.

The statute providing for the assessment and collection of taxes declares that all property in this state, real and personal, not expressly exempt therefrom, shall be subject to taxation in the manner prescribed. Personal property is defined to include every tangible thing which is the subject of ownership, not forming part or parcel of real property; also tax-sale certificates, judgments, notes, bonds, and mortgages, and all evidences of debt secured by lien on real estate. All personal property must be listed and taxed each year in the township, city, and school district in which it is located on the 1st day of March, except in certain specified instances not material to this controversy. Gen. St. 1901, §§ 7502, 7503, 7509.

The plaintiff contends that the judgment of the district court should be upheld, because the property taxed was not in this state, and had no location in Mission township in Johnson county. It will be observed the statute places tax-sale certificates, judgments, notes, bonds, and mortgages and all evidences of debt secured by lien on real estate in the same category for purposes of taxation, and distinguishes them from tangible personal property. In the case of Kingman Co. v. Leonard, 57 Kan. 531, 46 Pac. 900, 34 L. R. A. 810, it was demonstrated that a judgment rendered by a court of this state has no independent situs of its own, and that for purposes of taxation it must, under the statutes of this state, be regarded as attending its owner at his place of residence, although that be in a foreign state. In the case of Mecartney v. Caskey, 66 Kan. 412, 71 Pac. 832, it was decided that tax-sale certificates issued by a county treasurer of this state have no independent situs of their own, and that, like judgments, their situs for purposes of taxation must be deemed to be the domicile of their owner although he be a nonresident.

The doctrine that the debt, evidenced by a note or secured by a mortgage, is the substantial element of the owner's taxable property, that the note or mortgage is merely evidence, and that generally the debt and its evidence have no independent situs of their own, is now so strong in its own credit that it needs no sureties by way of citations of authority. From the statute, the decisions referred to, and the legal doctrine stated it must follow that the property taxed in this case had its situs at the domicile of its owner in Mission township, Johnson county, unless some substantial reason exists for making an exception in its favor. Only one matter worthy of consideration can be suggested. In the cases cited, which involved the right to tax intangible property belonging to non-residents of this state, it was intimated that such property might acquire a situs here for purposes of taxation. Notes, mortgages, tax-sale certificates, and the like might be brought into the state for something more than a temporary purpose, be devoted to some business use here, and thus become incorporated with the property of this state for revenue purposes. Such a situs has aptly been termed a "business situs." Herron, Treas. v. Keeran, 59 Ind. 472, 477, 26 Am. Rep. 87; In re Jefferson, 35 Minn. 215, 28 N. W. 256.

Conceding for the purpose of argument that a resident of this state, who is the owner of intangible property like that assessed in this case may give it a business situs in a foreign state, and that it was the intention of the Legislature to regard property so located as outside the state and not subject to taxation here, the question remains whether the conduct of the plaintiff was sufficient to accomplish such a result. It is not necessary to determine precisely what facts will be sufficient in every case to establish an independent business situs for notes and mortgages; but, generally, the element of separation from the domicile of the owner, and fairly permanent attachment to some foreign locality, should appear, together with some business use of them, or some power of managing, controlling, or dealing with them in a business way. A merely transitory presence in a foreign state, or a naked custody for safe keeping, is not enough. Hunter v. Board of Supervisors, 83 Iowa, 876, 11 Am. Rep. 133; Herron, Treas. v. Keeran, 59 Ind. 472, 26 Am. Rep. 87; Mecartney v. Caskey, 66 Kan. 412, 71 Pac. 832. Indeed it has recently been held by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Buck v. Beach, 208 U. S. 302, 27 Sup. Ct. 712, 51 L. Ed. 1106, that the Legislature of a state cannot disregard the rule that the situs of intangible property is at the domicile of its owner, in order to subject to taxation notes and mortgages owned by a nonresident but kept in a safe within the state by an agent who transacted no business regarding them and made no use of them other than to send them to the state of the owner's domicile for the purpose of delivering them on full payment, or to have indorsements of principal or interest made on them. In the opinion it is said: "The question still remains, was there any property within the jurisdiction of the state of Indiana, so as to permit that state to tax it, simply because of the presence of the Ohio notes in that state? It was not the value of the paper as a tangible thing, on which these promises to pay the debts existing in Ohio were written, that was taxed by that state. The property really taxed was the debt itself, as each separate note was taxed at the full amount of the debt named therein or due thereon. And jurisdiction over these debts for the purpose of taxation was asserted and exercised solely by reason of the physical presence in Indiana of the notes themselves, although they were only written evidence of the existence of the debts which were in fact thereby taxed. * * * Under such rule, the debts here in question were not property within the state of Indiana, nor were the promissory notes themselves, which were only evidence of such debts." The conclusion of the court, however, that the Legislature lacked power to take cognizance of the physical presence of the securities in Indiana for revenue purposes, may not command universal approval.

In this case the findings of fact show that the notes and mortgages taxed were merely left in the vault of a bank in Kansas City, Mo., for safe keeping. They were connected with no business enterprise. The depository did not even have access to them, much less any power of business use or control over them. In strictness they were not even severed from the personal possession of the owner. Therefore the legal situs of the property was at the owner's residence in Kansas. The cases of Wilcox v. Ellis, Treas., 14 Kan. 588, 19 Am. Rep. 107, and Fisher v. Com'rs of Rush Co., 19 Kan. 414, are cited in opposition to this view. In the Wilcox Case the notes taxed were necessarily detained in the foreign state by an agent of both the maker and the owner for the completion of the business transaction out of which they arose. Something of an instance of a business situs is thus presented. If it does not meet all the requirements of a proper standard, it certainly goes far beyond the facts of the present controversy. In the Fisher Case promissory notes, and a mortgage securing them, were payable in Iowa, and were left there for the purpose of collecting the moneys due upon them. Probably the weight of authority would not now sustain a holding that the property had a business situs in Iowa, because it was left there for collection. If such were true, every attorney in this state having in his office on the 1st day of March, for collection, notes and mortgages of nonresident clients, would be obliged to list them for taxation. See Myers v. Seaberger, 45 Ohio St. 232, 12 N. E. 796. But the object of the deposit was the accomplishment of a business purpose which made the presence of the paper in Iowa indispensable. Therefore the case is wholly dissimilar from the one now under consideration.

Although much confusion still exists, legal thought upon the subject of the taxation of intangible property has been considerably clarified since the opinions in Wilcox v. Ellis and Fisher v. Com'rs were written, and many of the arguments there advanced would now be regarded as unsatisfactory. It is clear that the laws of Kansas may and do afford a resident owner of notes and mortgages kept or even used elsewhere substantial securities, privileges, and advantages with reference to them, so that the reciprocal relation between protection and taxation is sufficiently preserved. As shown by Mr. Justice Allen in Kingman v. Leonard, 57 Kan. 531, 46 Pac. 960, 34 L. R. A. 810, intangible property may none the less have its situs for purposes of taxation in this state, although another state may afford the owner remedies respecting it. It is no longer debatable that the question whether a resident owner of debts evidenced by notes and mortgages has property in this state is not to be determined by the locality in which the debts were created, nor by the place where the security lies, nor by the residence of the debtors. And it is impossible to believe that the Legislature intended to regard notes given by nonresidents and secured by mortgages on property in another state as outside its jurisdiction, merely because the resident owner, returning home after the conclusion of the business transaction producing them, left them just beyond the state line. Since, however, as already shown, the results reached in the cases adverted to do not conflict with a holding that the notes and mortgages involved in this case were taxable in Kansas, it is not necessary to discuss those decisions further.

It is urged that the taxes charged against the plaintiff's property are void because the record contains no official return of a listing and valuation of described items of property. By his own wrong the defendant made it necessary for the county clerk to resort to the exceptional proceedings authorized by section 7599, Gen. St. 1901, to bring omitted property upon the tax roll. The course prescribed by the statute was strictly pursued, except that the return of the assessor, incorrect because of the defendant's conduct, was not formally corrected in accordance with the facts developed at the hearing in which the defendant participated. This omission was a mere irregularity, and does not vitiate the tax. According to the decision in the case of Com'rs v. Lane (Kan.) 90 Pac. 1092, the taxes paid under protest for the year 1903 were recoverable.

The cause is remanded to the district court, with instructions to modify its judgment in accordance with the views herein expressed.

SMITH v. OGDEN & N. W. R. CO.

(Supreme Court of Utah. Dec. 9, 1907.)

1. RAILROADS—FIRES—COMBUSTIBLE MATERIAL ON RIGHT OF WAY.

A railroad company must keep its right of way free from combustible material, and when it negligently permits such material to accumulate thereon, and the same takes fire from a passing engine, and it is communicated to adjoining property, which is injured, without the negligence of the owner, the railroad company is liable.

2. SAME—RAILROAD TRACK ON HIGHWAY.

A railroad company maintaining its track on a public highway must keep at least such portions of the highway as it occupies and uses in the operation of its railroad, and such portions as may be properly regarded as its right of way, free from combustible material.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 41, Railroads, § 1673.]

3. SAME—ACTIONS—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where, in an action against a railroad company maintaining its track on a public highway for fire set by sparks from its engines and communicated from combustible material in the highway to adjoining property, there was evidence justifying a finding that the fire originated on the right of way, a charge that the railroad company was not responsible for the combustible material in the highway, and was not liable for the damages sustained, was reversible error.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 41, Railroads, § 1754.]

4. APPEAL—REVIEW—INVITED ERROR.

A party cannot complain on the ground that the court charged on a subject neither presented by the pleadings nor the evidence, where he requested the court to charge on the subject.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, § 3602.]

5. SAME.

A party requesting the court to charge on a subject may complain that the court erroneously stated the law, where it was not stated as requested.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, § 3602.]

6. NEGLIGENCE—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Plaintiff is not required to allege and prove, in the first instance, freedom from contributory negligence, and the burden of proving contributory negligence is on defendant, unless it is shown by plaintiff's evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 37, Negligence, §§ 229-234.]

7. SAME.

Where contributory negligence is shown by plaintiff's evidence, defendant may interpose a motion for nonsuit on that ground, though there is no plea of contributory negligence.*

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 37, Negligence, § 277.]

8. SAME.

Where there is sufficient evidence, whether supplied by plaintiff or by defendant, on which a charge of contributory negligence may be predicated, the court, at the request of either party, should charge on the subject, though there is no plea of contributory negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 37, Negligence, § 365.]

9. SAME.

Where there is a plea of contributory negligence, but there is no evidence on which to predicate a charge on contributory negligence, such a charge should not be given.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 37, Negligence, § 365.]

10. SAME.

The general denial puts in issue such of the general averments of the complaint as plaintiff must prove to maintain the action, and under it defendant may introduce any evidence disproving the negligence charged against him, or the causal connection of his negligence and the injury; but a plea of contributory negligence is essential to entitle defendant to introduce evidence of contributory negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 37, Negligence, §§ 201, 210.]

11. RAILROADS — FIRES — ACTIONS — PLEADING AND PROOF — NEGLIGENCE — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

A railroad company, in an action against it for fire set by sparks emitted from its locomotives, may, under the general issue, prove that it was not guilty of the negligent acts charged, that the fire was occasioned by persons over whom it had no control, or that plaintiff caused it, and may prove its acts of caution in guarding against the spread of fire, and that the fire, though negligently started, did not reach plaintiff's land, or that an independent cause intervened between its acts and the injury; but it cannot show that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in suffering combustible material to remain on his property in close proximity to the track, or that plaintiff after the discovery of the fire negligently failed to make reasonable efforts to save his property, such acts not being available, unless specially pleaded.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 41, Railroads, § 1706.]

12. NEGLIGENCE—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

The duty rests on one who discovers that a fire is advancing towards his property to make every reasonable effort to prevent its destruction.

13. RAILROADS—FIRES—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—EVIDENCE.

In an action against a railroad company for fire set by sparks emitted from its locomotives, evidence held insufficient to show negligence of plaintiff or his employés in charge of the property destroyed by fire, based on a failure to save the property from destruction after discovery of the fire and its advance towards the property.

14. EVIDENCE—OPINIONS—SUBJECTS OF EXPERT TESTIMONY.

Where, in an action against a railroad company for fire set by sparks from its locomotives, it was not impracticable to put the jury in possession of all the facts, it was error to allow hypothetical questions calling for the opinion of witnesses as to the degree of diligence which should have been exercised by plaintiff and his employés in saving the property from destruction after discovering the fire.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 20, Evidence, § 2316.]

15. TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—EVIDENCE.

Where, in an action against a railroad company for fire set by sparks emitted from its locomotives, there was no evidence of an independent cause intervening between the negligent acts of the railroad company and the injury, and evidence that its negligent acts were the proximate cause of the injury, an instruction that if, after the commission of the negligent acts, there intervened an independent act which caused the injury, the acts were interrupted and were too remote, was erroneous, because of the absence of evidence on which to base it.†

Appeal from District Court, Second District; J. A. Howell, Judge.

Action by A. R. C. Smith against the Ogden & Northwestern Railroad Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, and remanded for new trial.

George Halverson and T. N. Kimball, for appellant. Richards, Rolapp & Pratt, for respondent.

STRAUP, J. This action was brought to recover damages for the destruction of property by fire alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant in the operation and management of its engine. The particular negligence charged against the defendant was in permitting dry grasses and weeds to be and remain upon its right of way, in failing to equip its engine with a proper spark arrester, and in the manner of handling and operating the engine. The answer was a general denial. A trial before the court and a jury resulted in a verdict for the defendant. Plaintiff appeals.

The defendant's track was maintained upon a public street or highway. Plaintiff's land was 80 or 100 rods north of the track. A Mr. Stephens and a Mr. Ellis owned two parcels of land lying between plaintiff's land and the track. The highway and defendant's right of way were covered with dry June grass, which, at the time of the fire, about the middle of July, readily ignited. There were also June and other dry grasses on lands adjoining the track and lying between the track and plaintiff's land. On the day in question, as defendant's engine was propelled and operated over its road, a number of fires were started from sparks and coals which were emitted from the engine, one of which fires started at the Stephens land, and others to the east and west of that place. The fire which started at the Stephens land spread from there to plaintiff's land where it destroyed his hay in the stack, his pasturage, and his fences. None of the other fires reached his land. That all the fires were caused by sparks and coals emitted from the defendant's engine, there is no substantial conflict in the evidence. That some of the fires which started to the west and the east of the Stephens land originated on the defendant's right of way is also beyond dispute. Whether the particular fire which spread to plaintiff's land started from sparks thrown on the defendant's right of way, or from sparks thrown on the Stephens land adjoining the street and right of way, the evidence is conflicting; but there is sufficient evidence in the record to justify a finding by the jury that it started on defendant's right of way. The court charged the jury: "You are instructed that the defendant's railroad, where it passes along the road in the vicinity of the premises sued for by the plaintiff as having been damaged, was in the public highway, over which defendant had no control further than to maintain and operate its railroad, and that if there was dry grass or other combustible material growing in said highway and along the said defendant's said railroad track, or in the fields adjoining such highway, the defendant was not responsible therefor, and cannot be held liable for any damage sustained by the plaintiff, if you find that the plaintiff was damaged, by the setting on fire of such dry grass or other combustible material growing in said public highway, or in the fields adjoining the same, by the sparks from its said engine, provided the said engine was supplied with the most approved apparatus for the prevention of the emission of sparks and coals of fire, and that the engine was in good repair at that time, and operated by a competent engineer with reasonable care and skill at the time the fire was started by said engine, if you find that the engine started the fire."

*Bunnell v. Railway Co., 13 Utah, 314, 44 Pac. 927; Clark v. Railroad Company, 20 Utah, 401, 59 Pac. 92; Holland v. Railroad Co., 26 Utah, 209, 72 Pac. 946.

†Belnap v. Widdison, 90 Pac. 232.

Plaintiff's exception to this charge must be sustained. From this, as well as other portions of the charge, it will be seen that the court restricted the jury's finding on the question of the defendant's negligence to the allegations with respect to equipment and management of the engine, and entirely took from their consideration the alleged acts of negligence with respect to permitting dry grass and combustible matter to accumulate and remain on and along the defendant's railroad track. That it is the duty of a railroad company to keep its right of way free from dry grasses and other combustible materials in order that fire may not be set out on its right of way, and if it negligently permits dry grasses and other combustible material to accumulate and remain on its right of way, and the same takes fire from one of its passing engines and is communicated to an adjoining farm, where it destroys the property of the owner without negligence on his part, the railroad company is liable, is not questioned by the respondent. As is said by the authorities, the removal of such combustible substances is quite as much a means of preventing the communication of fire from locomotives as is the use of inventions for preventing the escape of fire from the locomotives themselves. The charge evidently was given on the theory that, inasmuch as the defendant maintained its track upon a public highway over which it had no control, no duty was imposed upon it to keep its right of way clear of such combustible substances. But the duty imposed upon it in such case is the same as though it owned the right of way, at least to such portions of the highway occupied and used by it in the operation of its railroad and to such portions as may be properly regarded its right of way. Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Middlecott, 150 Ill. 27, 37 N. E. 660. This principle of law is not, in this court, seriously controverted by the respondent. It is, however, contended by it that the error was harmless, because, as it claims, the evidence shows that the particular fire which spread to plaintiff's land did not start on the right of way, but started from sparks thrown on the Stephens land, and hence its alleged negligence in permitting dry grasses and other combustible material to be and remain on its right of way was not a contributing cause of the injury. Upon this point we have carefully examined the transcript, and while it may be said the evidence pertaining to it is not very direct, still we are of the opinion that there is sufficient evidence to justify a finding that this particular fire originated on the defendant's right of way. The charge of the court was therefore erroneous and prejudicial.

A further complaint is made by the plaintiff because of the court's charging the jury on the question of contributory negligence. This complaint is based upon the ground that contributory negligence was not pleaded, and on the further ground that there was no evidence to justify a finding of such negligence. The plaintiff, however, is not in a position to make such claim, for the reason that he himself requested the court to charge upon the subject. While the plaintiff may still be heard to complain that the court erroneously stated the law, if it was not stated as requested by him, nevertheless he cannot be heard to complain upon the ground that the court charged upon a subject which was neither presented by the pleadings nor the evidence when he himself requested the court to do so. As the judgment must be reversed, and a new trial granted because of the assigned error already reviewed, and as the questions of contributory negligence attempted to be presented are likely to arise on a new trial, we have concluded to consider them. The rule obtains in this jurisdiction that the plaintiff is not required to allege nor prove in the first instance his freedom from negligence. He is required to allege and prove negligence on the part of the defendant, and that such negligence, as a natural and direct result, occasioned the injury. The burden of proving contributory negligence is upon the defendant, unless it is shown by plaintiff's evidence. When it is shown by his evidence, the defendant may interpose a motion for nonsuit on that ground, although there is no plea of contributory negligence. Bunnell v. Railway Co., 13 Utah, 314, 44 Pac. 927; Clark v. O. S. L. Ry. Co., 20 Utah, 401, 59 Pac. 92; Holland v. O. S. L. R. Co., 26 Utah, 209, 72 Pac. 940. The plea is not material in support of the motion, for the motion is based on the ground that the plaintiff has not proven the case alleged in his complaint, but has proven facts outside of it and which defeat his right to recover. So, too, whenever there is sufficient evidence in a case, whether supplied by the plaintiff or by the defendant, upon which a charge of contributory negligence may properly be predicated, the court, at the request of either party, should charge upon the subject, although again there is no plea of contributory negligence. Though there be a plea of contributory negligence, yet, if there is no evidence in the case upon which to base a charge of such negligence, none should be given by the court. If there is no evidence either on the part of the plaintiff or the defendant on such issue, the court should not submit that issue to the jury any more than it should submit any other issue to them upon which there is no evidence.

A plea of contributory negligence is essential only to entitle the defendant to introduce evidence in support of such a defense. The general denial puts in issue such of the general averments of the complaint as the plaintiff is bound to prove in order to maintain his action. Under the general issue, the defendant may introduce any evidence which tends to disprove the negligence charged against him, or which tends to disprove the causal connection of his negligence and the injury; but a plea of contributory negligence is essential to entitle the defendant to introduce evidence which does not tend to disprove such facts, but which merely tends to prove negligence on plaintiff's part, concurring and combining with the defendant's negligence, and as a proximate cause contributing to plaintiff's injury. That is to say, the defendant, under the general issue, may not introduce evidence which does not tend to disprove his negligence or its causal connection, or the averments essential to plaintiff's recovery, but which, nevertheless, tends to relieve him of the legal consequences of his negligence. To do so a special plea is necessary. Applying this principle to the kind of case in hand, the defendant, under the general issue, may, among other things, prove: That it was not guilty of the acts charged. That the fire was occasioned by persons over whom, or from causes over which, it had no control, or that the plaintiff himself caused it. The acts of caution exercised by the defendant in guarding against or preventing the spread of fire. That the fire, though negligently started by the defendant, nevertheless did not reach plaintiff's land or destroy his property, or that an independent cause intervened between its alleged acts of negligence and the injury which was the sole proximate cause; and, of course, all other things and causes which tend to disprove defendant's negligence, or the causal connection of such negligence. But the defendant, under the general issue, may not show that the plaintiff was guilty of what in law is termed "contributory negligence." For instance, he may not show that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence in suffering combustible material to be and remain upon his property, or in close proximity to the railroad track, or, after the plaintiff or his servants in charge discovered the fire, they negligently failed to make reasonable efforts to prevent its spreading to plaintiff's property or to save it from destruction. Such acts amount to negligence on plaintiff's part, which concurred and combined with the negligence of the defendant, while the latter's negligence was still continuing and causal, and which, together with the plaintiff's negligence, directly, concurrently, and proximately contributed to the injury. While such evidence tends to prove that the plaintiff's negligence was a concurrent and proximate cause, it does not tend to disprove the concurrent and proximate cause of defendant's negligence. It, therefore, does not controvert the facts which plaintiff must establish in order to sustain his action, but only avoids the legal consequences of such facts. And whenever such is the only effect of the proffered evidence a special plea is essential. For these reasons the general rule obtains that the defense of contributory negligence is not available as a defense, if not specially pleaded, unless plaintiff's evidence discloses such negligence. As has been shown, however, the court is not under all circumstances precluded from charging on such subject, because there was no such plea.

This, then, brings us to the further claim made, that there is no evidence in the case tending to show the plaintiff guilty of such negligence. That there is a total want of evidence tending to show the plaintiff guilty of negligence in the first instance is conceded. That is, there is no evidence showing that the plaintiff had anything to do with causing the fire, or that he was in any particular responsible for it, or that he was negligent in maintaining combustible substances upon his premises or near the railroad track, or that he otherwise made a negligent use of his property, or that he was even guilty of negligence in preventing the fire spreading to his land. The only claim made by the respondent in this respect is that the employees of the plaintiff (10 in number) working in his hayfield stacking hay at the time of the fire, had they not devoted so much effort in attempting to save the hay stacks, and had they directed more attention to the fire along the fence, some or most of the fence posts might have been saved. The law undoubtedly is that when a fire is once started and is discovered by the plaintiff, a duty is resting upon him to make every reasonable effort to save his property. After discovering that the fire has started, and that it is advancing towards his property, the plaintiff cannot negligently stand still and allow the fire to advance and destroy his property, when, with reasonable efforts, he might prevent such destruction, and then be permitted to recover for such a loss. The property owner is bound to use all reasonable efforts to save his property and to minimize his loss, and if, by the use of such efforts, all damages could have been prevented, no recovery can be had. If after discovering the fire all the property could not have been saved, but with reasonable efforts some of it could have been saved, the plaintiff may not recover for the loss of that which could have been saved by such efforts. The evidence shows that a brisk wind was blowing towards plaintiff's property, and that the fire spread to it like a prairie fire. The plaintiff was not in his field at the time of the fire, but was at his house. What distance that was from the fire is not made to appear. When plaintiff first discovered the fire, it had swept over the fields and was consuming his haystacks. So far as made to appear, there was not anything that he could have done which would have saved his property. Conceding that the record sufficiently shows that the plaintiff's employes in the field were in charge of his property, and that its care had been intrusted to them in the sense that their negligence should be imputed to plaintiff (Railroad Co. v. McKay, 69 Miss. 139, 12 South. 447), yet, from an examination of the record we have been unable to find any evidence tending to show a lack of diligence on their part. To the contrary, we find evidence showing that they did all in their power to arrest the progress of the fire and to save the property. The transcript of the record consists of over 900 pages of typewriting, and it may be that we have overlooked some of the evidence on this point. But neither party has called our attention to any evidence which would justify a finding that plaintiff's employes did not use all reasonable efforts and diligence in such regard. The only matters to which our attention has been directed consist of answers made over plaintiff's objections by some of the defendant's witnesses to certain hypothetical questions propounded to them. These rulings are also assigned as error, and will be considered later. But, with the answers in the record, the evidence, in our judgment, is wholly insufficient to justify a finding that plaintiff's employes were guilty of negligence in failing to arrest the progress of the fire, or in saving the property. One of the hypothetical questions propounded to defendant's witnesses by its counsel, and which was permitted to be answered over plaintiff's objections, is as follows: "Q. Assuming that upon a field out here a fire was started in one field and passed along from that on to the next upon which there were 10 men working hay, and after the fire crossed onto the field where they were working, and observing that it was coming, the haystacks, they tried to fight it from the haystacks, but being unable to prevent the burning of the stacks, if they had directed their attention to the fighting of the fire and putting out the posts, the fire had communicated from the June grass stubble to the lucern stubble, growing in the field, in your opinion would 10 men have been able to put out the fire that attacked or started from that field fire in the fencing?" Another was: "Q. Now, assuming Mr. Smith had 10 men working upon his place stacking his hay at the time that the fire came over from Mr. Ellis' field to his field and burned up that way, and the fire traveling so rapidly that they were unable to do anything towards saving the hay further than to throw it off two wagons and get the wagons out of the way, I will ask you if those men had directed their attention toward extinguishing the fire along the line of those fences of Mr. Smith's where the posts took fire and burned out, if the fire could have been extinguished in those posts in time to have saved them?" The first question was answered in the affirmative. The second was answered: "A. If I understand your question that, that is, that those men would have directed their attention towards saving the posts? Q. The fire came so fast that they discovered they couldn't save the hay, and running the two wagons off on which the hay was standing, to save them, if those men had turned their attention toward the saving of the posts that took fire and had followed the fire up, whether or not those 10 men could have put the fire out as it caught the posts in the fence and saved the posts from burning up, so they would have been practically saved? A. Yes; I think they could." Questions of like kind were also propounded to and similar answers made by other witnesses. Some of these witnesses also testified that, in their opinion, had less attention been given to the stacks and more to the posts, some or most of them might have saved by beating and whipping them with sage brush. Some of them also testified that, had they been there, they would have tried to save the haystacks instead of the posts. Such evidence does not tend to show that plaintiff's employes were guilty of negligence. It only tends to show that if the men had not devoted so much effort to the haystacks they might have saved some or most of the posts. One haystack and wagons were saved. Had more attention been given to the fence, these might have been lost. In such case the hypothetical questions could have been propounded on the theory that too much attention had been given to the fence. Lack of diligence cannot be predicated on the fact that plaintiff's men made more effort to save what appeared to be the most valuable part of the property, and which was most likely to be consumed by the fire, than was made to save property of less value, or, because of mere error of judgment, they did not pursue the wisest course. We, therefore, do not find any evidence upon which a charge of contributory negligence could properly be based.

We pass now to the rulings made admitting this testimony. In the first place, we find that the witnesses did not qualify so as to entitle them to speak on the subject. In the next place, the subject-matter of inquiry was not of such character as to call for expert or opinion evidence, nor did it involve matters of fact which could not be detailed and described to the jury, nor was it impracticable to put the jury in possession of all the primary facts upon which the opinion of the witnesses was founded. Again, the questions embraced and called for the opinion of the witnesses as to the degree of diligence and care, which, under the circumstances, could or should have been exercised by plaintiff's men, the judgment of which matters was within the province of the jury and not the witnesses. We think plaintiff's objections to these questions ought to have been sustained. We see no ground upon which the rulings can be upheld.

Complaint is also made of the following charge on the question of an intervening cause: "Even the natural and probable consequences of a wrongful act or omission are not in all cases to be charged to the misfeasance or nonfeasance complained of. They are not thus to be charged where there is a sufficient and independent cause operating between the wrongful act complained of and the injury. If, after the commission or omission of the original act complained of, there intervenes an independent act of other persons, which, in itself, caused the injury complained of, then, in contemplation of law, the original act is interrupted and in law considered too remote, and the intervening act is considered the proximate cause." No complaint is made of the statement of the law in the abstract; but complaint is made that there is no evidence upon which such a charge could properly be predicated. There does not seem to be any evidence of an independent cause intervening between the alleged negligent acts of the defendant and the injury. The injury appears to be the result of the natural and proximate cause of the defendant's negligent act. Nothing is made to appear that the causal connection and continuous sequence of its acts were unbroken or interrupted by any new and efficient cause without which the injury would not have occurred. The only matter to which our attention has been directed as evidence of such a cause is based upon the answers made by the witnesses to the hypothetical questions just considered. But, as we have seen, such evidence does not tend to show an independent and intervening cause. The questions do not assume that plaintiff's men could have prevented the fire from reaching his property, or that they could have saved it after they had discovered the fire advancing towards it. The questions propounded called for, and the answers made thereto expressed, the opinion that some of the posts could have been saved had more attention been given to them and less to the haystacks. Whatever probative effect ought to be given such evidence, it cannot have the effect of proving an independent and intervening cause. There being no evidence upon which such an instruction could be based, it ought not to have been given. What we have said on this question in the case of Belnap v. Widdison (Utah) 90 Pac. 393, to a great extent, applies here.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment of the court below is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial. Costs to appellant.

ANDERSON v. MAMMOTH MINING CO.

(Supreme Court of Utah. Dec. 9, 1907.)

MASTER AND SERVANT—PERSONAL INJURIES—UNSAFE PLACE FOR WORK—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action by an employé for injuries, plaintiff testified that while oiling machinery in defendant's mill he stepped on an unfastened plank in a platform provided for oiling the machinery and was injured. The evidence warranted a finding that the plank was not fastened when laid, or that defendant by ordinary care could have discovered its unfastened condition prior to the accident, and should have fastened it. Held, that the court properly instructed that, if plaintiff's testimony was believed, the plank was a place furnished by defendant for plaintiff to work on; that it was defendant's duty to use ordinary care to make it reasonably safe; and that it was not reasonably safe, and by ordinary care it could have been made so, and plaintiff, while using ordinary care for his own safety while at work, was injured by reason thereof, the jury should find for plaintiff.

Appeal from District Court, Fifth District; Joshua Greenwood, Judge.

Action by Peter Anderson against the Mammoth Mining Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Edwards, Smith & Price, for appellant. Powers & Marioneaux, for respondent.

STRAUP, J. This is an action for personal injury, alleged to have been suffered by plaintiff through the negligence of the defendant. The defendant was engaged in the business of mining and milling. It maintained a number of vanners at its mill, which were operated by shafts, belts, and pulleys about 20 feet above the floor upon which the vanners stood. The plaintiff was in the defendant's employ. His duties were attending the vanners and oiling the shafts and other machinery. It was alleged that it was the duty of the defendant to provide and maintain a platform or walk to enable the plaintiff to move along the shafts and about the machinery in the performance of his duties; that the defendant's duty was not performed, in that it negligently suffered a plank of the walk to be and remain unfastened; and that the plaintiff, in the discharge of his duties, stepped on the unfastened plank and was precipitated to the floor below, a distance of about 20 feet. That there was a platform or walk provided by the defendant, and for the purposes alleged, is not disputed. Such walk consisted of two boards or plank laid side by side and fastened to the timbers or the framework of the building, and so extended along the shafts and other machinery above the floor. On behalf of plaintiff there is evidence tending to show that at the time of his injury one of the boards of the walk was, and for three or four days prior thereto had been, loose. Plaintiff's testimony also shows that in moving about from place to place oiling the shafts and other machinery he stepped on the loose board and was thrown to the floor of the building, and that prior thereto he was without knowledge of the loose condition of the board. On behalf of the defendant there is evidence tending to show that the plaintiff, at the time of his injury, was not making use of the walk, but was attempting to move about from place to place on the timbers, the framework of the building, and in doing so, slipped and came in contact with the belts. Among other things the court charged the jury: "(5) You are instructed that if the plaintiff had the choice of two or more ways of performing his duties, the one safe and the other dangerous, it was his duty both to himself and to his employer to select the safer way to perform his duty; and if, in selecting the safer way of doing his work, he proceeded in the manner attendant with greater risk, and as a result received the injury complained of in this action, and if he knew or ought to have known of the safer way to perform his duties, you will find for the defendant." "(7) You are instructed that the plank testified to by plaintiff, upon which he claims he was required to walk in order to do his oiling was, if his statement was believed by the jury, a place furnished by the defendant company upon which plaintiff was to do his work, and it was the duty of the defendant to use ordinary care to make it reasonably safe for the plaintiff to walk thereon in the manner that he was required to walk. If you believe from the evidence that it was not reasonably safe for that purpose, and that by ordinary care it could have been made reasonably safe, and that the accident happened because the plank was not made secure by nailing or otherwise, while plaintiff was properly walking thereon, in and about his work, and that the plaintiff was injured while using ordinary care for his own safety, then your verdict should be for the plaintiff in such damages as under the instructions given in the case you believe would compensate him for the injury sustained." Plaintiff had judgment. The defendant appeals.

It is urged by defendant that the court erred in giving instruction No. 7. The only reason given in support of the alleged error is that the evidence without conflict shows that "the board from which the plaintiff fell was not a place furnished by the defendant upon which plaintiff was to do his work"; that is to say, it is claimed the loose plank was not in the pathway, and was no part of the walk, and when the plaintiff stepped on the plank he was entirely outside of and away from the walk provided by the defendant. And the further contention is made that the defendant was not responsible for the unfastened condition of the plank. We must hold against the defendant on these contentions. If the testimony of the plaintiff is to be believed, the loose plank was in the pathway and a part of the walk provided and maintained by the defendant for the purpose of which the plaintiff was using it. The evidence is also sufficient to warrant a finding that the plank was not fastened when laid, or that the defendant in the exercise of ordinary care could have discovered the unfastened condition prior to the accident and ought to have fastened it. The instruction was therefore applicable to plaintiff's theory of the case. No error was committed in giving it.

It is further urged that the jury disregarded instruction No. 5. It is claimed the evidence, without conflict, shows that the defendant had provided a reasonably safe walk or platform, but instead of using it, the plaintiff chose a dangerous way of passing from place to place by moving along the timbers of the building. This is but presenting the same question in another form. If the plaintiff did what is assumed by the defendant, the verdict is not only contrary to the charge, but also to the evidence. If, however, the testimony of the plaintiff and his witness is true, he was using the walk; the loose plank was a part of it, and rendered the walk not reasonably safe; and plaintiff's injury resulted by reason of such condition, while he was in the performance of his duties. The claim made, upon which it is assumed there is no conflict, is not sustained by the record.

The judgment of the court below is therefore affirmed, with costs.

(152 Cal. 569)

Ex parte SMITH. (Cr. 1,428.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 16, 1907.)

1. HOLIDAYS—CRIMINAL LAW — SENTENCE — VOID SENTENCE—EFFECT.

A sentence pronounced on a legal holiday is void for all purposes, but does not have the effect of vacating the bench warrant under which the arrest was made on the filing of the information.

2. COURTS—OVERRULING OF PREVIOUS DECISION.

The construction of Const. art. 6, § 5, providing that the superior courts shall always be open, legal holidays and nonjudicial days excepted, by a decision of the Supreme Court as leaving the Legislature at liberty to allow or disallow the transaction of all or any class of judicial business on legal holidays, will not be set aside in deference to the supposed views of framers of the Constitution, expressed in the debate which took place when an amendment was offered to that section, providing that injunctions and writs of prohibition may be issued and served on legal holidays, which debate, it is claimed, shows that in the opinion of the members of the convention the part of the section first quoted positively prohibited the transaction of any judicial business on legal holidays, since the construction given by the decision is in evident accordance with the terms of the section, and, where there is nothing in the language of the members necessarily implying that they were actuated in supporting the amendment by any desire except to guard against a legislative enactment, forbidding all judicial business on legal holidays, and the decision was made after the Legislature had amended Code Civ. Proc. § 134, relating to the power of the courts to do business on holidays, to conform to their understanding of the Constitution, and the court, therefore, did but follow the contemporaneous construction by the Legislature.

3. HOLIDAYS—JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Code Civ. Proc. § 134, as amended March 19, 1907 (St. p. 681, c. 358, § 1), provides that no court other than the Supreme Court "must" be open on any of the holidays mentioned in section 10, except to give instructions to juries on their request, to receive a verdict or discharge a jury, or for the exercise of the powers of a magistrate in a criminal action, and that injunctions and writs of prohibition may be issued on any day. Previous to the amendment of 1907 the section read no court "shall" be open nor shall any judicial business be transacted, etc., provided that the Supreme Court and the superior courts shall always be open for the transaction of business, and that injunctions and writs of prohibition may be issued on any day. Among the holidays mentioned in section 10 is any day appointed by the Governor for a holiday. Section 133 provides that courts of justice may be held and judicial business transacted on any day except as provided in section 134. Section 135 provides that, if any day mentioned in section 134 happens to be the day appointed for the holding of a court or to which it is adjourned, it shall be deemed appointed for or adjourned to the next day. Held, that section 134 as amended March 19, 1907, still means what it has always meant, that the superior court shall not on a legal holiday transact any judicial business outside of the constitutional and statutory exceptions, notwithstanding the substitution of the word "must" for "shall"; and hence a sentence pronounced on a day appointed by the Governor as a legal holiday was void.

In Bank. Habeas corpus by John B. Smith against Carroll Cook, judge of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco. Prisoner remanded to the custody of the sheriff to await the further action of the superior court upon the verdict of the jury.

Milton Newmark, Charles A. Strong, and John Cotter Quinlan, for petitioner. W. H. Langdon, Dist. Atty., and William Hoff Cook, Asst. Dist. Atty., for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. The prisoner in whose behalf this proceeding was instituted, having been convicted of the crime of burglary, was arraigned for sentence on the 29th day of November last. He objected to the proceeding upon the ground that, the Governor having appointed that day a legal holiday, the court was without authority to perform any judicial act except those enumerated in section 134 of the Code of Civil Procedure. This objection was overruled, and the judge pronounced sentence, upon which a commitment was issued to the sheriff requiring him to deliver the prisoner to the proper officers of the state prison at San Quentin. The contention is that said judgment and commitment are void, and that the prisoner must be discharged. It does not by any means follow that the prisoner must be discharged if the judgment and commitment are void; for it appears from the return to the writ that on the filing of the information charging him with the crime of which he was found guilty a bench warrant was issued in the usual form under which he may be lawfully detained until it is superseded. The contention on the part of the prisoner that the sentence pronounced on November 29th is utterly void for the purpose of committing him to the state prison, but is nevertheless valid for the purpose of vacating the bench warrant, and ending the felony case, is illogical in the last degree, and finds no support in the decisions which he cites. In Ex parte Kelly, for instance (85 Cal. 154, 3 Pac. 673), it was not a question involved, and, of course, was not decided either expressly or by implication, that a judge by pronouncing a void sentence thereby deprives himself of the authority—otherwise unquestioned—to proceed in disregard of his void act to pronounce a valid sentence. It was not decided there, or in any of the cases, that a void act has any positive force in itself, or that a void judgment under which a prisoner could not be held would have the effect of vacating other valid process under which he could be held. The only point involved or decided was that a judgment of imprisonment unauthorized in part was wholly void, and could not be enforced as to the portion which the court was competent to pronounce. Upon that point it was overruled by the decision of this court in bank (In re Fli Kl, 80 Cal. 201, 22 Pac. 146), and in many cases since it has been uniformly held that a judgment of imprisonment for too long a time or including provisions not warranted by law could be enforced to the full extent of the power of the court to render it. The case of Ex parte Bernert, 62 Cal. 524, has no more bearing on the point to which it is cited than Ex parte Kelly, but that case, questioned in Ex parte Soto, 88 Cal. 626, 26 Pac. 530, was finally overruled by the unanimous decision of the whole court in Ex parte Joseph Reed, 143 Cal. 634, 77 Pac. 660, 101 Am. St. Rep. 138. Without further reference to the cases cited by counsel for petitioner, it is sufficient to say that there is no decision of this court which stands opposed to the plain and common-sense proposition that, if the sentence pronounced by Judge Cook on the 29th day of November was void for the reason that he was forbidden by the Constitution or statute to perform that judicial act on that day it is void for all purposes, and the prisoner is lawfully held to-day, as he was held prior to that time, under the bench warrant issued on the filing of the information, and subject to be again arraigned for judgment at any time when the court is competent to act.

But the prisoner is entitled in this proceeding to have it determined in what capacity and under what process he is lawfully held—whether under the bench warrant for arraignment for sentence, or under the commitment to the penitentiary, and this involves the construction of the constitutional and statutory provisions in respect to holidays and non-judicial days. The only constitutional provisions requiring consideration are contained in section 5, art. 6, and are as follows: (a) "They [the superior courts] shall be always open (legal holidays and non-judicial days excepted). * * *" (b) "Injunctions and writs of prohibition may be issued and served on legal holidays and nonjudicial days." The first of these clauses was considered, and the section construed in People v. Soto, 65 Cal. 621, 4 Pac. 664, where it was held that nothing was prohibited to the Legislature except the establishing of terms of court, during which alone judicial business could be transacted; the result being that full liberty remained "to allow or disallow the transaction of all or any class of judicial business upon legal holidays."

It is here contended that this construction was erroneous and would not have obtained if the attention of our predecessors had been called to the debate which took place in the constitutional convention, when an amendment embodying the clause marked "b" was offered to the section as originally proposed—a debate which it is claimed shows that in the opinion of the members of the convention the first clause, "a," standing alone, positively prohibited the transaction of any judicial business on a legal holiday. We are now asked, in deference to these supposed views of the framers of the Constitution, to reopen the question and set aside a decision which has been followed for nearly a quarter of a century. The reasons are very abundant for declining to do so. In the first place, the construction given to the section in People v. Soto is in evident accordance with its terms, and courts do not resort to the debates of a constitutional convention in construing a provision which is not, in its terms, ambiguous or uncertain. And, besides, when such resort is had to the debates, it is less for the purpose of learning the opinion of particular members upon points of verbal construction than for informing ourselves historically of the evil which it was intended to guard against, or the benefit to be secured. Upon these points the debates in and outside of the convention furnish us abundant information. The main object in view was not to hamper the courts by suspending their powers on holidays and during vacations, but to prohibit the Legislature from imposing such limitations in all but the excepted cases (legal holidays and nonjudicial days). On these days the Legislature was by the first clause left at liberty to authorize or forbid the transaction of any or all judicial business, and the only effect of the amendment proposed and adopted (clause "b") was further to restrict that liberty by prohibiting any law disabling the superior courts to issue and cause the service of writs of injunction and prohibition. Outside of these limitations the legislative power was left unrestrained. Moreover, there is nothing in the language of the two members of the convention whose language is quoted in this connection which necessarily implies that they were actuated in moving and supporting the amendment by any desire except to guard against a legislative enactment forbidding all judicial business on legal holidays. It is to be remembered, also, that People v. Soto was decided in September, 1884, nearly five years after the Legislature had amended section 134 of the Code of Civil Procedure to conform to their understanding of this provision of the then recently adopted Constitution. The court, therefore, did but follow the contemporaneous construction by the Legislature of a provision, the object and purpose of which was certainly familiar to the professional members of the Senate and Assembly. In view of the long and universal acquiescence which this contemporaneous legislative construction has commanded, we should not feel warranted, even if the question were new, in searching the debates of the convention for a construction of the Constitution not required by its terms, and inconsistent with legislation hitherto unquestioned.

Nothing, therefore, remains to be considered but the proper construction of section 134 of the Code of Civil Procedure as amended March 10, 1907. St. p. 681, c. 358, § 1. It reads as follows: "No court, other than the Supreme Court, must be open for the transaction of judicial business on any of the holidays mentioned in section 10, except for the following purposes: (1) To give, upon their request, instructions to juries when deliberating on their verdict; (2) to receive a verdict or discharge a jury; (3) for the exercise of the powers of a magistrate in a criminal action, or in a proceeding of a criminal nature. Injunctions and writs of prohibition may be issued and served on any day." Among the holidays mentioned in section 10 is any day appointed by the Governor for a holiday and the 29th of November was so appointed. The judge of the superior court in overruling the objection of the prisoner to the passing of sentence on that day based his construction of the section upon the fact that by the last amendment the word "must" in the first line had been substituted for the word "shall" as it had previously read. He concluded that the Legislature would not have changed the word unless the intention had been to change the meaning, and that, since the word "shall" had the effect of forbidding the court to open or transact ordinary business on legal holidays, the substitution of the word "must" was intended to relax that prohibition, so that, although the court could not be compelled to open on a holiday, it might nevertheless be opened if in the discretion of the judge it was deemed necessary that its ordinary business should proceed, without interruption. There is much force in this reasoning, and the rule of construction upon which it is based is unquestioned, but it is not of compelling force in all cases, and we think another explanation will better account for the general revision of the section as re-enacted by the last previous amendment. St. 1897, p. 15, c. 19, § 2. At that time it was made to read as follows: "No court shall be open, nor shall any judicial business be transacted on Sunday, on the first day of January, on the 22nd day of February, on the 30th day of May, on the 4th day of July, on the 8th day of September, on the first Monday of September, on the 25th day of December, on a day upon which an election is held throughout the State, or by the Governor of this State for a public fast, thanksgiving, or holiday, except for the following purposes: (1) To give, upon their request, instructions to a jury when deliberating on their verdict. (2) To receive a verdict or discharge a jury. (3) For the exercise of the powers of a magistrate in a criminal action, or in a proceeding of a criminal nature. Provided, that the supreme court and the superior courts shall always be open for the transaction of business, and provided further, that injunctions and writs of prohibition may be issued and served on any day." The imperfections and self-contradictions of this amendment were so glaring as to call loudly for a thorough revision, and, where so much was to be changed, it is not surprising that a word here and there should have been changed without intending to change the sense. On the other hand, we think it highly improbable that the Legislature, if actuated by the deliberate intention of making so radical a change in the powers and practice of the superior courts as is involved in the construction in question, would have left that intention to be gathered from language of such dubious import, when it could have been made plain and unmistakable by the addition of half a dozen words. We think it a safer construction to hold that the section still means what it has meant from the beginning, i. e., that the superior courts cannot upon a legal holiday transact any judicial business outside of the constitutional and statutory exceptions. In further support of this view it may be added that our construction is in harmony with, and gives effect to, sections 133 and 135 of the Code of Civil Procedure (which must be considered in connection with section 134), while the construction of the superior court renders them superfluous and unmeaning. They read as follows: Section 133: "Courts of justice may be held and judicial business transacted on any day except as provided in the next section." Section 135: "If any day mentioned in the last section happens to be the day appointed for the holding or sitting of a court, or to which it is adjourned, it shall be deemed appointed for or adjourned to the next day." At the hearing, Mr. Tum Suden, as a friend of the court, suggested the question whether the Legislature can delegate to the Governor the power to appoint a legal holiday. We have not felt at liberty to decide or discuss a question of such serious import when it has not been presented or discussed by any party to the proceeding. For the purpose of this decision, we assume that the Governor has the power to make the appointment, and our conclusion is that the judgment of the superior court is void.

The prisoner is remanded to the custody of the sheriff to await the further action of the superior court upon the verdict of the jury.

RILEY et al. v. NORTH STAR MINING CO.
(S. F. 4,041.)

1. MINES AND MINERALS—DEEDS—CONSTRUCTION.

A patentee of a mining claim executed a deed to plaintiff's predecessor in title conveying all that portion of the claim conveyed by the government to the patentee lying east of the west bank of a creek and west of the east line of such survey, being all that portion of the ground and mining claim embraced within the patent. The deed also recited that it was understood that it embraced only that portion of the claim surveyed, applied for, and included in the patent which was included in the Ford and Reilly survey outside of, etc., "together with all mining right, property, possession, claim, and demand whatsoever of the grantor of in or to the premises," "and every part and parcel thereof." Held, that such deed included all the grantor's mining right in the lands conveyed, and estopped such grantor and his successors in interest from subsequently claiming extralateral rights in such ground.

2. SAME—CONTRACT—CONSTRUCTION.

B. having applied for a patent for a mine. P. asserted ownership of a conflicting claim. To avoid an adverse suit a contract was made by which, in consideration of P.'s agreement not to file an adverse, B. on receiving a patent agreed to convey part of the land to P.; the contract providing that that portion of the ground embraced within lateral lines drawn easterly from the northeast corner of the Ford and Reilly location and the northeast corner of the Stockbridge location should be conveyed, it being understood that the agreement embraced only that portion of B.'s claim as surveyed and applied for and which was included in the Ford and Reilly survey outside and east of the actual lines and boundaries of that location. Held, that such contract did not indicate an intention that such conveyance should be of surface rights only, and hence was not in conflict with a deed conveying all of B.'s interest, including extra lateral rights in the ground described.

3. DEEDS—CONTRACT—VARIANCE.

Where a deed is unambiguous, it will govern the contract of sale in so far as the two are in conflict.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 16, Deeds, § 266.]

4. EVIDENCE—PAROL EVIDENCE—DEED.

When property is clearly conveyed by deed, the grantee's title cannot be disturbed by extrinsic evidence indicating that the grantor did not intend to convey such property.

Beatty, C. J., dissenting.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by George E. Riley and another against North Star Mining Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed and remanded.

The following is the opinion in department of McFARLAND, J., with whom HENSHAW and LORIGAN, JJ., concurred.

"This action was brought by plaintiffs as owners of certain mining ground and premises to recover judgment against defendant for the value of gold-bearing quartz rock alleged to have been wrongfully taken by defendant from said premises. By its answer defendant denied that it had wrongfully taken any rock from said premises; admitted that it had taken rock, which it avers was of no value, from beneath the surface of plaintiffs' mining ground; but avers that the rock so taken was from a lode or vein of quartz, the apex of which was within the surface ground of the adjoining mining claim of defendant, and which in its downward course dipped laterally under plaintiffs' ground, and that defendant had the right to follow said vein under the surface of plaintiffs' ground and extract rock therefrom. The case was submitted upon a stipulated statement of facts. The court held that upon the agreed facts the defendant had the right to do the acts complained of, because the rock taken was from a lode under the surface of plaintiffs' ground which had its apex in an adjoining mining claim of defendant and dipped laterally under plaintiffs' ground. Upon this theory objections were sustained to evidence offered by plaintiffs to show the value of the rock taken by defendant. A nonsuit was granted, and judgment rendered for defendant. From this judgment the plaintiffs appeal.

"The stipulated facts material to the determination of this appeal are those hereinafter stated. On April 12, 1876, the government of the United States issued its patent to James

K. Byrne for what was known and designated in the patent as the 'Massachusetts Hill Quartz Mine,' situated in Grass Valley mining district, Nevada county, Cal. The patent describes certain surface ground containing about 50 acres as designated in the official survey, which accompanied the application for the patent of said mine; also '2,138.4 linear feet of the said Massachusetts Hill quartz mine, vein, lode, ledge, or deposit for the length hereinbefore described throughout its entire depth, although it may enter the land adjoining'; and also any other veins, etc., throughout their entire depth, the tops or apexes of which lie within the exterior lines of the said survey within the end lines. The Massachusetts Hill quartz mine was a consolidation of several smaller claims which had been located before Congress had passed any statute concerning mining claims or patents. One of the consolidated claims was known as the 'Ford and Reilly' and another the 'Stockbridge.' On September 23, 1878, James K. Byrne, as party of the first part, conveyed by deed to James P. Pollard and others a part of the said Massachusetts Hill quartz mine. The descriptive words of the property conveyed are as follows: 'All and singular that certain portion of the Massachusetts Hill mine and mining claim conveyed by the government of the United States to the said party of the first part by the patent, dated April 12, 1876, and as shown by the survey and plat thereof contained and set out in said patent, which is contained and included within the following lines and boundaries, and which is described as follows, to wit: All that portion of said Massachusetts mining claim which lies east of the west bank of Wolf creek and west of the east line of said survey, being all that portion of said ground and mining claim embraced within said patent, and the survey upon which the same is founded, which lies outside of, or easterly from, that part of said Massachusetts Hill mine, known as the "Ford and Reilly location," as the same was located and claimed as "square claim," * * * It being distinctly understood that this conveyance embraces only that portion of the said Massachusetts Hill mine, as surveyed, applied for, and included in said patent, which was included in the "Ford and Reilly" survey outside of and easterly from the actual lines and boundaries of the "Ford and Reilly" square location, and shall not be so construed as to include any portion of the said Massachusetts Hill mine, so patented, which was heretofore known as the "Stockbridge location." * * * Together with all and singular the tenements, hereditaments, and appurtenances thereunto belonging, or in anywise appertaining, and the reversion and reversions, remainder and remainders, rents, issues, and profits thereof, also all the estate, right, title, interest, mining right, property, possession, claim, and demand whatsoever, as well in law as in equity, of the said party of the first part, or in or to the said premises, and every part and parcel thereof, with the appurtenances.' The land conveyed was a small strip, less than an acre. The words 'mining right' were not part of the printed form of deed used, but were written there by the grantor Byrne. Plaintiff afterwards became the successor in interest of said Pollard and others to the property conveyed by said deed, and defendant became the successor of Byrne in all of the Massachusetts mine not conveyed by said deed; and while the ownership of the two pieces of property was thus respectively in said parties, the defendant, through underground works, followed the Massachusetts Hill mine vein under the surface of the ground described in the said deed from Byrne, and took rock therefrom under the surface of the ground, and for the rock so taken this action is brought. Defendant contends that it had the right to work the Massachusetts Hill vein where it lay beneath the surface of the land conveyed by Byrne to Pollard and others; and plaintiff contends that the deed from Byrne conveyed all of the rock beneath the surface of the conveyed land. In our opinion, the contention of plaintiffs must be sustained.

"A good deal of respondent's brief is devoted to the discussion and elucidation of the principle in mining law and property that the owner of a quartz lode which has its apex in the surface grant has the right to follow and take rock from such lode wherever it goes in its downward course, though it dips and extends beyond his side lines. This principle must, of course, be accepted as beyond controversy. There is also considerable argument in confutation of appellants' position that the Massachusetts Hill mine is a consolidation of a number of 'square' locations, without extralateral rights. We will assume for the purposes of this decision that this contention of appellants is not maintainable, and that, under the United States patent to Byrne, all ordinary extralateral rights attached to the Massachusetts mine, and that the Massachusetts Hill lode had its apex in the surface not conveyed by the deed, and dipped easterly to the east side line of the Massachusetts surface ground. But, in the first place, it can hardly be said that the question of extralateral rights arises in this case, because there is no question here as to any rights existing outside of the Massachusetts Hill side lines, all rights involved being within those lines. Respondent seems to assume that the deed to Byrne of a part of the mine created new extralateral rights between the land conveyed and that not conveyed; but, assuming this to be so, the question is not what is the mining law as to extralateral rights, but what part of the Massachusetts mine was conveyed by the deed? There is nothing about the ownership of that part of a quartz lode which lies at a considerable distance below the surface and departs from the perpendicular more sacred than the ownership of that part of it which lies near or at the surface. Neither is inalienable. Under the patent Byrne owned all the surface of the Massachusetts mine as surveyed, and all the Massachusetts Hill lode which was within the surface between the apex and the east line of the surface ground, and he could have conveyed any part of that property. He could have conveyed the deeper part of the lode without conveying any surface ground; he could have conveyed part of the surface ground reserving all of the lode which was under it; and if he had simply conveyed surface ground without either mentioning or reserving rights under it, then there might have been a debatable question as to what a mere conveyance of surface ground conveyed. The conveyance, however, which he did make, was different from any above supposed, and the rights of the parties to this action depend entirely upon the meaning and effect of that conveyance.

"What, then, did the deed from Byrne to Pollard and others convey? It is to be noticed that there is no reservation on the face of the deed itself of any part of or rights in the property described as conveyed. There passed therefore to the grantees all property included in the descriptive language of the conveyance. That language is hereinbefore given in full, and we need only here refer to the most material parts of it. It conveys 'all and singular that portion of the Massachusetts Hill mine and milling claim conveyed by the government of the United States to said party of the first part by the patent dated April 12, 1870,' and 'all that portion of said Massachusetts mining claim which lies east of the west bank of Wolf creek and west of the east line of said survey, being all that portion of said ground and mining claim embraced within said patent'; and it also contains this passage, 'it being distinctly understood that this conveyance embraces only that portion of the said Massachusetts Hill mine, as surveyed, applied for, and included in said patent, which was included in the "Ford and Relly" survey outside of,' etc., together with all mining right, property, possession, claim, and demand whatsoever 'of the said party of the first part, of in or to the said premises, and every part and parcel thereof.' Now, what was the 'Massachusetts Hill mine and mining claim' conveyed by the government of the United States to the said party of the first part by the patent dated April 12, 1870? It included, as described in the patent, 'the Massachusetts Hill quartz mine' with certain described surface ground, and 2,133.4 linear feet of the said Massachusetts 'mine, vein, lode, ledge, or deposit.' Therefore, when Byrne conveyed to Pollard and others 'all that part of the Massachusetts Hill mining claim which lies east of the west line of Wolf creek, west of the east line of said survey,' etc., together with all 'the mining right, property, claim, and demand of the party of the first part, of, in or to the said premises, and every part and parcel thereof, with the appurtenances,' he clearly conveyed to the grantees all the property and right of every kind which he had in that part of the mine lying between the west bank of Wolf creek and the east line of the surface ground. A part of that portion of the mine lying east of the west bank of Wolf creek was that part of the Massachusetts Hill quartz lode which was within that boundary, and it was conveyed as completely as a deed of the whole Massachusetts Hill lode mine would have conveyed all the said mine. There was no language of reservation; and the words employed included every kind of property and right which the grantor had in that part of the mine mentioned. We do not attach quite as much importance to the words 'mining right' as is given it by appellants, for the previous language of the deed would have been clearly sufficient to include all the grantor's mining right in the land conveyed without the subsequent express use of those words. However, those words are in entire accord with the previous language, and, although not necessary, may be considered as having some significance as 'further assurances' of the thing granted. After a conveyance of all that part of the Massachusetts mine lying east of the line mentioned, together with all of the grantor's 'mining right' therein, there was surely nothing left to the grantor of that part of said mine. Of course, the previous language in a deed might be such as to limit the subsequent use of the words 'mining right'; but there was no language used in the deed here in question suggesting such limitation.

"Respondent contends that the deed should be construed in the light of certain facts and a certain preliminary contract between Byrne and the said Pollard. Those facts and that contract were as follows: After Byrne had made his application for a United States patent for the Massachusetts Hill mine said Pollard asserted the ownership of a mining claim called the 'Norwich,' which conflicted with a part of the Massachusetts claim as surveyed. Thereafter, to avoid the necessity of an adverse suit, a written agreement was entered into between Byrne and Pollard, by which Pollard agreed not to file an adverse claim, and Byrne agreed that after he had received a patent for the Massachusetts Hill mine he would convey a certain part thereof to Pollard. Respondent contends that by this contract Byrne was to convey only a part of the surface of the Massachusetts Hill mine, and was not to convey any part of the Massachusetts Hill lode lying under such surface, and that, therefore, the subsequent deed, whatever its language, is to be construed as not conveying any part of the Massachusetts Hill mine except such surface. But, in the first place, the said contract is by no means certain as to the precise property Byrne was to convey. It clearly contains no reservation of any underground rights. By the contract Byrne agreed to convey to Pollard 'that portion of said ground embraced within lateral lines drawn easterly from the northeast corner of the "Ford and Reilly location" and the northeast corner of the "Stockbridge location," respectively; it being distinctly understood that this agreement embraces only that portion of the said Massachusetts Hill mine as surveyed and applied for, which was included in the "Ford and Reilly" survey, outside of and easterly from the actual lines and boundaries of the "Ford and Reilly square location."' It thus refers to a part of the Massachusetts Hill mine as well as to the surface ground. Moreover, it may have been understood at that time that as the Ford and Reilly was a 'square' claim a conveyance of surface ground included all beneath it. At all events there was no absolute inconsistency between the contract and the deed which was afterwards executed. Moreover, if there had been any such inconsistency, the deed would prevail. In construing a written instrument, it is permissible to consider preceding facts and surrounding circumstances only when the instrument is itself ambiguous and uncertain. Where, as in the case at bar, the language used in the instrument in question is clear and certain, such language must govern. When property is clearly granted by a deed, the title of the grantee cannot be disturbed by extrinsic evidence tending to show that the grantor did not intend to convey such property. Of course, in a proper case and by a proper proceeding, a deed may be reformed or declared void on account of mistake or fraud; but there is no such issue in the case at bar.

"Counsel on each side have cited a number of authorities, but we do not deem it necessary to notice them at length, for they are not determinative of the question here involved, and deal with facts different from those of the case at bar. However, the views hereinabove expressed were substantially declared in the case of Central Eureka Co. v. E. Central Eureka Co., 146 Cal. 156, 79 Pac. 834, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 940. The question there was whether a conveyance of ground by metes and bounds carried a part of the Summit quartz mining lode, which dipped under it, and the court held that it did not. But the court said: 'unquestionably it would have been conveyed by any instrument purporting to grant the Summit quartz mining claim, or the Summit quartz mining ground, for it was part and parcel thereof.' Our conclusion is that the court below erred in sustaining objections to evidence offered by appellants to show the value of the rock taken from the mining ground by respondent, and in granting a nonsuit and rendering judgment for respondent. Upon the agreed statement of facts, if the rock taken by respondent from appellants' land was of any pecunitary value as gold-bearing quartz, then appellants were entitled to judgment for such value.

"The judgment appealed from is reversed, and the cause remanded, for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion."

Crittenden Thornton and John F. Riley, for appellants. Lindley & Elckhoff, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. After a reconsideration of this case in bank we are satisfied with the conclusion reached and the opinion delivered in department; and for the reasons given in said opinion the judgment appealed from is reversed, and the cause remanded, for further proceedings as directed in said opinion.

BEATTY, C. J. I dissent. The construction given to the conveyance under which the appellants claim can be upheld only by disregarding the radical difference between the relation of a mining claim to its surface description, and that which is included in the surface description of other lands. As to lands generally, a conveyance includes everything above and below the surface of the earth within vertical planes conforming to the surface lines, but this is not true of mining claims. The patent from the United States does not transfer to the patentee everything within the vertical planes extended downwardly through his end and side lines, and it does transfer things outside of such planes; viz., all parts of veins having their apices within his surface lines, though in their descent they are carried by their dip beyond the planes of his side lines. This is the effect of a patent for the entire claim; and when the patentee conveys a part of that claim described by surface lines, the necessary implication is that he reserves all that is embraced within the lines of that portion of the surface claim not conveyed, including the extralateral dip of all veins having their apices within the lines of the part so reserved. To give a deed for a part of a mining claim any other construction is to defeat the intention of the parties 99 times in 100, and the circumstances under which the deed in question here was given afford ample proof that in this case a construction is given to the deed which neither grantor nor grantee intended.

PEOPLE v. BOWMAN. (Cr. 62.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California.
Nov. 9, 1907.)

1. RAPE—ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO RAPE—EVIDENCE.

Evidence of force and violence accompanying an assault held sufficient to sustain a conviction of assault with intent to rape.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 42, Rape, §§ 78-82.]

2. SAME—INTENT—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Where an assault on prosecutrix was clearly proved, coupled with acts indicating a purpose to commit rape, whether such was defendant's intent was for the jury, though he abandoned his design and fled without accomplishing such purpose.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 42, Rape, § 87.]

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; F. E. Densmore, Judge.

Cornelius Bowman was convicted of assault with intent to rape, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Henry M. Willis, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and George Beebe, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

SHAW, J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of assault with intent to commit rape, and appeals from the judgment and an order denying his motion for a new trial.

Appellant urges a reversal upon the ground that the verdict is not supported by the evidence. The only testimony disclosed by the record is that of the prosecuting witness and her husband, and the sole question presented for consideration is whether or not this uncontradicted evidence is sufficient to establish a prima facie case of the crime charged against the defendant. No good purpose can be subserved by any extended reference to the evidence. The prosecuting witness lived with her husband in a tenthhouse consisting of two rooms. The defendant entered the same in the nighttime while both husband and wife were asleep. We may concede that he entered the room where the prosecuting witness was sleeping with her husband for the purpose of feloniously obtaining money. He was unable to obtain it, and it appears that he then formed the design to commit the crime with which he is charged. The uncontradicted evidence shows that in response to the defendant's demand for money the husband informed him that they had only 10 or 15 cents in the house, which was in a purse under his wife's pillow; that when she attempted to raise up to get it he placed his hand upon her throat, pushed her down upon the pillow, and said he didn't want it. He had a revolver which he thrust in the faces of both husband and wife, accompanying the exhibition with threats to kill them if they did not lie down and keep in place a blanket which he had thrown over their faces; that while thus intimidating them he clearly stated in the vilest language his purpose to have sexual intercourse with the wife, threw the bed covering from her body, and, notwithstanding her resistance, disarranged her nightdress, and repeatedly placed his hand upon her person; that the husband made his escape by jumping through a window, whereupon defendant abandoned his design and fled from the house. We cannot agree with counsel's contention that the evidence is wanting in proof that force and violence accompanied the attack. It would be difficult to conceive of an assault attended by force and violence of a greater degree than is disclosed by the evidence under consideration.

The assault being clearly proven, the intent with which it was committed becomes the vital element in ascertaining the nature of the offense, and the determination of this from all the circumstances and acts of the defendant is the peculiar province of the jury. "In such a case the intent is to be determined by and from the acts committed, and it is not for the judge, but for the jury, to say what particular intent follows from those acts." People v. Barker, 137 Cal. 557, 70 Pac. 617. And in People v. Johnson, 131 Cal. 511, 63 Pac. 842, the court in a similar case says: "As he did not have sexual intercourse with her, but did assault her, the question as to his intent was to be determined by all the circumstances and by the acts of defendant." To the same effect is People v. Webster, 111 Cal. 382, 43 Pac. 1114. Every act and circumstance surrounding the transaction is inconsistent with any inference other than an intent on the part of the defendant to use such force and violence as he might deem necessary to the accomplishment of his expressed purpose. The fact that he abandoned the undertaking when the husband escaped from his perilous position in no wise affects the case. People v. Stewart, 97 Cal. 240, 32 Pac. 8. We have carefully read and considered the cases cited in appellant's brief, all of which, however, are readily distinguished from the case at bar.

Judgment and order affirmed.

Ex parte JOHNSON. (Cr. 69.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California.
Nov. 2, 1907.)

1. INFORMATION — COMPLAINT — CONSTRUCTION—DUPLICITY.

A city ordinance made it unlawful for any person "to keep a saloon, bar," etc., "where any wine or intoxicating drinks were manufactured, sold, dispensed, or given away, or to manufacture, sell, dispense, or give away any such wine" etc., without first obtaining a license therefor. Held, that a complaint charging that defendant did "unlawfully keep a saloon, bar, etc., where liquors were then and there sold," and "did then and there sell, dispense, etc., malt beer, without first obtaining a license therefor," stated but a single offense, and was therefore not objectionable for duplicity, under the rule that where a statute enumerates a series of acts, either of which separately or all together may constitute an offense, all of such acts may be charged in a single count, because though each act may by itself constitute the offense, all of them together likewise constitute but one and the same offense.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 37, Indictment and Information, § 341.]

2. HABEAS CORPUS — SCOPE OF REMEDY — QUESTIONS INVOLVED.

While the inquiry on habeas corpus may extend to the question whether the complaint or information charges an offense known to the law, the objection that it is duplicitous will only be considered on appeal, and is not a ground for habeas corpus.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 25, Habeas Corpus, § 25.]

3. SAME.

Where the facts alleged in a criminal complaint state an offense, the writ of habeas corpus is unavailable regardless of how defectively or inartificially the facts are alleged.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 25, Habeas Corpus, § 25.]

4. SAME—CRIMINAL SENTENCE—FINE AND IMPRISONMENT—VOID PORTION OF JUDGMENT SEPARABLE.

A city ordinance prohibited the sale of liquors without a license, and provided a penalty of fine or imprisonment, or both. The minimum fine was $25, and the maximum $300. The maximum imprisonment was 150 days. A judgment directed that petitioner be imprisoned for 30 days in the county jail and pay a fine of $240, and if the fine be not paid on or before the termination of the 30 days, defendant should be imprisoned in the city jail until the fine should be satisfied, at the rate of one day's imprisonment for every $2 of fine, etc. Held, that the portion of the judgment imposing the imprisonment for nonpayment of the fine, if void, was separable, so that defendant was not entitled to his discharge on habeas corpus while the portion of the judgment prescribing imprisonment as a punishment was still in force.

5. CRIMINAL LAW—IMPRISONMENT—PLACE.

Where a judgment directed that petitioner be imprisoned for 30 days in the city jail, a return showing that by arrangement between the city and county, the latter had leased certain cells of the misdemeanor room of the county jail to be used as a city jail, and that the prisoner was confined in one of such cells, sufficiently showed that he was confined in accordance with the sentence.

6. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — CLASSIFICATION ACT—APPLICATION.

The municipal corporations classification act (St. 1883, p. 24, c. 17, § 2) prescribes a general method for the classification of cities according to the United States census, and section 3 as amended (St. 1899, p. 141, c. 102) provides how municipalities may cause an enumeration of the inhabitants to be taken for the purpose of an immediate reorganization as a municipality of a higher or lower class, pursuant to an election to reorganize in such other class under the general municipal corporation act, declaring that thereupon such proceedings shall be had and an election held as provided in the general law for the reorganization, incorporation, and government of municipalities. Held, that the proceedings specified in section 3 were only to be employed in the particular instances therein specified, and that such classification act was not restricted in its application to cities and towns organized under the general law, but was applicable as well to those organized under freeholders' charters.

7. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE—JUSTICES IN CITIES—CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS.

Const. art. 11, § 8½, providing that it shall be competent in all freeholders' charters to provide for the constitution, regulation, government, and jurisdiction of police courts, etc., did not indicate an intention to interfere with the legislative power to provide for a justice of the peace for cities and towns governed according to such charters.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 31, Justices of the Peace, § 2.]

8. SAME—CLASSIFICATION.

Justices' courts may be properly established in cities operating under freeholders' charters in accordance with the classification specified by Code Civ. Proc. § 103.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 31, Justices of the Peace, § 2.]

Application of Peter Johnson for writ of habeas corpus. Writ denied.

L. E. Dadmun, for petitioner. J. W. Puterbaugh, for respondent.

TAGGART, J. This is an application for a writ of habeas corpus. Petitioner is detained in the county jail of San Diego county under a commitment issued in execution of a judgment of the city justice of the peace of the city of San Diego. Petitioner was found guilty of violating the liquor license ordinance of that city (No. 2,341), making it unlawful for any person "to keep a saloon, bar," etc., "where any wine * * * or any intoxicating drinks are manufactured, sold, dispensed, or given away, or to manufacture, sell, dispense, or give away any such wine," etc., "without first having obtained a license therefor, as provided in this ordinance," etc. The complaint upon which the conviction was had charges that the petitioner did "unlawfully, then and there, keep a saloon, bar," etc., "where * * * liquors were then and there sold," etc., "and did then and there sell, dispense," etc., "to wit, malt beer, without first obtaining a license therefor," etc. Petitioner contends that the complaint states two distinct offenses, and that a general verdict on such a complaint is void.

If the authorities from other jurisdictions cited by appellant to support his contention hold as claimed, they do not declare the rule in this state. Compare State v. Pierce, 138 Mo. 34, 37 S. W. 815, with People v. Ellenwood, 119 Cal. 166, 51 Pac. 553. The selling of malt beer was but incidental to the keeping of the saloon or bar; and the proof that petitioner did then and there sell, dispense, and give away liquors would be but one way of showing that liquors were then and there sold, dispensed, and given away. Section 1 of the ordinance, which is the section alleged to have been violated, makes it an offense to keep a saloon where liquors are sold. The showing that liquors were sold was necessary to establish the keeping of the saloon in the manner declared by that section to be unlawful. All the acts mentioned were charged in the conjunctive, and all preceded the charge that such acts were done without first obtaining a license therefor. But one offense, therefore, was charged, and the complaint was good even against a demurrer for duplicity or misjoinder. People v. Dole, 122 Cal. 486, 55 Pac. 581, 68 Am. St. Rep. 50; People v. Eagan, 116 Cal. 287, 48 Pac. 120. Where a statute enumerates a series of acts, either of which separately or all together may constitute the offense, all of such acts may be charged in a single count; for the reason that, notwithstanding each act may, by itself, constitute the offense, all of them together do no more, and likewise constitute but one and the same offense. People v. Gusti, 113 Cal. 179, 45 Pac. 263; People v. Leyshon, 108 Cal. 440, 41 Pac. 480.

If the complaint were defective in the respect claimed, this would be a matter which could only be considered on appeal, and no relief could be afforded on this ground by habeas corpus. Ex parte Gibson, 31 Cal. 620, 91 Am. Dec. 546; Ex parte Long, 114 Cal. 159, 45 Pac. 1057. While the inquiry on habeas corpus may extend to the question whether the complaint or information charges an offense known to the law, since this objection goes to the question of jurisdiction (Ex parte Maier, 103 Cal. 476, 37 Pac. 402, 42 Am. St. Rep. 129), the proceeding may not be made to subvert the office of a demurrer or appeal; and if the facts alleged state an offense, no matter how defectively or inartificially they may be stated, or however confused and beclouded they may be rendered through intermingling them with immaterial or unnecessary averments, the writ will not lie. Ex parte Williams, 121 Cal. 328, 53 Pac. 706; Ex parte Harlan, 1 Okl. 48, 27 Pac. 920. Misjoinder of offenses in a complaint or information will not warrant a discharge on habeas corpus. 15 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, p. 175 citing In re Green, 134 U. S. 377, 10 Sup. Ct. 586, 33 L. Ed. 951.

The ordinance violated provides a penalty of fine and imprisonment, or both. For the former a minimum of $25 and a maximum of $300 are prescribed, and the maximum imprisonment is fixed at 150 days. The judgment is that petitioner be imprisoned for thirty days in the "City Jail," and pay a fine of $240, and if the fine be not paid on or before the termination of the 30 days' imprisonment, that he be imprisoned in the city jail "until the fine be duly satisfied, in the proportion of one day's imprisonment for every $2 of fine, and on the payment of such portion of the fine that shall not have been satisfied by imprisonment, at the rate above prescribed, that the defendant be discharged from custody."

It is urged on the authority of Ex parte Wadleigh, 82 Cal. 520, 23 Pac. 190, and People v. Hamberg, 84 Cal. 475, 24 Pac. 298, that the judgment is void. The case at bar does not come within the reason or facts of either of those cases. If we were to hold that the portion of the judgment providing that petitioner be imprisoned for nonpayment of fine were void (which we do not), we could not release the prisoner on this ground, as that portion of the judgment is severable from the rest. The portion of the judgment prescribing imprisonment as a punishment is now in force, and the petitioner cannot now be discharged, whatever may hereafter be his rights regarding the portion relating to the fine. Ex parte Mitchell, 70 Cal. 1, 11 Pac. 488. The cases construing section 1205 of the Penal Code are to be distinguished from cases in which the law (whether statute or ordinance) violated provides for imprisonment in case of failure to pay the fine where both fine and imprisonment are imposed. The ordinance here in question provides that both fine and imprisonment may be imposed as a penalty for one violation, "and in the event that the fine imposed hereunder is not paid then (be punished) by imprisonment * * * at the rate of one day for every two dollars of fine so imposed," etc. Ex parte Green, 94 Cal. 387, 29 Pac. 783; Ex parte Rosenheim, 83 Cal. 388, 23 Pac. 372; People v. Brown, 113 Cal. 85, 45 Pac. 181. The commitment was to the city jail, while petitioner is imprisoned in the county jail. By the return to the writ made by the chief of police of the city of San Diego, it appears that by an arrangement between the city of San Diego and the county of San Diego the latter has leased to the former five cells of the "misdemeanor room" of the county jail, to be used as a city jail, and that petitioner was confined in one of these cells. This portion of the county jail, then, to all intents and purposes, is the city jail of the city of San Diego. There is nothing in the claim that petitioner is not imprisoned in accordance with the sentence of the court.

The principal reliance of petitioner, however, is upon the contention that the city justice court of the city of San Diego before which he was tried has no legal existence. The city of San Diego is organized under a freeholders' charter, ratified by the Legislature, March 2, 1889. St. 1889, p. 643, c. 20. It has never availed itself of the authority given it by the adoption of section 8½ of article 11 of the Constitution to create a police court. The city justice court under consideration depends upon section 103 of the Code of Civil Procedure for its existence, and the classification of cities used for the legislation in this section is that provided by the "Municipal Corporations Classification Act of 1883" (St. 1883, p. 24, c. 17), as amended in 1901 (St. 1901, p. 94, c. 80). Under this classification, if applicable to it, the city of San Diego is of the third class. Henning's General Laws, p. 743. This act, petitioner claims, has no application to cities organized under a freeholders' charter, but appertains only to those cities and towns organized and incorporated under the general municipal corporations act of 1883. Henning's Laws, p. 744. To sustain this view he relies chiefly upon the language of section 3 of the classification act, as amended in 1899 (St. 1899, p. 141, c. 102), which provides how municipalities may cause an enumeration of the inhabitants thereof to be taken for the purpose of an immediate reorganization as a municipality of a higher or lower class. By this section provision is made for an election to reorganize in such higher or lower class under the general municipal corporations act, "and thereupon such proceedings shall be had and election held as provided in the general law for the reorganization, incorporation, and government of municipal corporations," etc.

Section 3, however, does not contain the only method provided for ascertaining the number of inhabitants of a city or town for the purpose of determining the class to which such city or town belongs. Section 2 prescribes the general method, to wit, by United States census, and the proceeding under section 3 is only employed in the particular instances therein specified. The proceeding under the latter section, then, was not necessary to the determination of the class to which the city of San Diego belonged. There is nothing in the title or the language of the classification act which confines the application to cities and towns organized under the general municipal corporations act. As amended in 1901, it contains a class which does not appear among those provided by the municipal corporations act, to wit, those having more than 100,000 and not exceeding 200,000 population which constitute the "first and one-half class." It is apparent, therefore, that the Legislature did not intend to restrict the use of the classification act to those cities and towns organized under the general law. All city justices' courts in the state, whether in cities with freeholder charters, or in those organized under the general law, are dependent upon section 103 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and therefore upon the classification act for a valid existence.

The legislation in this regard is based upon sections 1 and 11, article 6, of the Constitution. The latter section provides that the Legislature shall determine the number of justices of the peace to be elected in townships, incorporated cities and towns, and shall fix by law their powers, duties, etc. Under these provisions, the Legislature has created a state system of courts of which the court here under consideration is a member or branch. In doing this it has used the municipal classification act to avoid the objections urged in the cases cited by petitioner—Miner v. Justice's Court, 121 Cal. 264, 53 Pac. 795, and Ex parte Giambonini, 117 Cal. 573, 49 Pac. 732. In the former, an attempt was made to create a justice's court, and in the latter a police court, by special act. This it was held could not be done.

The classification act, made the basis of the legislation here in question, for that purpose is recognized as proper in a number of recent decisions of the Supreme Court. In re Mitchell, 120 Cal. 384, 52 Pac. 799. See, also, concurring opinion of Justice Henshaw (page 394 of 120 Cal., page 802 of 52 Pac.). It was frequently held before the adoption of section 8½ of article 11 of the Constitution, that such laws as section 103 of the Code of Civil Procedure constituted a valid exercise of the legislative power, and subdivision 1 of section 8½ shows no intention to interfere with the power of the Legislature in the matter of provision for justices of the peace for cities and towns. It is limited in terms to police courts. Graham v. Mayor (Cal.) 91 Pac. 147. No reason has been suggested why the classification in this act may not be made the basis of any necessary general legislation for all the municipal corporations in the state. Justices' courts being a part of the constitutional judiciary of the state, there appears to be some question whether it is necessary to classify them for the purpose of creating and establishing them as distinguished from prescribing their duties and jurisdiction (In re Mitchell, 120 Cal. 390, 52 Pac. 802); but, assuming a classification to be necessary, a classification by population for this purpose is in accord with the whole spirit of the Constitution, and is the method prescribed by that instrument for the classification of cities and towns, as well as counties. There being nothing in the language of the classification act restricting its use to cities and towns organized under the general law, we see no objection to its use by the Legislature in creating city justices' courts for all cities and towns of the state, including those acting under a freeholders' charter. The court in question, therefore, is a valid court, properly established by a general law.

Writ denied, and prisoner remanded to the custody of the chief of police of the city of San Diego.

TAXATION—COLLATERAL INHERITANCE TAX—REPEAL OF STATUTE—DISTRIBUTION OF ES-TATE WITHOUT PAYMENT OF TAX.

The right of the state to the tax, under the collateral inheritance tax act of March 23, 1893 (St. 1893, p. 193, c. 168), being, immediately on the death of a decedent, a vested right, which cannot be surrendered by the Legislature, the distribution of the estate which such act, as well as the repealing act of March 20, 1905 (St. 1905, p. 341, c. 314), the new collateral inheritance tax act, provides shall not be made till production of a receipt showing the tax has been paid, should be refused by the probate court, in the absence of such payment, whether or not a method for enforcing payment of the tax remains.

Appeal from Superior Court, Plumas County; John E. Raker, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of H. J. Lander, deceased. From an order settling the final account and from the decree of distribution, appeal is taken. Reversed.

L. N. Peter and U. S. Webb, for appellant.
Garrouette & Goodwin, for respondent estate.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Deceased died intestate in the county of Plumas on June 19, 1904, leaving him surviving two sisters, who were his sole heirs. On July 21, 1905, the administrator of his estate filed in the superior court of said county his final account and petition for distribution of said estate. On July 31, 1905, and prior to the hearing of said matter, the district attorney was notified by the county treasurer that the tax on collateral inheritance due from said estate had not been paid, and on the same day the district attorney filed in said matter and presented to the court his protest against the settlement of said account and the distribution of said estate until said tax was paid. No steps prior to said last-named date had been taken to collect said tax, and no part thereof had been paid. The court made its order settling the account and directing distribution of the whole estate without the payment of said tax. The appeal is from the order settling the final account, and also from the decree of distribution. The lower court held "that the act of March 23, 1893 (St. 1893, p. 193, c. 168), and the several acts amendatory thereof, had been repealed and there was no inheritance tax due or payable, and that there was no inheritance tax law in force by which any inheritance tax could be collected in said estate or ordered paid by the court." It would seem that the trial court held that the act of March 20, 1905 (St. 1905, p. 341, c. 314), which will be referred to as the repealing act, repealed the act of 1893 and destroyed the remedies provided in the latter act for the collection of taxes falling due thereunder prior to such repeal, applying the rule laid down in Napa State Hospital v. Flaherty, 134 Cal. 315, 66 Pac. 322. There is no brief filed by respondent, and we are without any assistance from him.

The facts here are substantially the same as in the recent case of Trippet v. State of California, 149 Cal. 521, 86 Pac. 1084, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1210; i. e., the deceased died before the act of 1905 went into effect, and no steps had been taken by the state to collect the tax imposed by the law in force at the date of the death. It was held in the Trippet Case, supra, affirming the doctrine laid down in Estate of Stanford, 126 Cal. 112, 54 Pac. 259, 58 Pac. 462, 45 L. R. A. 788, "that the right of the state to the tax under the law of 1893 is, immediately upon the death of the decedent, a vested right which cannot be surrendered by legislative act." The Trippet Case was an action to have determined that the property belonging to the estate of the decedent was not subject to any lien for taxes under the act of 1893, and acts amendatory thereof, imposing a tax on collateral inheritances. Such an action was authorized by the repealing act of March 20, 1905. In the Stanford Case it was held that to give retroactive effect to the amendatory act of 1897 (St. 1897, p. 77, c. 83) would be, in substance, if not in form, to turn over the fund in question belonging to the state to the appellants, and would be to make a gift or donation of the same which would conflict with the provisions of the Constitution prohibiting the Legislature from making any gift or donation of any public money or thing of value. The Attorney General makes the point that while the repealing act of 1905 purports to repeal the former act, it is but a re-enactment of the first, with certain amendments, and therefore only repeals so much of the original act as is inconsistent with it; that the provisions of the old act, which are carried into the later act without change, are to be considered, not as repealed, but as continued in force and to have been the law all along—citing Sutherland Stat. Con. (2d Ed.) §§ 237, 238, 273; Endlich on Int. of Stat. § 490 (Ed. of 1888), and cases supporting the text. And it is pointed out that section 8 of the act of 1893, which provides that the estate shall not be distributed until the administrator produces a receipt showing that the tax has been paid, is also found in section 11 (p. 345) of the repealing act of 1905. In reply to the anticipated contention that the repealing act contained no saving clause and repealed absolutely the original act, and therefore the state cannot recover the tax, it is claimed that the Legislature passed another act on the same day on the same subject (St. 1905, p. 374, c. 325), which furnishes the same protection that would follow from the insertion of a saving clause in the repealing act itself; that the two acts are in pari materia, and must be construed together as one act—citing People v. Jackson, 30 Cal. 428; Black on Int. of Laws, § 86; Smith v. People, 47 N. Y. 338, and other cases. The New York case above cited discusses at much length the doctrine contended for.

It is further contended by the Attorney General that the rule announced in Napa Hospital v. Flaherty, supra, does not apply to taxes—citing City of Oakland v. Whipple, 44 Cal. 303, where it was held that where taxes are levied under a law which is repealed by a subsequent act, unless it be made apparent by clear and unequivocal language that the repealing act was intended to have a retrospective operation, it will be inferred that the intent of the Legislature was that the taxes should be collected in accordance with the law in force at the time they were levied. To like effect are cited State v. Sloss, 83 Ala. 94, 3 South. 745; State v. Certain Lands, 40 Ark. 38, and other cases. And finally it is contended that if the Legislature contemplated by the two acts of 1905 to give to the heirs of decedent the 5 per cent. of the estate which had previously vested in the state of California, such legislation would be obnoxious to section 31, article 4, of the Constitution. Estate of Stanford, supra; Trippet v. State of Cal., supra.

There is much force in these contentions. We think, however, that it is not necessary to pass upon all of them. In the Trippet Case it was claimed, among other things, that the repealing act of 1905 left a bare right in the state without any constitutional means of enforcing it. The court said: "The plaintiff comes into court seeking, as against the state, a determination that it has no right to any tax. The state is not here seeking affirmative relief against the plaintiff. The judgment merely denies plaintiff the decree sought by him, declaring that the defendant has no right to any tax. Since, as we have seen, the defendant has a vested right to such tax, an adjudication that the estate is free from any claim for such tax would be manifestly improper. Whether or not there remains a legal method of collecting the tax will be a question for decision when the state seeks to enforce its right." The court then shows that the plaintiff cannot, in the action, quiet his title without paying the claim of the state; that the case is analogous to that of a mortgagor who seeks to quiet his title against a mortgagee, where the right to foreclose is barred by the lapse of time, which he may not do without paying the amount due on the mortgage. It seems to us that the principle of that case should apply here, though the question arises in another form of action or proceeding. If, as was held in the Trippet Case, the right of the state vested at the death of the decedent, the state had a property interest in the estate which could no more be taken and given to an heir than could the interest of one heir be taken without his consent and given to another. The decree of distribution was entered August 2, 1905. The repealing act went into effect July 1, 1905, so that when the petition for distribution was filed (July 21, 1905), and when the decree was entered, the statute (section 11 of the repealing act) provided that the estate shall not be distributed until the administrator has produced a receipt showing payment of the tax. The court, then, by its decree not only deprived the state of a vested right, but in doing so proceeded in disregard of the plain provisions of the existing statute. The action of the court was doubtless based upon the erroneous assumption that the repealing act took away or was a renunciation of the right of the state, and hence it was unnecessary for the administrator to exhibit a receipt showing payment of a claim that had no legal existence. But we have seen that the right of the state to 5 per cent. of the estate vested at the death of the decedent, and that the Legislature had no power, if it had intended to do so (which is by no means conceded), to make a donation of this interest in the estate to the heirs of the decedent, by the indirect means of repealing the act under which the right vested. It seems to us quite clear that if the administrator in this case or the heirs of the decedent could not have the title to the estate quieted, without first paying the tax, as was decided in the Trippet Case, it would be a reproach to the law that would allow them to accomplish this result by proceedings in probate. But the decision of the Trippet Case rests, not alone upon the equitable form of the action, but also upon the principle that it would be inequitable to allow recovery against the state at all.

It is not within our province to suggest the steps necessary for the state to take should it seek affirmatively to enforce payment. But that the entire estate cannot be distributed to the heirs without payment of the collateral inheritance tax being first made we have no doubt. The final account sets forth that the balance of the estate on hand is money, except a mortgage note of $200, and that the estate is in condition to be closed. We do not understand that any objection is here made to the allowance and approval of the final account except as it may be affected by the question disposed of in this opinion. Before, however, the final account can be said to show that the estate is in condition to be closed, it should appear therefrom that the collateral inheritance tax has been paid.

The order settling and allowing the final account and the decree of distribution are reversed.

PEOPLE v. HO SING. (Cr. 101.)

(Court of Appeal, First District, California.
Nov. 11, 1907.)

1. ROBBERY—ELEMENTS OF OFFENSE—INFORMATION.

Under Pen. Code, § 211, providing that robbery is the felonious taking of personal property in the possession of another from his person or immediate presence and against his will, accompanied by force or fear, an information charging that the property was taken from prosecutor's presence, but failing to charge that it was taken from prosecutor's possession, was fatally defective.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 42, Robbery, § 22.]

2. LARCENY—INFORMATION—ELEMENTS OF OFFENSE.

Under Pen. Code, § 484, defining larceny as the felonious stealing, taking, carrying away, of the property of another, an information charging that accused, from the immediate presence of prosecutor, by means of force and against prosecutor's will, did take, steal, and carry away certain property of the value of $1,026 of the personal property of prosecutor, was sufficient as an information for larceny.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 32, Larceny, §§ 94, 95.]

3. INDICTMENT—CONVICTION.

Where an information was sufficient to charge larceny, but was insufficient to charge robbery, and the court instructed exclusively on the theory that defendant was being prosecuted for robbery, for which offense he was convicted and sentenced, the judgment must be reversed.

4. SAME—FORMER JEOPARDY.

Accused was informed against for robbery. The information was insufficient to charge that offense, but did charge larceny. Defendant was tried, convicted, and sentenced for robbery. Held, that defendant having been once in jeopardy for the offense of larceny under such information could not be again tried therefor on reversal on the erroneous conviction of robbery.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 14, Criminal Law, § 396.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; William S. Wells, Judge.

Ho Sing was convicted of robbery, and he appeals. Reversed. Defendant discharged.

Nathan C. Coghlan, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for the People.

KERRIGAN, J. The defendant was informed against, tried and convicted of the crime of robbery, and was sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison for the term of 20 years.

The charging part of the information is as follows: "The said Ho Sing * * * did then and there, * * * from the immediate presence of one Chung Kee, * * * by means of fear and against the will of the said Chung Kee, take, steal and carry away" certain property of the value of $1,026.00, "of the personal property of said Chung Kee." To this information a demurrer, general and special, was interposed, which was overruled. The argument by appellant on the demurrer is chiefly addressed to the point that the information does not state facts sufficient to charge the crime of robbery. We think the argument is sound. "Robbery is the felonious taking of personal property in the possession of another, from his person or immediate presence and against his will, accomplished by means of force or fear." Pen. Code, § 211. It will be observed that the information fails to set forth one of the essential elements of the crime of robbery as defined in this section, in that it does not aver that the property was taken from the possession of Chung Kee. Had it been alleged in the information that the property was taken from his person, an allegation of possession, while expedient, would not be imperative, for, in that case, it would be apparent that the property was in his possession at the time it was taken. It does not necessarily follow, however, that because the property when taken was in the immediate presence of Chung Kee that it was in his possession. For example, it might have been in possession of lessee or pledgee. In the case of People v. Walbridge, 123 Cal. 274, 55 Pac. 902, the Supreme Court, speaking of an information for robbery, said: "The information alleges that the money was taken 'from the person and immediate presence of Victor Finster.' If it was taken from the person of Victor Finster, it must be assumed that it was in his possession at the time it was taken. It was so held in People v. Shuler, 28 Cal. 490. If the information had only alleged that the money was taken from the immediate presence of Victor Finster, then an additional allegation would have been necessary to the effect that it was at that time in the possession of Finster; but the allegation that it was taken from his person renders the allegation as to possession in him not absolutely necessary. It may be conceded that it would have been better pleading to have directly alleged the possession of the money to have been in Finster, but, under the circumstances here disclosed, we deem the information sufficient in the absence of such allegation."

While the information in the case at bar does not aver facts necessary to charge the crime of robbery, it does allege facts sufficient to charge the crime of larceny. "Larceny is the felonious stealing, taking, carrying away, * * * the property of another." Pen. Code, § 484. Upon comparing the information with this section it at once appears that the information has every element necessary to charge the crime of larceny.

The respondent objects to the consideration by this court of the ruling on the demurrer by the trial court, because to that ruling there is no exception presented by a bill of exceptions. Disregarding this technical point, and passing on the merits of the demurrer, it is our opinion that the information in substance and form is good as charging larceny, and that the trial court committed no error in overruling the demurrer thereto.

On this information the defendant could have been tried and convicted of larceny, but he was tried on the theory that the information properly charged robbery. The court instructed the jury exclusively on that theory, the jury found him guilty of robbery, and he was sentenced for that crime. The result is that the defendant was charged with the crime of larceny, and was convicted of the higher crime of robbery. It follows that the judgment must be reversed. It is so ordered. And it appearing that the defendant has been once in jeopardy (People v. Arnett, 129 Cal. 306, 61 Pac. 930), and that a new trial would be a useless proceeding, it is further ordered that the defendant be discharged from custody.

Appeal from Superior Court, Siskiyou County; J. S. Beard, Judge.

Judicial settlement of the estate of Mary Elizabeth Conroy, deceased, by Frank M. O'Connell, administrator de bonis non. From a decree distributing the estate to John F. Quinn, Anthony Bernard Conroy appeals. Affirmed.

William Hoff Cook and Taylor & Tebbe, for appellant. James F. Farrahar, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. This is an appeal by Anthony Bernard Conroy from the decree of the superior court of Siskiyou county, made and entered November 10, 1906, making final distribution of said estate.

It appears that Frank M. O'Connell, respondent, as administrator of the estate of Mary Elizabeth Conroy, deceased, on October 20, 1906, filed his final account, together with a petition for the distribution of said estate. At the hearing it appeared, as shown by the decree of the court, that Bernard Conroy, to whom letters of administration were issued in said estate, died pending administration, and said Frank M. O'Connell was duly appointed administrator de bonis non; that the sole estate belonging to decedent consisted of a house and lot in the town of Dunsmuir, being lot 5 in block 10; that Bernard Conroy was the father of Mary Elizabeth Conroy, deceased; that the mother of Mary Elizabeth had died previous to the death of the latter; that Mary Elizabeth was a single woman and died intestate, and that Bernard Conroy was her sole heir; that due notice to creditors was given by said Bernard, as such administrator, before his death, and no claims were presented against the estate of Mary Elizabeth, and no property of any kind was received by said O'Connell, as administrator, other than $202.50 advanced by John F. Quinn to pay the costs of administration; that all taxes, state, county, and municipal, together with all costs and charges against said estate of Mary Elizabeth, deceased, have been fully paid, and the estate is in condition to be closed; that Bernard Conroy, on April 21, 1905, by deed, granted said lot to said John F. Quinn, by virtue of which said Quinn "succeeded to the distributive right thereto of said Bernard Conroy, deceased"; that said final account "be and the same is hereby settled, allowed, and approved as submitted; that the said real estate so comprising the estate of Mary Elizabeth Conroy, deceased, be and the same is hereby distributed to said John F. Quinn, as successor in interest of said Bernard Conroy, deceased."

It does not appear from anything in the record that appellant is the son and heir of Bernard Conroy, or the brother of Mary Elizabeth; there is nothing but his notice of appeal to show any relationship of appellant to either of the above-named persons. It appears from the petition for distribution that Mary Elizabeth was the daughter of Bernard Conroy; that she was a single woman and died intestate; whose mother had died before her death, which would make Mary Elizabeth's father her natural heir. Appellant's kinship, if any, would be to Bernard, whose estate, so far as appears, was not administered upon. The issue is not presented by the record. If there is any imperfection in the deed to Quinn, the rights of appellant, Anthony Bernard Conroy, must be first asserted in proceedings to administer the estate of Bernard Conroy, deceased.

Upon the merits of the matter, however, appellant's contention cannot be maintained. He relies on the claim that the deed of Bernard Conroy to Quinn was as administrator. The deed reads: "This indenture, made the 21st day of April, 1903, between Bernard Conroy (administrator of the estate of Lizzie Conroy) of Dunsmuir," etc. The deed is signed "Bernard Conroy," and is acknowledged: " * * * Personally appeared Bernard Conroy, known to me to be the person described in and whose name is subscribed to the within instrument, and acknowledged to me that he executed the same." There are no recitals in the deed showing that it was intended to be a deed by Bernard in his official capacity, as administrator, except as above appearing. The words in parenthesis are surplusage, and must be disregarded. They are repugnant to the terms of the deed, which in all other respects show it to be the deed of Bernard Conroy individually. Willcoxson v. Sprague, 51 Cal. 640. As Bernard's grantee, Quinn was entitled to have distribution made to him. Code Civ. Proc. § 1678.

It is claimed that distribution should have been to the heirs of Bernard Conroy, inasmuch as he was then deceased; "that his heirs (this appellant, as a son, being one) were entitled to have the estate distributed to them, and their title became vested on the death of their father"—citing Gutter v. Dalmore, 144 Cal. 665, 79 Pac. 383. But if appellant be an heir of Bernard, we have no proof of it in the record, and, besides, the only way to establish heirship would be by proceedings in probate. Furthermore, Bernard Conroy in his lifetime conveyed to Quinn, and at his death he had no interest in the property, and hence his heirs, if he had any, took no interest.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. NEGLIGENCE—SETTING FIRES—EVIDENCE.

Evidence in an action for the burning of plaintiff's barn by fire, alleged to have been communicated to it from fires started by sparks from a fire set by defendant, during a dry season, to brush on a two or three acre tract, between which and plaintiff's property was a strip of green timber 750 feet wide, and a creek 40 feet from water's edge to water's edge and 80 feet from bank to bank, held to authorize a finding of negligence in setting the fire.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 37, Negligence, §§ 267-273.]

2. SAME.

Where fire negligently set by one on his premises is carried to that of his neighbors, it is incumbent on him to do all that can reasonably be expected of a man in such situation to prevent injury coming from said fires to the property of the neighbors.

3. SAME—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

The finding that plaintiffs, whose barn was burned by fire communicated to it from fires started by sparks from the fire negligently set by defendant on his premises, were guilty of contributory negligence in putting personal property back in their barn, when they thought danger from the fires was passed, is not necessarily inconsistent with the allowance to them of damages from the burning of the barn and hay therein, neither of which could be readily removed.

Mount, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Whatcom County; Jeremiah Neterer, Judge.

Action by William Ulrich and wife against Thomas H. Stephens. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Newman & Howard and Fred Llewellyn, for appellant. Crites & Romaine and Fairchild & Bruce, for respondents.

ROOT, J. This action was brought by respondents to recover damages for loss of a barn and personal property therein by fire alleged to have been negligently set and allowed to spread by appellant. The respondents own and occupy the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 5, township 37 N., range 5 E. W. M. Appellant has the entire north half of the same quarter section, while the southwest 40 thereof is owned by one William R. Stephens. Near their west line, and about 900 feet south of the appellant's south line, was situated respondents' barn above referred to. A little west of due north of respondents' barn, and just within his south line, appellant had a slashing consisting of fallen trees and brush piled in heaps covering an area of two or three acres. Between this slashing and respondents' barn was a strip of green timber about 750 feet in width and a creek measuring about 40 feet from water's edge to water's edge and about 80 feet from bank to bank. Appellant set fire to his slashing shortly before 1 o'clock p. m. on August 21, 1906. There had been no rain for nearly two months, and everything in that vicinity was very dry. Appellant offered testimony to the effect that on the afternoon of August 20th and the forenoon of August 21st thunder was heard in the distance and there were appearances of rain. At the time the fire was started there was little, if any, wind. Later a north wind sprung up which increased in force to such an extent that sparks, embers, and particles of burning moss were carried southward across the creek and dropped upon respondents' premises, starting fires in many places where they happened to drop upon dry stubs, logs, brush, or other combustible material. Some of these particles, coming either from the original fire, or from small fires started therefrom, alighted on and around respondents' barn, and respondents, assisted by neighbors, fought against and extinguished many of these small fires that threatened the barn on this afternoon and evening. Respondents remained up a large part of that night watching and fighting the fire, but finally retired, believing that their premises were out of danger. On the next day the fire smouldered in logs and stubs on the lands west and north of respondents' place, and several small fires were claimed by respondents to have been extinguished by them near their barn on this day. There were a few dead snags and stubs, including one about 150 feet tall, to the northwest about 120 feet from respondents' barn, in which fires smouldered all day on the 22d. On the evening of that day respondents, believing that the barn was no longer in danger, replaced therein certain movable property which they had taken out when they regarded the barn in danger. Respondents retired about 11 o'clock that night, and were awakened about 4 in the morning by the burning of their barn. There was not very much wind at this time, and it could not be told with much certainty as to where the sparks came from that ignited the barn, if ignited thereby. The case was tried without a jury. The trial judge found that the appellant was negligent, and held him liable in damages for the value of the barn and the hay therein contained. He refused to allow a recovery for the personal property which the respondents had removed from the barn during the day and replaced on the evening before the barn burned, holding that they were guilty of contributory negligence in replacing this property in the barn under the circumstances. From the judgment entered, this appeal is prosecuted by the defendant.

The appellant claims that no negligence is established as against him, that he had a right to set the fire, and that his manner of managing it after it was set was not such as to charge him with negligence. The setting out of a fire is not in itself an act of negligence. In a country like this, where it is necessary to clear land and burn brush and stumps thereupon, it is appropriate that fires should be employed at proper times and under suitable conditions; but when we remember that this appellant started this fire at a time when there had been no rain for nearly two months, and when much of the surrounding neighborhood contained combustible material that could be readily ignited by the sparks that would naturally fly from the burning of such a large amount of brush, we cannot say that the trial court was in error in adjudging the defendant guilty of negligence. The defendant may possibly have believed that it would soon rain, and he doubtless relied much upon the strip of green timber and the creek to prevent the fire spreading in the direction of respondents' premises. He, however, knew there was no certainty of rain, and he must have known that the burning of so much brush would tend to increase the wind and scatter sparks to a long distance from the location of the fire. This happened, and many fires were started upon the premises of respondents and their neighbor to the westward. These fires endangered respondents' premises on the 21st, and there were numerous places still burning or smouldering all day on the 22d. Appellant claims that the violence of the wind was unexpected, and could not reasonably have been anticipated; that he had no reason to suppose that the wind would blow hard enough to carry the sparks across the green timber and creek. There was evidence, however, to show that many of the sparks ignited the particles of moss, stumps, and other combustible material among the green timber and burned in numerous places therein. Having seen that the fire had been carried from his premises over to that of his neighbors, it was incumbent upon him to do all that could be reasonably expected of a man in such situation to prevent any injury coming from said fires to respondents' property. The evidence did not convince the trial court, and does not convince us, that he did so.

It is strenuously urged that the finding of the trial court that the respondents were guilty of contributory negligence in replacing in their barn on the evening of the 22d the personal property which they had theretofore removed when in fear of a fire is inconsistent with the allowance to the respondents of damages for loss of the barn and the hay therein contained. We do not think that it is necessarily inconsistent. Neither the barn nor the hay therein could be readily removed. As to the other property, it could be and was removed, but was replaced under conditions which the trial court did not believe justified its return, although the danger was not so imminent as to require respondents to stay up all night watching the barn. It therefore declined to allow them any recovery for that property which would not have been destroyed had it not been so returned to the barn.

There is considerable conflict in the evidence, especially upon matters of opinion as given by the various witnesses. While the finding of the trial court or judge in a case tried without a jury does not stand as a verdict, and is not to the same extent binding upon this court, yet, in the face of a conflict of evidence, this court will recognize the fact that the trial court, in being able to see and hear the witnesses personally, has advantages which this court does not have, and will not disturb the finding of the lower court unless well satisfied that it was in error. We are not so convinced in this case.

The judgment will therefore be affirmed.

MOUNT, J. I think the evidence fails to show that the fire which destroyed respondents' barn originated from the fire set out by appellant, or from any negligence of appellant. I therefore dissent.

McLEAN v. LESTER et al.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Jan. 9, 1908.)

1. JUDGMENT—DEFAULT JUDGMENT—PROCESS TO SUSTAIN—SERVICE BY PUBLICATION—SUFFICIENCY.

Where a summons is attempted to be served by publication, but as published it notified defendants to appear within 60 days after date of first publication, to wit, within 60 days after December 23d, without showing the year, the summons was too indefinite and uncertain to support a judgment of default.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 30, Judgment, §§ 25-33.]

2. SAME.

The summons in a proceeding to foreclose a delinquent tax certificate should state the time within which the defendants were required to appear, and if it fails to do so, it is insufficient. Hence, where a summons served by publication required defendants to appear within 60 days after the date of the first publication, and the day and month only of the first publication were stated, the date of the newspaper or of issuance of the certificate of delinquency would not be sufficient to make the summons definite, since the date of the newspaper is not a part of the summons, and the date of the certificate of delinquency does not indicate the time when the action is brought.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 30, Judgment, §§ 25-33.]

Appeal from Superior Court, King County; A. W. Frater, Judge.

Action by Christine McLean against Letsette E. Lester and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

William C. Keith, for appellants. Ira A. Campbell, for respondent.

MOUNT, J. This action was brought by the respondent to set aside a judgment foreclosing a delinquent tax certificate, and also a tax deed based thereon. Upon a trial a judgment was entered as prayed for in the complaint. The defendants appeal.

It is necessary to notice but one of the questions presented, because upon that question alone the judgment appealed from must be affirmed. It appears that in the proceedings to foreclose the delinquent tax certificate service was attempted to be made upon the defendants by publication. No other service was made. The summons, as published in that case, notified the defendants "to appear within 60 days after the date of the first publication, to wit, within 60 days after the 23d day of December, in the above-named court, and defend this action, or pay the amount due, together with costs, and in case of your failure so to do the plaintiff will apply for a judgment foreclosing the lien of said taxes and costs against the real property above described. G. W. Tracie, plaintiff. Daniel Lamson, attorney for plaintiff. Room 9, Roxwell Block, City. First publication December 23, —71." Upon this summons a judgment of default was entered, and the lot in question sold. The summons did not state the year when the defendants in that action were required to appear. Under repeated rulings of this court this summons was too indefinite and uncertain to base a judgment of default upon. Owen v. Owen, 41 Wash. 642, 84 Pac. 606, and cases there cited.

Appellants argue that the date of the newspaper and the fact that the certificate of delinquency was issued in the year 1904 are sufficient to make the summons definite. The date of the newspaper is no part of the summons, nor does the fact that the certificate of delinquency was issued in the year 1904 necessarily show that the case was brought in that year. The summons itself should state the time within which the defendants were required to appear. It did not do so, and was therefore insufficient.

The judgment appealed from must therefore be affirmed.

LANGE v. RESERVATION MINING & SMEETING CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Jan. 6, 1908.)

CORPORATIONS — DISPOSAL OF CORPORATE PROPERTY — POWER OF CORPORATION TO CONVEY.

The trustees of a corporation formed to buy, sell, and deal in mines, with the ratification of the majority of the stockholders, may, as against the objection of the minority stockholders, sell mining property belonging to the corporation.

Appeal from Superior Court, Spokane County; Henry L. Keenan, Judge.

Action by H. Lange against the Reservation Mining & Smelting Company and others. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Wakefield & Witherspoon, for appellant.
A. D. McLaren, for respondents.

FULLERTON, J. The respondent the Reservation Mining & Smelting Company is a corporation, and the other respondents are the trustees thereof. The respondent corporation was incorporated September 1, 1898, one of the objects for which it was formed being to "buy, sell, * * * and deal in mines." Shortly after its organization the corporation purchased a group of claims, known as the "Lone Star & Washington Consolidated Lode Mining Claims," situated on what was then the Colville Indian Reservation, entered into possession of the same, and between that time and March 10, 1902, expended thereon some $56,481.53 in development work, in an effort to make the mine a paying investment, the result being that there was extracted from the mines ore of the value of $1,090.46. After March 10, 1902, no further effort was made to operate the mines. On June 1, 1903, the board of trustees entered into a contract for the sale of the mines, together with the machinery and tools used in operating the same, the same being all of the property owned by the corporation, for the sum of $50,000. On July 30, 1907, at a special meeting of the stockholders, called for that purpose, the matter of the sale was submitted to such stockholders for ratification or rejection. At such meeting stockholders representing more than two-thirds of the outstanding stock voted to ratify the sale, while stockholders representing 6,500 shares, among whom was the appellant, voted against ratification. Immediately after the adjournment of the meeting this action was brought to restrain the corporation and the trustees thereof from carrying into effect the contract of sale. The trial judge, at the hearing of the case, ruled that the trustees, with the approval of stockholders owning more than two-thirds of the stock of the corporation, could make the sale, even against the dissent of minority stockholders, and dismissed the appellant's action. This appeal was taken therefrom.

It is the contention of the appellant that neither the trustees nor a majority of the stockholders of a corporation have power against the objection of minority stockholders to sell or otherwise dispose of the entire property of the corporation, where no necessity exists for such action, such as the payment of legitimate debts, the prevention of further losses from a losing business, or such like causes. Unquestionably this was the rule of the common law as applied to a corporation organized to carry on a particular business, when such sale would have the effect of thwarting the purposes for which it was organized, and destroying the corporation itself, and especially was it true where the purposes of the sale were to "freeze out," or otherwise deprive the minority stockholders from further participation in the profits of the business conducted by the corporation. Thels v. Spokane Falls Gas L. Co., 34 Wash. 23, 74 Pac. 1004; Parsons v. Tacoma Smelting & Refining Co., 25 Wash. 492, 65 Pac. 765.

But in the case before us the sale does not disrupt the corporation, nor is it contrary to the purposes for which the corporation was formed. On the contrary, the corporation will be in as good a condition to proceed with the objects it was formed to promote after this sale as it was before, and the sale will be but fulfilling one of its objects and purposes. Whether the sale is wise or not from a business point of view is not the question. It is a question of power in the board of trustees. And this power exists, we think, both by virtue of the articles of incorporation, and the general law conferring the management and control of the corporate business on the board of trustees. Pitcher v. Lone Pine-Surprise, etc., M. Co., 39 Wash. 608, 81 Pac. 1047.

2. SAME—PERSONS LIABLE—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

In an action against an individual and a corporation, who occupied a storeroom, for injuries sustained by a customer of the individual who fell through an open trapdoor, it appeared that the door was on the side of the store not used by the corporation, and that while the corporation had goods stored in the basement, which was reached by the door, and occasionally used the same, it had no control over it other than a mere license. It did not appear how long the door had been open, nor who left it open, and there was no evidence that any one connected with the corporation was in the store at the time of the accident. Held, that the evidence was insufficient to show liability on the part of the corporation.

Appeal from Superior Court, Spokane County; E. H. Sullivan, Judge.

Action by Emma F. Stone and another against the Smith-Premier Typewriter Company and another. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed as to the former defendant, and reversed and remanded as to the other.

Samuel R. Stern, for appellants, J. D. Campbell, for respondent Smith-Premier Typewriter Company. S. P. Domer, for respondent Ida M. Buckley.

ROOT, J. Appellants brought this action to recover damages for personal injuries received by Emma F. Stone in falling down a trapdoor stairway leading to a basement underneath a storeroom occupied by respondents, on the south side of Riverside avenue, in the city of Spokane. At the close of plaintiffs' evidence, the case was dismissed as to both the defendants. From the judgment of dismissal, this appeal is taken.

Respondent Buckley occupied the west side of the storeroom with millinery goods. The east side was occupied by the typewriter company, with desks and typewriting machines and material. At the rear of the store was a workroom used by Mrs. Buckley. This room was entered through a door on the west side covered by portieres. A counter extended along the west side of the store, and between the same and the portieres was a trapdoor which, when raised, left an opening 27 inches wide and 8 feet long. The south end of this opening extended beyond the outer line of Mrs. Buckley's counter about 14 inches. The following diagram will show substantially the situation at the time of Mrs. Stone's injury.

- 1—Where Mrs. Stone fell down stairway. The distance from the trap-door to partition was 14 inches.
Dotted Line—Mrs. Stone's course down aisle.
2—Where clerk stood showing hats.

Mrs. Stone entered the store, and stopped at the counter to look at some hats. After standing there some time, she passed on to another counter at the rear of the store next to the workroom. In so doing she passed by the trapdoor. She did not see the trapdoor or opening, and testifies that she had never seen them and did not know of their existence, although she had traded in the store at various times during the past four years. While looking at hats at the rear of the store, she stepped back to make room for a clerk who was reaching over for a hat, and in doing so stepped into the opening and fell down the stairway, sustaining severe injuries. The trial court took the view that Mrs. Stone must have seen, or might have seen, the opening, and that she was therefore guilty of contributory negligence, which defeated her right of action. We are unable to reach this conclusion as a matter of law. We think that, under the circumstances shown, it was for the jury to say whether or not she was guilty of negligence. The law requires a storekeeper to maintain his storeroom in such a condition as a reasonably careful and prudent storekeeper would deem sufficient to protect customers from danger while exercising ordinary care for their own safety. A customer entering a store of this character is required to use that degree of care and prudence which a person of ordinary intelligence, care, and prudence would exercise under the same circumstances. As to whether Mrs. Stone exercised that degree of care and prudence in this instance is a question upon which we think reasonable minds might differ. This being true, it became a question of fact for the jury. We think the facts herein shown clearly distinguish this case from that of Dunn v. Kemp & Hebert, 36 Wash. 183, 78 Pac. 782, which is relied upon by respondents.

It is urged, however, that the judgment should be affirmed as to the typewriter company, and we think this contention must be upheld. The trapdoor opening was upon the side of the store used by Mrs. Buckley. While both she and the typewriter company had goods stored in the basement, and occasionally used the trapdoor opening, yet it does not appear that the typewriter company had any control over the trapdoor other than a mere license to go down the opening when necessary. It does not appear how long the trapdoor had been open, nor who left it open at the time of this accident, which occurred between five and six in the afternoon. Mrs. Stone testified that she did not see any one in the part of the store occupied by the typewriter company, and there is no evidence that any one was there at that time. We do not think the evidence establishes any liability against the company.

The judgment of the honorable superior court will be affirmed in so far as it affects the typewriter company, and reversed and remanded for further proceedings in so far as it affects the respondent Buckley.

SHIPLEY et ux. v. GAFFNER et ux.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Jan. 6, 1908.)

1. TAXATION—TAX FORECLOSURE—NATURE OF PROCEEDINGS.

Proceedings for tax foreclosure are in rem, and not against the person of the owner; hence owners are bound to take notice of the property they own, pay taxes thereon, and defend against foreclosure for delinquent taxes, even though the property is assessed to unknown owners, or to other persons.

Appeal from Superior Court, King County; R. B. Albertson, Judge.

Action by F. K. Shipley and wife against W. T. Gaffner and wife. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Elias A. Wright and F. C. Kapp, for appellants. Eugene A. Childe, for respondents.

MOUNT, J. This action was brought by appellants against respondents to recover possession of certain real estate in King county, which respondents claim under a tax deed, and also to remove the cloud thereby created. The general demurrer interposed to the amended complaint by respondents was sustained. Appellants elected to stand on their complaint, and an order of dismissal was entered, from which this appeal was prosecuted.

The amended complaint alleged that appellants acquired the fee-simple title to said property in November, 1889; that they have continued to be the sole owners and entitled to the exclusive possession thereof ever since; that the tax rolls in the office of the county treasurer for the years 1891-92-93-94 show that appellant F. K. Shipley as owner had duly paid the taxes for those years before delinquency; that in the tax rolls for the years 1891, 1892, and 1896 to 1902, both inclusive, said property was assessed to appellant F. K. Shipley, he being designated therein as the owner thereof; that in preparing the tax rolls for the year 1895, the county officials carelessly and negligently failed to insert the names of appellants as owners of said property, and left the space provided therefor blank, although each of said officials well knew, or by the use of reasonable diligence could have ascertained, that the appellants were the owners thereof; that on January 31, 1898, at which time the rolls of all the prior years were in his office, the treasurer of said county issued to the county a certificate of delinquency against said property for the taxes of the year 1895, amounting to $2.20; that he carelessly and negligently neglected to name appellants as the owners of said property in the certificate, the space provided therefor having been left blank, although he well knew, or by the use of reasonable diligence could have ascertained, that appellants were the owners of said property; that he thereafter filed such certificate as the complaint in an action to foreclose the same; that neither of the appellants was named as a party to said action, or attempted to be served with any process whatever; that in the published summons, which was the only process served or attempted to be served on the appellants in said action, appellants were not named at all, said property being designated therein as belonging to unknown owners, although the county treasurer well knew, or by the use of reasonable diligence could have ascertained that the appellants were the owners thereof; that thereupon a decree of sale was entered, and said property was advertised to be sold as belonging to unknown owners; that in November, 1902, a treasurer's deed was issued to respondent W. T. Gaffner, under which respondents claimed title to said property; that neither of appellants had any actual or constructive knowledge of said proceedings until August, 1906; that said property is worth $1,000; that a proper tender of all taxes, penalties, interest, and costs had been made prior to the commencement of this action, which tender was refused; that by virtue of said matters the tax deed under which respondents claim title to said property was void and constituted a cloud upon the title of appellants.

The main question in the case is, may the county foreclose for delinquent taxes against property assessed to unknown owners, if the taxing officers knew, or by reasonable diligence could have ascertained, the names of the real owners? We have repeatedly held that these tax foreclosure proceedings are in rem, and not against the person of the owner, and that owners are bound to take notice of the property they own and pay the taxes thereon and defend against foreclosure for delinquent taxes, even though the property is assessed to unknown persons or to other persons. Rowland v. Eskeland, 40 Wash. 253, 82 Pac. 599, and cases there cited. In reference to the assessment of real estate, the statute in force at the time the assessment in this case was made provided: "The assessor shall make out in the detail and assessment list book, in numerical order, complete lists of all land or lots subject to taxation, showing the names of the owners, if to him known, and if unknown, so stated opposite each tract or lot." Section 1699, Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. There is nothing in this language which requires the assessor to use diligence to ascertain the names of the true owners. If he knows, he must show them; but if unknown to him, he may so state. We think the officer's statement is conclusive upon the question. The statute providing for a certificate of delinquency requires a stub, "which shall be a summary of the certificate, and shall contain a statement—(1) description of the property assessed, (2) year or years for which assessed, (3) amount of tax and interest due, (4) name of owner or reputed owner, if known." Section 1749, Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. This clearly refers to the name of the owner as stated on the assessment roll, and does not require the treasurer to draw upon his own knowledge or to examine other records to determine the actual ownership or the reputed ownership. The treasurer is simply a ministerial officer who exercises his duty in issuing these certificates, and no negligence can be charged against him when he follows the record as it appears in his office. It is true we said in Rowland v. Eskeland, supra: "We held in Spokane Falls, etc., R. Co. v. Abitz, 38 Wash. 8, 80 Pac. 192, that the notice is sufficient, where it is given to the person appearing as owner on the treasurer's rolls when the certificate is issued." And to the same effect we quoted from the same case in Carson v. Titlow, 38 Wash. 196, 80 Pac. 299. We also said in Rowland v. Eskeland, at page 258 of 40 Wash., page 601 of 82 Pac.: "It follows that the actual ownership of the property is immaterial in these foreclosure proceedings, so long as the owner described in the certificate, and to whom the property was assessed, is given notice of such proceedings." The idea in these cases was that the treasurer was only required to state in the certificate the person to whom the property was assessed as the same appeared on the assessment rolls in the year when the taxes were delinquent. Some of the language used might upon careful analysis be construed as meaning that the treasurer was authorized or required to state the name of the owner which appeared on the rolls at the date of the certificate; that particular question was not under consideration in those cases, and we did not mean to decide questions which were not involved therein. We are of the opinion, however, that the treasurer might, under the statute, state the name at either time, and that a foreclosure based thereon would be sufficient. It is certainly sufficient where he states the name as it appears on the rolls as the property was assessed. In this case the fact that the name of the owner was left blank amounted to a statement that the owner was unknown. In view of the rule that these proceedings are in rem, and that owners are bound to take notice of the taxes against their property, the fact that the taxing officers knew, or by reasonable diligence could have learned, the true ownership, does not invalidate the tax or foreclosure proceedings, where the property is assessed to unknown owners.

The lower court therefore properly sustained the demurrer, and the judgment must be affirmed.

NORTH PACIFIC LUMBER CO. v. CARROLL et al.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Jan. 7, 1908.)
SALE—DELIVERY—EVIDENCE.

The uncontradicted testimony of plaintiff's president that after the alleged delivery of lumber, the price of which is sued for, and after the rendering of an account therefor, he had a talk with one of the defendants, in which such defendant admitted that the lumber had been received, and that the account was correct and would be paid, and that subsequently a payment was made thereon, is sufficient evidence of delivery.

Appeal from Superior Court, King County; Mitchell Gillilan, Judge.

Action by the North Pacific Lumber Company against John D. Carroll and another. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. E. Crews and Wheeler & Skeel, for appellants. W. C. Bristol and Hastings & Stedman, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The respondent brought this action in the court below to recover a balance alleged to be due for lumber sold and delivered to the appellants. The answer admitted the contract, but denied that the lumber had been delivered as alleged. Upon a trial the court found that the lumber had been delivered by the respondent to the appellants, and used by them to the amount of $2,415.27, upon which there was paid $500, leaving a balance of $1,915.27. Judgment was entered for that amount. The defendants appeal.

The only claim made upon this appeal is that there is no evidence to sustain the finding that the lumber was delivered to appellants as alleged. The record shows that the president of the respondent company had a talk with one of the appellants after the lumber had been delivered, and after an account had been rendered therefor, and that the said appellant admitted in this conversation that the lumber had been received, and the account was correct and would be paid, and that subsequently $500 was paid. There was other evidence; but this was enough to base the finding upon, especially since there was no evidence offered by appellants, and no effort made to contradict these statements.

The judgment must therefore be affirmed.

WIKSTROM v. PRESTON MILL CO.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Jan. 6, 1908.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT—INJURIES TO SERVANT — DUTY TO INSTRUCT INEXPERIENCED SERVANT.

It is the duty of a master to instruct an inexperienced servant in the operation of a cut-off saw, and warn him of the dangers incident to its use.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, § 314.]

2. TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—CHARGE CORRECT AS A WHOLE.

It is not essential that a single instruction should embody the entire law of the case, but it is sufficient if the charge as a whole fully covers it.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 46, Trial, §§ 703-717.]

Appeal from Superior Court, King County; Arthur E. Griffin, Judge.

Action by Oscar Wikstrom against the Preston Mill Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Shauk & Smith, for appellant. Higgins, Hall & Halverstadt, and Walter S. Fulton, for respondent.

RUDKIN, J. On the 2d day of February, 1906, the plaintiff was injured while operating a cut-off saw in the defendant's shingle mill at Preston, in King county. This action was instituted to recover damages for the injuries thus received, and from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff the defendant has appealed.

The negligence charged in the complaint is that the respondent was young and inexperienced, and was unfamiliar with the operation of cut-off saws; that the appellant, well knowing these facts, negligently ordered the respondent to operate a cut-off saw, without instructing him as to the proper use of the saw, or warning him against the dangers incident thereto; that the shingle bolts supplied were too large for the saw; that the saw was dull, rusty, unguarded, etc. The answer consisted of a denial of the negligence charged, and a plea of contributory negligence. The shingle bolts in question were approximately 4 feet in length, and it was the duty of the respondent to cut them into blocks 16 inches in length, by means of the cut-off saw. In the progress of this work the respondent had cut two blocks off a bolt, and was engaged in cutting the stub end off the third block, with his right hand on the stub, which was from 6 to 9 inches in length, when the saw kicked back, and his hand in some manner came in contact therewith, causing the loss of the greater part of the hand, including the thumb and first two fingers. There was a conflict of testimony on all material facts in issue, and we must assume that the jury found that the respondent was inexperienced and was not instructed as to the proper use of the saw or warned against the dangers incident to such use. The appellant meets the respondent on this broad ground, and contends that the dangers incident to the use and operation of the cut-off saw were open and apparent to any person of common understanding, and that neither experience, instruction, or warning was necessary. This in a measure is true. Every person who has attained years of discretion knows that a saw will cut and mangle, and that if the operator voluntarily comes in contact therewith injury will of necessity result. But this is largely true of all circular saws, and yet it is a matter of common knowledge that the dangers incident to their use and operation are manifold and great. The danger from voluntary contact with the saw is not the only danger to guard against. There is also the danger from involuntary contact, brought about from improper use of the saw. We think it clearly appears from all the testimony in this case that some instruction, at least, is requisite to qualify one to operate even a cut-off saw, and that there are dangers from involuntary contact that experience and instruction will in a measure ward against. The trial judge and jury saw the respondent, and heard his testimony. They were in a better position to judge of his ca-capacity and the necessity for the instruction and warning than we are, and we think their conclusion on the facts should not be disturbed.

Exception was taken to one of the instructions given by the court, because it left out of consideration the questions of contributory negligence and assumption of risk. The court could not well embody the entire law of the case in a single charge, and other instructions fully covered these questions. Taken as a whole, the charge was eminently fair to both parties; and, finding no error in the record, the judgment is affirmed.

VICTOR SAFE & LOCK CO. v. O'NEIL et al.
(Supreme Court of Washington. Jan. 6, 1908.)

1. EVIDENCE—COMPLETE WRITTEN CONTRACT—EVIDENCE OF COLLATERAL AGREEMENT.

Where a written order addressed to the seller's home office in Cincinnati, and subject to the approval of that office, recited that it contained all the agreements between the parties, and that any verbal agreements not embodied therein were waived, evidence of a verbal agreement that shipment was to be made from Portland, Or., immediately upon receipt of the order at that place by the seller's agents, who had taken the order, is incompetent.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 20, Evidence, §§ 2035, 2036.]

2. SALES—CONTRACTS—DELAY IN PERFORMANCE—"AS SOON AS POSSIBLE."

Defendants ordered a safe from plaintiff to be shipped "as soon as possible." Upon receipt of the order plaintiff had no finished safes on hand, but rushed to completion one in process of manufacture, using all proper diligence, and shipping it 19 days after receipt of the order. It appeared that the customary time for filling an order by the manufacture of a new safe was 30 days. Held, that the shipment was a substantial compliance with the order.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 43, Sales, § 219.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 1, pp. 523-529.]

3. SAME—WITHDRAWAL OF OFFER—ACTS CONSTITUTING WITHDRAWAL.

After a firm had ordered a safe, they wrote the seller that unless the safe was the equal or superior of any safe made they would not accept it, and again that they had made an investigation and found that they could not accept the safe unless the seller would submit it to a test as to its burglar-proof qualities. Held, that the letters were mere conditional threats to withdraw the order, and not a withdrawal in law; since there was voluntarily left for further investigation ground for dispute as to facts that might have required a judicial determination to settle before it could be definitely known whether defendants would or would not withdraw.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 43, Sales, § 45.]

4. SAME.

A withdrawal of an offer to contract must be a distinct, unequivocal, and unconditional statement of the party's withdrawal, such as to leave no doubt that further relations between the parties on the subject are at an end.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 43, Sales, § 45.]

5. SAME—REMEDIES OF SELLER—ACTION FOR PRICE.

An order for a safe, to be paid for partly in cash, and partly by exchange of an old safe, was accepted and filled, but the purchaser did not accept the safe, and did not pay the cash price nor deliver the old safe in exchange, and the new safe was held subject to the purchasers' orders. Held, that the seller could recover the full purchase price.

Appeal from Superior Court, Spokane County; Wm. A. Huneke, Judge.

Action by the Victor Safe & Lock Company against B. F. O'Neil and another, copartners. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Gallagher & Thayer, for appellants. Happy & Hindman, for respondent.

HADLEY, C. J. This is an action to recover the purchase price of a bank safe. Plaintiff is a corporation with its home office at Cincinnati, Ohio, and the defendants are copartners, under the firm name of the "Bank of Latah," doing business at Latah, Wash. The complaint alleges that in consideration of the sum of $1,400, to be paid in the manner hereinafter specified, the plaintiff agreed to sell and deliver to the defendants f. o. b. car at Latah, Wash., one Victor manganese steel screw door bank safe; that the defendants agreed to purchase and receive the safe, and to pay the plaintiff the said sum of $1,400, as follows: To deliver to plaintiff, upon compliance of the latter with said contract, one double-door Hall safe, with burglar-proof chest, f. o. b. car at Latah, Wash., and to pay the plaintiff the sum of $950 cash. It is further alleged that the plaintiff fully performed all conditions imposed upon it by said contract, and delivered to defendants at Latah the Victor safe mentioned in the contract, but that the defendants have refused to deliver to plaintiff the Hall safe mentioned, or to pay said sum of $950, or any other sum. Based upon the above allegations, the plaintiff brought this suit to recover the full sum of $1,400, the purchase price of the safe. The defendants answered that about September 18, 1905, one Marcellus, the representative of Glass & Prudhomme, the agents of plaintiff at Portland, Or., visited the defendants at Latah, and solicited them to purchase a safe from the plaintiff through said agents; that in order to induce the defendants to make the purchase, said Marcellus represented that Glass & Prudhomme had a safe then at Portland, which they could ship immediately from Portland to the defendants; that the defendants were anxious to obtain the immediate delivery of any safe they might purchase, and made such fact known to said Marcellus and to said agents, and that they would not purchase any safe that could not be delivered immediately; that relying upon said representations, and believing that the plaintiff had a safe in Portland which it could and would ship to the defendants immediately, they placed the order for the purchase of the safe from plaintiff. It is alleged that the plaintiff did not deliver said safe within a reasonable time or at all, and that defendants never accepted the safe mentioned in the complaint. The cause was tried by the court without a jury, and resulted in a judgment against the defendants for the full purchase price of the safe with interest. The defendants have appealed.

Appellants have assigned a number of specified errors; but the appeal involves the one question, whether the judgment is justifiable under the facts. The order from appellants for a safe is shown by the evidence as follows: By a partly printed and partly written instrument, which is designated as "Specifications Victor Manganese Steel Screw Door Bank Safes," upon the same page of which heading follow detail specifications of a safe as to size, materials, and workmanship. On the next page, or reverse side of the sheet containing such specifications, appears a written order for a safe of which the following is a copy: "The Victor Safe and Lock Company, Cincinnati, Ohio—Gentlemen: Please furnish us in accordance with the foregoing specifications one No. 49 Victor Manganese Steel Screw Door Bank Safe, carefully packed and delivered f. o. b. cars at Latah, Wash. Bill to the Bank of Latah, Latah, Wash. Ship as soon as possible via freight. On receipt of same in good condition will pay to your order the sum of fourteen hundred dollars as follows: Nine hundred & fifty dollars ($950) in current funds & one (1) double door Hall safe with burglar proof chest f. o. b. Latah, Wash. This contract covers all of the agreements between the parties hereto, and all claims for verbal agreements of any nature not embodied herein are waived, and order is taken subject to the approval of the Cincinnati office of the Victor Safe & Lock Company. All orders must be on this blank. Witness my hand and seal this 25th day of Sept. 1905. Bank of Latah. [L. S.] Wm. A. McEachern. [L. S.]" It will be seen that the order refers particularly to the said specifications, was made by the appellants, and was addressed to the plaintiff at its home office in Cincinnati. It expressly declares that it contains all the agreements between the parties, that all claims for verbal agreements of any nature not embodied in the writing are waived, and that the order was subject to the approval of the Cincinnati office of the plaintiff. Thus the appellants solemnly said, over their own signatures, that the writing contains the whole contract between the parties, and that any further verbal agreements were waived. By their answer, and by evidence received at the trial, they, however, sought to show a verbal agreement that the safe was to be shipped from Portland, Or., immediately upon the receipt of the order by Glass & Prudhomme. By the terms of the written order such evidence became incompetent, it being evidence entirely inconsistent with the written order. The order not only made no mention of such agreement as to immediate shipment from Portland, but in effect negated the existence of such agreement, for the reason that it was addressed to the respondent at its Cincinnati office, and was expressly made subject to the approval of that office. The evidence shows that, in the regular course of transmitting mail from Portland to Cincinnati, at least four days are required, a fact which the appellants must be held to have had in view at the time they made the order.

The evidence shows that the order was forwarded at once by Glass & Prudhomme to the Cincinnati office of respondent; that there were no finished safes in stock at the time; that the customary time for filling the order by the manufacture of a new safe was about 30 days; that respondent immediately directed that a safe which was then in process of manufacture should be rushed to completion for the purpose of filling this order; that this was done, and the safe was finished and shipped to appellants 19 days after receipt of the order. The evidence clearly shows that all possible diligence was exercised by respondent to fill the order under the circumstances as they existed at the time the order was received. Appellants urge that they were not required to wait until a safe could be manufactured, and that they were entitled to immediate shipment when the order was received. Their order did not call for immediate shipment, but said, "ship as soon as possible." We have seen that the shipment was made as soon as possible under the existing circumstances, and under such general directions as to shipment, in the absence of more definite specifications as to time, we think the shipment which was made was a substantial compliance with the order. To be sure an unreasonable lapse of time could not be held to have been within the spirit of the order, but the time here was not unreasonable, considering the circumstances. Pending the manufacture and shipment of this safe as aforesaid, no correspondence was had directly between respondent's home office and appellants, and the latter contend that they were not advised that respondent had accepted the order, for which reason they say it was not in law accepted so as to make a contract before the time when appellants claim that they withdrew their order. The answer does not allege any withdrawal of the order before acceptance, and that subject was not introduced by the pleadings; but, in view of the evidence, we will examine that subject. The order was in fact immediately acted upon by respondent, as we have seen, and it at once set about filling it. This was followed by actual shipment and the arrival of the safe at Latah as requested in the order. Whatever may be said as to whether there was such an acceptance as made a completed contract prior to the arrival of the safe at Latah, it must in any event be held that there was a complete acceptance when the safe reached Latah, and, unless appellants had in legal contemplation theretofore withdrawn their order, the contract became complete, and they were bound by the terms of their written order. Was there such a withdrawal? Before the shipment was made the appellants addressed to Glass & Prudhomme, at Portland, the following communication: "It has been brought to our notice that the safe we ordered from you through Mr. Marcellus is not the article we understood we were getting, and that was represented to us at the time the proposition was made us which led up to the order. Our order was given on the representation that the Victor Safe was the best in the world, in the sense that it was the most burglar proof and would stand the most severe attack that could be made on it, and to be the equal or superior of any safe made, the manganese steel safe and all the rest of them included. We will look into this matter a little further, but now write to advise that if we are not getting the strongest and best safe made we are not getting what we ordered and what was represented to us in the sale, and will not receive it if such be the case." Later the following was also addressed by appellants to the same persons: "We addressed you on October 8th a letter in regard to safe ordered from you and advising you that if we found upon investigation that this safe has been misrepresented to us that we would refuse to accept it. We have had no reply to this letter, and now write to advise you that we have made a thorough investigation into the matter and find that we cannot accept your Victor manganese safe, unless you will submit it to an honest test as to its burglar-proof qualities." The matters urged in the above letters as representations made by respondent's agents were not mentioned in the specifications of appellants' written order. They, therefore, became a part of the verbal representations, which, as we have seen, were all expressly waived. The existence of such representations was the only ground stated for a possible future refusal to accept the safe, facts which appellants are not entitled to urge as against a completed contract, because they have expressly waived them. Assuming, however, that they had the absolute right of withdrawal before the acceptance of the order by respondent, without any regard to the reasons given therefor, the fact remains that there was no absolute withdrawal. The claim that there was a withdrawal is based entirely upon the above letters, and an inspection of them clearly shows that there was a mere conditional threat to withdraw. The matter was still left open for respondent to establish the burglar-proof qualities of the safe. Thus there was voluntarily left open for further investigation ground for dispute as to facts that might have required a judicial determination to settle before it could be definitely known whether appellants would or would not withdraw. Such cannot be a withdrawal in law. To amount to a withdrawal there must be communicated a distinct, unequivocal, and unconditional statement to that effect, so definite as to leave no doubt that further relations between the parties on the subject are at an end. The renunciation of an offer to contract should in substance be as explicit and definite as a renunciation of the contract after its acceptance. With reference to the renunciation of a contract, the rule is stated in vol. 2, Mechem on Sales, § 1087, as follows: "Where, before the time arrives for the performance of the contract by one party, the other absolutely and unqualifiedly announces that he will neither receive such performance by the former nor perform on his part, the former may, if he desires, consider himself as absolved from his duty to perform. This renunciation by the other, however, must be more than a mere threat of nonperformance, and, a fortiori, more than mere idle talk of not performing. It must be a distinct, unequivocal, and absolute refusal to receive performance or to perform on his own part." See, also, Benjamin on Sales (Bennett's Ed.) § 568; 9 Cyc. 637; Dingley v. Oler, 117 U. S. 490, 6 Sup. Ct. 850, 29 L. Ed. 984; Smoot's Case, 15 Wall. (U. S.) 36, 21 L. Ed. 107; Kilgore v. Northwest Texas Baptist Educational Society, 90 Tex. 139, 37 S. W. 598; Vittum v. Estey, 67 Vt. 158, 31 Atl. 144. There was therefore no effectual withdrawal of the order prior to the arrival of the safe at Latah, and the acceptance of the order became complete at that time, making a completed contract between the parties. Appellants wholly refused to perform either in kind or otherwise, and the right of action thereupon accrued to respondent for the recovery of the full purchase amount, the safe being held subject to appellants' order. Schott Company v. Stone, Fisher & Lane, 35 Wash. 252, 259, 77 Pac. 192.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment is affirmed.

CHICAGO LUMBER & COAL CO. v. McCANN et al.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Jan. 6, 1908.)
SALES—ACTS CONSTITUTING DELIVERY—DELIVERY TO CARRIER.

Vendor of shingles and vendee agreed that 1,000 shingles should have a fixed weight; that, if the actual weight were more than the fixed weight, vendor would deduct from the price the freight on excess weight to the point where vendee destined the shingles; and that, if the actual weight were less, vendee would pay vendor the amount saved thereby on freight. Held, that the place of delivery to vendee was not thereby fixed at the destination of the shingles rather than where the shingles were delivered to the carrier.

Appeal from Superior Court, King County; Boyd J. Tallman, Judge.

Action by the Chicago Lumber & Coal Company against Andrew McCann and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Shorett & Shorett, for appellant. Smith & Cole, for respondents.

MOUNT, J. Appellant brought this action to recover from respondents $206.70, alleged to have been paid to respondents for a car load of shingles which were not delivered to appellant. The respondents admitted the receipt of the money, but denied that the shingles were not delivered to appellant. The case was tried to a court without a jury. The only question in the case was whether the shingles were delivered to appellant. The trial court found that they were delivered, and entered a judgment of dismissal.

It appears that respondents had been selling shingles to appellant for some time, and delivering the same on cars of the Northern Pacific Railway Company at Falls City, Wash.; that when a car was loaded at that place, an invoice thereof would be mailed to appellant's agent at Seattle. By reason of the fact that the railway company had no agent at Falls City, a bill of lading was issued by the railway agent at Preston, about five miles distant from Falls City, and a copy of the bill of lading was usually mailed by the railway agent to the appellant at Seattle, as consignor. Upon receipt of the invoice the appellant would pay the purchase price of the shingles to respondents. There was an understanding between the appellant and respondents that 1,000 shingles should have a fixed weight. If the actual weight were more than the fixed weight, the respondents would deduct from the price of the shingles the freight on the excess weight to the points where appellant destined the shingles. If the actual weight were less, the appellant would pay respondents the amount saved thereby on freight. On March 24, 1905, at appellant's order, respondents loaded Northern Pacific car No. 2,268 at Falls City, and directed the same by order of appellant to be shipped to Alliance, Neb., and requested the railway agent at Preston to send a copy of the bill of lading to appellant at Seattle. Respondents at the same time sent an invoice to the appellant at Seattle, whereupon appellant paid to respondents $206.70, the purchase price of the shingles. The railway agent at Preston by some mistake did not send the bill of lading to appellant. Appellant, however, assumed control of the car, and while the same was en route to Alliance, Neb., diverted the shipment to Endarka, Okl. For some reason which does not clearly appear, the car load of shingles was lost to appellant. This action was brought to recover back from respondents the $206.70 paid for the shingles. There is a direct conflict in the evidence as to whether the contract was for delivery on board the cars at Falls City, or at the point of destination of the car. Appellant argues, because the freight was subject to adjustment after the arrival of the car at its destination, that this fact shows that delivery was to be made at the point of destination of the car; but we think this fact does not have the effect claimed for it. It is not claimed that respondents agreed to pay any part of the freight if the shingles weighed the fixed weight. If they weighed more than the fixed weight, respondents were to pay freight for the excess weight only. If the shingles weighed less, appellant was to pay to respondents the difference in the freight charges. This amounted simply to a guaranty of weight, nothing more, and did not, and was not intended to, fix the place of delivery. It is not claimed that this particular car weighed more or less than the guaranteed weight, or that the respondents had any control of the car or the shipment after the shingles were loaded on the car of the railway company. We are satisfied from an examination of all the evidence, which need not be stated here, that the contract was for delivery at Falls City, and that the trial court properly found that fact.

The judgment should therefore be affirmed.

Action by J. O. Housekeeper against H. W. Livingstone, owner of a hotel, and M. J. Maloney and wife, lessees thereof, to enforce a mechanic's lien. From a judgment against Livingstone and in favor of Maloney and wife, Livingstone and plaintiff appeal. Affirmed on both appeals.

McCroskey & Canfield, for appellant J. O. Housekeeper. John Pattison, for appellant H. W. Livingstone. J. N. Pickrell, for respondents.

HADLEY, C. J. This is an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien against a hotel in Colfax, Whitman county. The action was brought by J. O. Housekeeper against H. W. Livingstone and M. J. Maloney and wife. Livingstone was the owner of the real estate, and Maloney occupied it as a tenant under a lease. A fire had seriously damaged the building, and somewhat extensive repairs were made thereon by Housekeeper, at the request of Livingstone, the owner of the fee. As a part of the repairs made by Housekeeper certain materials and labor were furnished by him in the way of kalsomining and glazing in parts of the building. The controversy in this case arises over the last-named items. Housekeeper claims that he made the repairs at the request of both Livingstone and Maloney, and that both the fee and the leasehold estate are chargeable with the cost thereof. Livingstone claims that he expressly limited his liability for these particular repairs to $75, that he told Housekeeper if the cost exceeded said sum he must look exclusively to Maloney for the excess. Maloney denies that he directed any part of the work to be done on account of his liability, and maintains that the entire repairs were authorized and directed by Livingstone. As lessee Maloney therefore contends that Livingstone's estate in fee is alone subject to a lien for the whole amount, and that the leasehold estate cannot be subjected to the lien for any part of the expense. The decree of the court was that the lien for the whole amount shall be enforced against the interest of Livingstone, but not against that of Maloney, and Maloney and wife were dismissed from the action. It was provided that, in the event of a sale under the decree, the purchaser shall be let into possession, subject to the possession of Maloney and wife as lessees. From the decree the defendant Livingstone and the plaintiff Housekeeper have both appealed.

Appellant Livingstone contends that the court erred in finding that the labor and material in excess of the value of $75 were furnished at his request. There was no writing between Livingstone and Housekeeper concerning the work, and it is somewhat difficult to determine from the evidence of the conversations between them the full legal effect thereof. Housekeeper testified that Livingstone told him to go to Maloney and tell him that Livingstone would pay $75 upon the kalsomining and glazing, and that, if Maloney desired more work done than that amount in value, he must pay for it himself. Housekeeper, however, says that Livingstone at no time said that he would in no event pay the excess of $75, but that he merely asked Housekeeper to so tell Maloney. Livingstone's purpose appeared to be to get an agreement from his tenant Maloney to pay for part of the repairs, and this he sought to do by sending Housekeeper to Maloney. But we believe the testimony as a whole does not establish that Livingstone limited his own liability as between himself and Housekeeper. Whatever may have been his intention as between himself and Maloney, he nevertheless permitted Housekeeper to go ahead and do the work to the betterment of his property, without expressly telling Housekeeper that the liability was limited to less than the full value. Under such circumstances, we think Livingstone's liability was not limited to $75. The property belonged to Livingstone, and the primary liability to pay for all the permanent improvements made with his knowledge and without his objection was upon him, unless he so distinctly and clearly limited his liability that Housekeeper could not have reasonably understood it otherwise. After a careful examination of the evidence, we think we would not be warranted in disturbing the court's finding that the material and labor were furnished at Livingstone's request. The same is also true as to the finding concerning the value of the labor and material.

It is next assigned that the court erred in allowing the sum of $150 as attorney's fees. The reasonable value of the labor and materials was found to be $340.37, and the decree is for the enforcement of the lien for that amount and for costs. Considering the amount involved, it is contended that the fee allowed was too large. We think the record is such that the question of excessive attorney's fees is not reviewable here. All parties stipulated at the trial that the court should fix the amount of attorney's fees without the introduction of any evidence upon the subject, and the amount was so fixed without evidence. Under such circumstances there is nothing for the appellate court to review. To be sure, if it manifestly appeared that the trial court abused its powers in the premises, this court might be warranted in so holding. Such a case is not presented here, however. In the absence of any evidence upon the subject, and in view of the stipulation to abide the court's decision, together with the evident sharply contested litigation and necessity for somewhat extensive legal services as shown by the record, the case before us does not present a manifest abuse of power. So far as the appellant Livingstone is concerned, we think the judgment should be affirmed.

Referring now to the appeal of Housekeeper, we find that the assignments of error relate to the failure of the court to find that the respondents Maloney and their leasehold estate are liable. It is contended that Maloney requested the improvements as well as Livingstone. The evidence, however, shows that Livingstone repeatedly said to Maloney and others after the fire that he would fully repair the building as rapidly as it could be done. When Housekeeper delivered Livingstone's message to Maloney about the proposed $75 limitation, Maloney replied in substance that Livingstone had always said he would repair as rapidly as possible, and that Housekeeper would make the repairs in question as well as others he had already made; that he (Maloney) was greatly inconvenienced by reason of the delay, and he demanded that Housekeeper should go ahead and complete the repairs or he would get some one else to make them. The entire conversation and the whole evidence together convinces us that Maloney simply demanded that Housekeeper should proceed on the authority of Livingstone, as had been all the time contemplated, or he (Maloney) would see that some one else did the work. The court heard the testimony of all these persons, and we think under the evidence that we should not say it was error to refuse to find that Maloney requested the work done on his own responsibility. The dismissal of the Maloneys from the case followed as a result, and was therefore not erroneous.

The contentions upon both appeals are denied, and the judgment is affirmed. Housekeeper shall recover his costs on the Livingstone appeal, and the Maloneys shall recover their costs on the Housekeeper appeal.

DUNBAR and RUDKIN, JJ., not sitting.

FULLERTON, J. (dissenting in part). I think there was no obligation on the part of the appellant Livingstone to pay a larger sum than $75, and that the decree, in so far as it requires him to pay in excess of this amount, is erroneous.

Section 5789 provides that when a corporation shall be found guilty of unlawfully exercising any office or franchise it shall be dissolved. Section 5790 provides for the disposition of the estate of a corporation offending against the state laws. Held, that the court has power to dissolve a corporation in which there are only three stockholders, two of whom are husband and wife, who own one-half the stock, where, because of ill feeling between them and the third stockholder, they are unable to agree as to the management of the corporate affairs, and no board of directors has been elected for over four years, the husband having represented the corporation without authority during that time.

Appeal from Superior Court, Spokane County; Henry L. Kennan, Judge.

Action by the state, on the relation of Thomas F. Conlan, against the Oudin & Bergman Fire Clay Mining & Manufacturing Company for a dissolution. From a decree in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Gallagher & Thayer, for appellant. R. L. Edmiston and R. J. Danson, for respondent.

ROOT, J. This action was instituted for the purpose of dissolving the defendant corporation. From a decree of dissolution this appeal is prosecuted.

The defendant was incorporated under the laws of Washington, in April, 1893, with a capital stock of $150,000, divided into 1,500 shares of the par value of $100 each. No by-laws appear to have been adopted by the corporation. The trial court finds that on the 17th of April, 1903, the relator herein became the owner of 750 shares of the stock, and that Eva M. Oudin and Charles P. Oudin were the owners of the other 750 shares; that the stock is still owned by them in the respective amounts mentioned. At that time the relator obtained his stock from one Bergman, who was one of the trustees. The said Charles P. Oudin was the other trustee, the articles providing for only two. Shortly after the date above mentioned, a meeting of the stockholders was called to elect a trustee to fill the vacancy caused by the withdrawal of Bergman from the company. At the meeting all of the stockholders were present. Seven hundred and fifty shares were voted for this relator, and 750 shares for Eva M. Oudin, wife of Charles P. Oudin. As neither received a majority, no election was had. Since said date no election has taken place, and the corporation has had but one trustee, and consequently been unable to legally transact any corporate business. The court finds that said Oudin and wife refuse to elect, or to help elect, or to consent to the election of, said relator as a trustee, and declare that they will never consent to relator occupying any official position or exercising any official authority or control with or over the corporation. The court finds that said Charles P. Oudin has assumed to act on behalf of and to represent said corporation without authority, and that under his management and control the corporation has suffered great financial reverses and loss, and that by reason of his great carelessness the factory and manufacturing plant of the corporation was destroyed by fire and the business destroyed, and that said Oudin has ever since April, 1903, been engaged in organizing and building up a rival fire-brick, sewer-pipe, and clay manufacturing plant, exercising the management and control thereof, and wholly absorbing the business patronage of the defendant corporation. No statement of facts or bill of exceptions is brought up. Hence the findings cannot be questioned. Appellant urges that the facts as found do not justify the conclusions of law or the decree.

Section 5780, Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St., reads as follows: "An information may be filed against any person or corporation in the following cases: * * * (5) Or where any corporation do or omit acts which amount to a surrender or a forfeiture of their rights and privileges as a corporation, or where they exercise powers not conferred by law." Section 5789 provides that, when a defendant shall be found guilty of unlawfully exercising any office or franchise, the court shall give judgment of ouster, and in case of corporations the same shall be dissolved. Section 5790 makes further provision for the disposition of the estate of the corporation offending against the laws of the state. While the provisions of the statute may not be entirely clear and specific, we think they justify a dissolution of a corporation under such circumstances as we find in this case. The rival stockholders herein seem unable to agree as to the management and control of the corporate affairs. This is the eighth appeal to this court by these parties, or those interested in this matter, and we are informed that another appeal is now on the way. As the stock is held entirely by three stockholders, two of whom are husband and wife, considerations do not obtain which might, if there were numerous stockholders not directly responsible for the controversy and the present condition of the corporation. We see no reason for not dissolving this corporation, which for over four years has been impotent and unable to legally transact any business on account of the controversy and ill feeling existing between the parties who own, each, half of the stock.

We think the judgment and decree of the trial court was justified, and the same is therefore affirmed.

DUTEAU v. BARTO et al.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Jan. 8, 1908.)
APPEAL—REVIEW—FINDINGS OF FACT ON CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

The findings of fact by a trial judge upon conflicting evidence will not be disturbed on appeal, unless clearly unsupported by the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 3983-3989.]

Appeal from Superior Court, King County; Boyd J. Tallman, Judge.

Action by Joseph Duteau against R. W. Barto, administrator of the estate of George M. Godfrey, and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Walter B. Beals and Blaine, Tucker & Hyland, for appellants. Arthur C. Dresbach and F. A. Gilman, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This action was commenced by Joseph Duteau against George M. Godfrey and Lee Melleur, to recover $1,263, less $185.20, paid for services rendered by the plaintiff to the defendants from May, 1904, to July 11, 1905, as their housekeeper and cook, and also in caring for and nursing the defendant Godfrey at times when he was not in a condition to care for himself. The defendants, after denying the allegations of the complaint, alleged that in May, 1904, the plaintiff, being unable to do hard manual labor, offered to do the housework and cooking for the defendant Godfrey for his lodging and board; that his offer was accepted; that in July, 1904, the defendant Melleur went to live with plaintiff and Godfrey under this arrangement; and that the defendants were not indebted to the plaintiff in any sum whatever. Prior to trial the defendant Godfrey died, and his administrator having been substituted as a party defendant, amended pleadings were filed, raising the same issues, with the additional allegation made by the administrator that Godfrey during his lifetime had loaned $185.20 to the plaintiff, no part of which had been paid, and for which he asked judgment. The trial judge made findings upon which judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff against both defendants for $397.57 and costs. The defendants have appealed.

No question of law is raised on this appeal, appellants' controlling contention being that the findings and judgment are not supported by the evidence. We have repeatedly said that, when a trial judge has tried an issue of fact, has seen the witnesses, heard them testify, has been in a position to pass upon their credibility, and has on conflicting evidence made findings of fact, this court will not, on a trial de novo, disturb such findings, unless they are clearly unsupported by the weight of competent evidence. Having carefully read the entire record, we have concluded that the evidence, although conflicting, is amply sufficient to sustain each and all of the findings made, and the judgment entered thereon.

The judgment is affirmed.

COLLINS et al. v. HUFFMAN et al.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Jan. 7, 1908.)

1. APPEAL—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

In an action on bonds given on an injunction pendente lite, restraining plaintiffs from interfering with a stock of merchandise or with defendants' possession, the court permitted one of the plaintiffs to be asked, on cross-examination, whether it was true that he had made a contract with defendants because he could not agree with them and wanted to get them out of a certain company, over objection that in the injunction suit the court had found that there was no contract. The answer was "No." Held, that it appearing from the context that the thought involved in the question was merely the reason that defendants sought to withdraw, no prejudice could have resulted from the answer, as it was sufficiently to the effect that there was no contract, which was consistent with the court's finding, and met the objection specified.

2. INJUNCTION—LIABILITIES ON BONDS—ACTIONS—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

In an action on bonds given on an injunction pendente lite, restraining plaintiffs from interfering with a stock of merchandise or with defendants' possession, it was sought to introduce evidence as to the collectibility of a certain account owing plaintiffs, the purpose being to found damages against defendants for failure to collect it, when it was claimed plaintiffs were prevented by the injunction from so doing. Witness had already testified that the account was not taken in charge by defendants, and that he knew during the injunction suit that defendants did not claim control of the account. Held, that the collection of the account not having been taken from plaintiffs by the injunction, the evidence as to its collectibility was immaterial and properly excluded.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 27, Injunction, § 584.]

3. SAME.

In an action on bonds given on an injunction pendente lite, restraining plaintiffs from interfering with a stock of merchandise or with defendants' possession, it appeared that after the injunction was dissolved a stipulation was made between the parties for joint possession, and that later the store was turned over to plaintiffs, who placed it in the hands of a jobbers' association. In estimating the amount of property, plaintiffs charged defendants with the full invoice price of all goods turned over at the time of the injunction. Held, that objection was properly sustained to the question as to what the stock of goods brought when sold by the jobbers' association, defendants being entitled to credit for the invoice value on all that was turned back to plaintiffs, and the goods having been turned over to the jobbers' association by plaintiffs.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 27, Injunction, § 584.]

4. APPEAL—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

Whatever may be said as to the materiality of a question, no prejudice could have resulted therefrom where the answer was "It would be hard for me to say. I could not swear to that."

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 4153-4160.]

5. SAME—PREJUDICE.

Errors assigned but not discussed in appellant's brief will not be considered, though counsel state that they are not waived, the burden being on appellant to show injury therefrom.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 4250-4261.]

6. TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—WRITTEN INSTRUCTIONS.

A stenographer employed by both parties to report a trial is virtually under the direction of the court, and hence the court's charge having been reported by such stenographer, the same was in writing within Laws 1903, p. 120,

c. 81, § 1, subd. 4, providing that on request of either party the charge must be in writing, but that a stenographic report thereof shall be considered a charge in writing.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 46, Trial, § 522.]

7. DAMAGES—INSTRUCTIONS—CONFLICTING INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action on injunction bonds, the court charged that damages must be found in some amount, either nominal or actual, and a later instruction contained the expression, "so that you will bear in mind in finding your damages in this case, if you find any at all," etc. Held, that the jury must have understood the court to refer to actual damages when it used the words "if you find any at all," the whole case having been tried on the theory that nominal damages were recoverable, and as so understood, that the instructions were not conflicting, in that the later instruction permitted a finding of no damages whatever.

8. APPEAL—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—ERRONEOUS INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action on injunction bonds, an instruction that damages must be confined to matters occurring subsequently to the date of the bond was not prejudicial error, though the injunction order was dated two days before the bond, and the instruction failed to permit any recovery of damages for the intervening day, where it was not shown that there was any change of conditions between the date of the injunction and the bond from which any damages accrued.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, § 4220.]

9. INJUNCTION—LIABILITIES ON BONDS—ACTIONS—DAMAGES—ATTORNEYS' FEES.

A restraining order was issued which contained an order to show cause why a temporary injunction should not issue. No motion was made to dissolve the restraining order, but on the return day of the order to show cause it was simply sought to prevent the issuance of a temporary injunction. No motion was made to dissolve the latter order, and the attorney's services thereafter rendered were on the trial of the issues of the main case, which resulted incidentally in the dissolution of the injunction. Held, in an action on the bonds given, that under the rule that attorney's fees, to be recoverable, must have been for services rendered in securing a dissolution of the injunction distinct from any services rendered in connection with the main case, no services were rendered for which fees were recoverable as damages.

10. SAME—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where, in an action on bonds given on an injunction, restraining plaintiffs from interfering with a stock of merchandise or with defendants' possession, it appeared that after dissolution of the injunction a stipulation was made between the parties for joint possession of the store, and that later it was turned over to plaintiffs, who placed it in the hands of a jobbers' association, which disposed of the whole without any segregation of the old stock from the new, the court did not proceed on a wrong theory of the case in considering the business of plaintiffs and that conducted by defendants as one continuous business, and in instructing that the business, stock, and accounts should be considered as they were at the date defendants took possession, and also at the date they returned possession, instead of instructing that plaintiffs' business as it was when defendants took possession should be considered alone, and that plaintiffs had nothing to do with stock and accounts added during defendants' possession.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 27, Injunction, §§ 589-593.]

11. SAME.

An order for an injunction pendente lite recited that the court, being fully advised, ordered that the injunction as prayed be granted, and that the same be continued until the hearing of the cause, and it was further ordered that on giving a bond "an injunction forthwith issue." Held, that the point that under the terms of the order it became necessary after the bond was filed and approved to issue a formal injunction order, and that inasmuch as this was not done there was in fact no injunction, and therefore no liability on the bond, was not well taken, the words "granting the injunction" being manifestly intended to operate as the injunction order itself on the filing and approval of the necessary bond.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 27, Injunction, § 340.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Spokane County; Miles Poindexter, Judge.

Action by T. E. Collins and others against Fred B. Huffman and the Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland. From a judgment for plaintiffs, both plaintiffs and the Fidelity & Deposit Company appeal. Affirmed on both appeals.

Cullen & Dudley, for appellants. Danson & Williams, for respondent.

HADLEY, C. J. This is a suit for damages based upon two injunction bonds. The bonds were executed by the defendant Fred B. Huffman and another, with defendant Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland as surety. The facts stated in the complaint are substantially as follows: On the 23d day of December, 1903, in an action then pending in the district court of the First judicial district of the state of Idaho, wherein one George W. Huffman and the defendant Fred B. Huffman were plaintiffs and the plaintiffs herein were defendants, a restraining order was issued whereby these plaintiffs, the defendants in the former action, were restrained from in any manner interfering with the stock of merchandise, books of account, accounts, and personal property belonging to the Collins Mercantile Company located at King's Spur, Kootenai county, Idaho, and from in any way interfering with the possession thereof by the said Huffmans until the further order of court. Upon the issuance of the restraining order an injunction bond in the sum of $1,500 as required by the court was executed by the persons aforesaid, as plaintiffs in said action, and by said surety company. It is alleged that thereafter, on or about December 31, 1903, upon the hearing of the order to show cause why the restraining order should not be continued in force pending the suit, the court duly made an order continuing the injunction in force upon the condition that the plaintiffs in the action should file an additional bond in the sum of $5,000. A bond in said sum, executed by the same obligors who made the first one, was thereupon duly executed and filed. It is further alleged that such proceedings were thereafter had in said action that on or about May 5, 1905, the said Idaho court finally decided that the plaintiffs in the action were not entitled to the injunction, and that a judgment was entered therein in favor of these plaintiffs. The claim for damages herein is based upon an alleged dissipation of the stock of goods and accounts, and destruction of the business of these plaintiffs during the time the said Huffmans were in possession thereof by authority of said injunction orders. The complaint fixes the damages at more than $12,000. The answers of the defendants admit the issuance of the injunction orders and the execution of the bonds, but they deny that plaintiffs were damaged in any sum. A trial was had before a jury, a verdict was returned in favor of the plaintiffs for the sum of $750, and judgment was entered in accordance with the verdict. The plaintiffs and also the defendant Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland have appealed.

The appeal of the plaintiff appellants is prosecuted upon the contention that the trial court proceeded upon an entirely erroneous theory, or the result which was effected in the case could not have been reached. It is contended that the evidence shows an investment by appellants of $7,000 in a profitable business; that the business was taken away from the owner by a voluntary wrongdoer through the means of a writ of injunction, and was run and controlled by such wrongdoer for nearly a year and a half, at the end of which time the whole investment of $7,000 was lost; that for such loss directly caused by the wrongdoer damages in the sum of $750 only have been awarded. The appellants have assigned many errors, and an examination of them becomes necessary to determine whether the cause was tried upon an erroneous theory.

It is first assigned that the court erred in permitting the witness Severance to answer the question as to whether it was true that he had made a contract with the Huffmans because he could not agree with them and wanted to get them out of the Severance-Huffman Company. Severance was interested in the profits of the Collins Mercantile Company, the latter being really the appellant Collins. Severance had also sustained business relations with the Huffmans, the same being referred to as the Severance-Huffman Company. When the question to which objection was made was asked Severance, he was being interrogated about an account which was owing from the Severance-Huffman Company to the Collins Mercantile Company, or really to the appellants. The objection was made upon the single ground that the Idaho court had found that there was no contract. An examination, we think, shows that the question refers to a proposed agreement or mere negotiations as descriptive of the reason why it was sought to sever the Huffmans from the company. The contention now is that permitting the witness to answer must have created a prejudice in the minds of the jury. The answer was "No," which was equivalent to saying that the witness did not enter into such a contract. Since it appears from the context of the record that the thought involved in the question was merely the reason that the Huffmans sought to withdraw, no prejudice could have resulted from the answer of the witness, for the reason that the answer was sufficiently to the effect that there was no contract, which was consistent with the findings of the Idaho court, and met the ground specified in the objection.

It is next assigned that the court erred in sustaining an objection to a question asked the witness Severance on re-examination as to the collectibility of the Severance-Huffman Company account, which was an account of something more than $2,000 owing to appellants. The purpose of attempting to show the collectibility of the account was to found damages against the Huffmans for failure to collect it, when it is claimed appellants were prevented by the injunction from so doing. The same witness had testified already that this account was not taken into the charge of the Huffmans, and that he knew during all the time of the Idaho litigation that the Huffmans did not in any way claim the control of this account. This showed that the collection of the account was not taken from appellants by the injunction, and the Huffmans cannot therefore be held responsible for failure to collect it. In view of the witness' previous testimony, the matter of the collectibility of the account became immaterial to the issues in the case, and it was not error to sustain the objection.

It is next urged that it was error to sustain an objection to a question asking what the stock of goods brought when sold by the Spokane Jobbers' Association. After the injunction was dissolved, a stipulation was made between the parties for joint possession of the store for a time, and later it was turned over to the control of appellants, who placed it in the hands of the Spokane Jobbers' Association. In estimating the amount of property, appellants had charged the respondents with the full invoice price of all goods which were turned over at the time of the injunction. Respondents were therefore entitled to credit in the same way for the invoice amount of all that were turned back to appellants. These having been turned over to the Spokane Jobbers' Association by appellants themselves, it became immaterial so far as respondents were concerned what prices the goods brought.

It is also contended that it was error to overrule appellants' objection to a question asked a witness as to whether, with a few goods added, the store could have been run longer and all the outstanding accounts collected. This witness was in charge of the stock for the Spokane Jobbers' Association, which, as we have seen, held it under the direction of appellants. Whatever may be said as to the materiality of the question, no prejudice could have resulted therefrom in view of the answer of the witness. The answer was, "It would be hard for me to say. I could not swear to that."

A number of other errors are assigned upon the admission and rejection of testimony; but while counsel say they do not waive them, they have not discussed them in their brief. The burden is upon appellants to show wherein they have been prejudiced. Errors to be available for reversal must operate to the injury of the complaining party. Brown Bros. v. Forest, 1 Wash. T. 202; Jose v. Stetson, 20 Wash. 648, 56 Pac. 397. We find no prejudicial error in the particulars mentioned.

It is next contended that the court instructed the jury orally, and that this was error in view of the fact that appellants had seasonably requested written instructions. The record shows that one stenographer was employed by both parties to report the case at the trial, and that she did report it, including the taking of the court's instructions. She was therefore under the control of both parties. The pertinent part of the statute upon this subject is found in subdivision 4, § 1, Laws 1903, p. 120, c. 81, as follows: "When the evidence is concluded, either party may request the judge to charge the jury in writing, in which event no other charge or instruction shall be given, except the same be contained in the said written charge; * * * Provided, further, that whenever in the trial of any cause, a stenographic report of the evidence and the charge and instructions of the court is taken, the taking of such charge or instructions by the stenographic reporter, shall be considered as a charge or instruction in writing within the meaning of this section." Appellants contend that, on the authority of State v. Mayo, 42 Wash. 540, 85 Pac. 251, the instructions as given by the court in the case at bar were not in conformity with the above statute. In the case cited it was said that there were two stenographers present at the trial taking a report of the case, one employed on behalf of the prosecuting attorney and the other by the defendant. Under such circumstances it was held that the court was not relieved from the obligation to charge the jury in writing, the request therefor having been made. It was stated in effect that, in order to relieve the court of this obligation, the stenographer present must be an official stenographer, or one under the direction and control of the court, "so that a copy of the charge could be had if application to the court should be made therefor." It was held that a stenographer employed by one of the parties only is not so under the control of the court that he can be required to furnish a copy of any part of the proceedings either to the court or to the opposing party. The holding was based upon the ground that the report of a stenographer employed by one party only becomes the private property of that party, which is no doubt correct. Appellants contend here that the stenographer employed in this case was not under the control of the court, and was not an official stenographer. Strictly speaking, there is under our statutes no such person as an official court stenographer, but a stenographer may be so related to both the parties in a cause as virtually places him under the direction of the court. We think this is true where one stenographer is employed by both parties to report a trial. Such a reporter is under the direction of either party, and if the interest or advantage of either party requires that copies of instructions which the reporter has taken shall be furnished to the court, or to such party, the copies must be forthcoming. If the statute quoted is to be given any force at all, it would seem that the court complied with its provisions in this case. The statute was passed with knowledge that we have no official stenographers, and in view of that fact we think it was intended to meet just such cases as the one at bar. This holding in no way conflicts with State v. Mayo, supra, the facts of which were materially different from those now before us.

It is contended that the court gave contradictory instructions in that the jury were first told that they must find damages in some amount, either nominal or actual, and a later instruction contained the expression, "so that you will bear in mind in finding your damages in this case, if you find any at all," etc. Appellants argue that the above expression conflicts with the first instruction, for the reason that it gave the jury liberty to find no damages whatever. The jury must have understood the court to refer to actual damages when it used the words "if you find any at all," for the whole case had been tried upon the theory that nominal damages were recoverable. That the jury were not misled is evidenced by the fact that the verdict which was returned was for substantial actual damages.

It is next urged that the court erred in instructing that damages under the second or $5,000 bond must be confined to the matters occurring subsequently to December 31, 1903, the date of that bond. The injunction order upon which that bond was based was dated December 29, 1903, and the instruction also limited the recovery of damages under the first or $1,500 bond to the period between the dates of December 23d and 29th, inclusive. It is therefore argued that the instruction failed to permit any recovery of damages for December 30th. Appellants' assignment of error is, however, directed to the point that the instruction erroneously directed that no recovery could be had upon the $5,000 bond between the dates of December 23d and 29th, and no reference is made to failure to cover the date of December 30th. The exceptions to the instruction also fail to call specific attention to this point, and we think appellants are not in position to urge it. But, in any event, if the question were properly before us, appellants have not shown from anything in the record that there was any change of conditions as between the 29th and 31st of December from which any particular damages were recoverable for December 30th, the omitted day, and no prejudice therefore appears.

It is next assigned that the court erred in instructing that the jury should not allow any damages by way of attorney's fees, for the reason that there was no evidence showing that attorney's fees were incurred or paid by reason of the injunctions, separate and distinct from the other issues involved in the case. We believe the instruction was not erroneous in view of the evidence and history of the injunction case. It is well established that the recoverable fees must be for attorney's services rendered in securing a dissolution of the injunction, distinct from any services rendered in connection with the main case. A restraining order was issued, which contained an order to show cause why a temporary or interlocutory injunction should not issue pending the litigation. No motion was made to dissolve the restraining order, but on the return day of the order to show cause appellants simply sought to prevent the issuance of a temporary injunction. No motion was made to dissolve the latter order, and the attorney's services thereafter rendered were upon the trial of the issues of the main case, which resulted merely incidentally in the dissolution of the injunction. Under the rule of law upon this subject, we therefore think no services were rendered by attorneys for which fees are recoverable as damages. Donahue v. Johnson, 9 Wash. 187, 37 Pac. 322; White Pine Lumber Company v. Aetna Indemnity Co., 42 Wash. 569, 85 Pac. 52.

Several errors are assigned upon certain instructions, to the effect that the court proceeded upon a wrong theory of the case in considering the business of appellants and that conducted by the Huffmans as one continual business, and instructed that the business, stock, and accounts should be considered as they were at the date the Huffmans took possession, and also as they were at the date they returned possession. Appellants contend that their business as it was when the Huffmans took possession should be considered alone, and that they have nothing to do with stock and accounts added during the Huffmans' possession. The evidence shows, however, as already stated, that on the return of the stock appellants took possession of everything and turned all over to the Spokane Jobbers' Association, which disposed of the whole without any segregation of the old from the new. We therefore, think the court did not err in its theory of the instructions, and we find no prejudicial error as to any other instructions given or refused to appellants. We believe the cause was fairly submitted to the jury, and that, inasmuch as the jury were the triers of the facts, their verdict should stand so far as plaintiff appellants are concerned.

Referring now to the cross-appeal of the defendant appellant, Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland, we find 10 distinct assignments of error, all relating to the instructions given or refused. This opinion has already been extended to such an inordinate length by reason of the many questions raised by the plaintiff appellants, we find it necessary to abbreviate the discussion of the cross-appellant's appeal. A specific discussion of each assignment is unnecessary, since the points involved may be more generally stated. It is urged that the court erroneously assumed in its instructions that specific damages were shown as resulting from the temporary restraining order. That order it will be remembered continued from December 23d until December 29th, inclusive, when the order for an injunction pendente lite was issued. It is contended that no specific damages were shown as resulting from the first order, and that only nominal damages were recoverable upon the $1,500 bond. The jury were specifically told that they should allow no actual damages upon that bond, except such as accrued between December 23d and 29th. Under the evidence we think it was for the jury and not for the court to say whether any actual damages did accrue. The court did not assume to say that actual damages had been in fact proven, but said in reference to actual damages that, if the jury found "any at all," they could allow no damages on the $1,500 bond, except such as accrued on and between the dates aforesaid. We think there was no error in this particular.

It is further urged that the cross-appellant is not liable upon the second or $5,000 bond, for the reason that no injunction was issued and served. The order for the injunction pendente lite contained the following: "The cause was argued to the court by respective counsel, and the court being fully advised in the premises orders that the injunction as prayed for by the plaintiffs in their verified amended complaint on file herein be granted, and that the said injunction be continued until the hearing of this cause upon the merits." It was further ordered that upon giving a bond for $5,000, "an injunction forthwith issue." It is argued that, under the terms of the order, it became necessary, after the bond was filed and approved, to issue a formal injunction order, and that, inasmuch as this was not done, there was in fact no injunction and therefore no liability upon the bond. We think the point is not well taken. The order shows that the court granted by injunction the specific relief asked in the amended complaint. This was definite and certain, and could not have been misunderstood. The words "granting the injunction" were in the present tense, and were manifestly intended to operate as the injunction order itself upon the filing and approval of the necessary bond. It is true the order afterwards further says that upon the filing and approval of a bond in the sum specified, "an injunction forthwith issue"; but in the light of the whole context and the circumstances the words were manifestly intended in the sense that the injunction which had been previously granted in the order should forthwith be in effect upon the filing and approval of the bond. The court, therefore, did not err when it instructed the jury that damages were recoverable under the $5,000 bond, if any were shown to have accrued during the period covered by it.

For the foregoing reasons, we conclude that the contentions upon both appeals should be denied, and the judgment is affirmed. No costs shall be recovered by either appellant.

LINVILLE v. SCHEELINE et al. (No. 1,703.)

(Supreme Court of Nevada. Jan. 3, 1908.)

1. APPEAL — PROCEDURE — STRIKING COST BILLS.

An order striking a cost bill is an order made after final judgment, and, if appealed from, should be taken up in a statement on appeal containing only so much of the record as is necessary to present the facts, no statement on motion for a new trial being necessary.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, § 2300.]

2. COSTS—RECOVERY—REQUISITES.

Under Civ. Prac. Act, § 486 (Comp. Laws, § 3581), requiring the party in whose favor judgment is rendered, and who claims his costs, to deliver a cost bill to the clerk within two days after the verdict or decision, or such further time as the court may grant, if a party fails to file a cost bill within the time prescribed, he waives his rights to costs.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 13, Costs, §§ 768-771.]

3. SAME—"DECISION OF COURT."

Under Prac. Act, § 486 (Comp. Laws, § 3581), requiring a party in whose favor judgment is rendered, and who claims his costs, to deliver a cost bill to the clerk within two days after the verdict or "decision of the court," the decision is the announcement by it of its judgment, and is distinct from the findings.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 13, Costs, § 771.]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 2, p. 1898.]

4. APPEAL—RECORD—SUFFICIENCY.

Where, on appeal from an order striking plaintiff's cost bill, the record shows only that motion to strike because the bill was not filed in time was made and allowed, and the order excepted to on the ground the clerk failed to notify plaintiff of the court's decision as directed, the record is insufficient to show the clerk did not so notify plaintiff, and to overcome the presumption in favor of the correctness of the trial court's rulings and the presumption that the clerk performed his duty.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, § 2300.]

5. TRIAL—DECISION IN ABSENCE OF COUNSEL—NOTICE.

Where courts render decisions in the absence of counsel, they should direct notice to be given to the parties' attorneys.

Appeal from District Court, Washoe County.

Action by R. W. Linville against Agnes Scheeline and others. Plaintiff was awarded a decree, but it was modified by allowing costs. From an order denying a new trial, striking out cost bills and denying an amendment to the findings, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

O. H. Mack, for appellant. Jas. T. Boyd and A. N. Sallsbury, for respondents.

SWEENEY, J. This action was for specific performance of a written contract to convey real estate. The case was tried before the court with the aid of a jury on the 4th day of May, 1905. Special issues were submitted to the jury, which were answered in favor of the plaintiff. Thereafter the case was continued for oral argument before the court. On the 28th day of July, 1905, the case was argued and submitted to the court. The minutes of the court for the 30th day of October, 1905, show the following order made in this cause on said day: "The court adopts the findings of the jury on the matters of fact submitted to them and finds for the plaintiff, and decrees that findings of fact and conclusions of law and decree be entered for the plaintiff as prayed for. Ordered that the clerk of this court notify Mack & Farrington and O. H. Mack, and Boyd and Sallsbury. Whereupon a recess was taken until the further order of the court." On the 9th day of November, 1905, counsel for plaintiff filed and served his cost bill. On the 11th day of November, 1905, counsel for defendant filed a motion to strike out the cost bill filed November 9th, upon the ground that said cost bill was not filed within the time allowed by law, which motion coming on to be heard was allowed upon the said ground that the same was not filed in time. On the 4th day of January, 1906, the court signed findings and a decree prepared by counsel for plaintiff, the decree, however, being modified before signing and filing by striking out the costs of the action inserted therein. On the said 4th day of January, following the filing of the decree, counsel for plaintiff filed another cost bill. On the 6th day of January following counsel for defendants moved to strike out this last cost bill upon the ground that the same was not filed within the time allowed by law. The motion coming on to be heard was allowed by the court. On the 6th day of January, 1906, counsel for plaintiff moved for a new trial upon the following grounds: "Insufficiency of the evidence to justify the findings and the decision of the court, and that the decision is against law. Errors in law occurring at the trial, excepted to by the plaintiff. Failure to give plaintiff proper relief, appearing to have been refused under the influence of passion or prejudice." The motion for a new trial was denied. On the 13th day of January, 1906, the court made an order denying plaintiff's request for an additional finding, reading as follows: "The judge of the above-entitled court, on the 4th day of January, 1906, signed and filed a judgment in said cause and in said court in favor of the plaintiff, according to the prayer of the complaint therein. (1) The court now finds that the plaintiff is entitled to a judgment against defendants, and each of them, for all of his costs and disbursements therefor incurred in this action, according to the prayer of the complaint therein." This appeal is taken from the order of the trial court denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial, from the orders striking out plaintiff's cost bills, and from the order denying plaintiff's request for an amendment to the findings made on the 13th day of January, 1906.

The record in this case presents the novel situation of a statement on and motion for a new trial upon the part of the plaintiff, where the judgment and decree are in plaintiff's favor and in accordance with the prayer of his complaint, except that costs were not included for the reason that the court struck out the cost bill upon the ground that the bill was not filed in time. The third ground stated in the motion is not a ground for new trial specified in the statute. The first two grounds of the motion the plaintiff was in no position to make, as he could not be prejudiced by error in either particular specified. It is evident from the record that the only alleged error which counsel for appellant is seeking to correct on this appeal is in reference to the order or orders striking out the cost bill or bills. To correct this error, if such existed, manifestly did not require a statement on motion for a new trial. An order striking out a cost bill is an order made after final judgment, and, if appealed from, should be brought to this court in a statement on appeal containing only so much of the record as is necessary to present the facts. The record in this case, as presented, is in two volumes, containing all the testimony and rulings upon the trial, as well as all the original papers and documents filed in the case for any purpose whatever, most all of which have no place in the record. The questions presented in this case could and should have been presented in a statement of one-twentieth the size of the present one, at a great saving in cost to the client appealing, and of labor upon the part of this court in sorting out from the mass of foreign and irrelevant matter such portions of the record as present the real questions for consideration. It is a serious question whether appeals presenting transcripts of this character ought not to be dismissed without consideration, or else the appellant be required to reform his record before it would be considered. No motion for diminution of the record was made by counsel for respondent. Without making this case a precedent for the action of this court in future cases, where similar records are presented, we will, in this instance, under the circumstances, determine the only question presented—whether or not a cost bill was filed in time. Section 486 of the Civil Practice Act (Comp. Laws, § 3581) reads as follows: "The party in whose favor judgment is rendered and who claims his costs, shall deliver to the clerk of the court, within two days after the verdict or decision of the court, or such further time as the court or judge may grant, a memorandum of the items of his cost and necessary disbursements in the action or proceeding, which memorandum shall be verified by the oath of the party, or his attorney, stating that the items are correct, and that the disbursements and costs therein named have been necessarily incurred in the action or proceeding. He shall be entitled to recover the witness fees, although at the time he may not have actually paid them." In order for a party to recover costs, he must come within the provisions of the statute, and if he fails to file his cost bill within the time prescribed, he is deemed to have waived his right to costs. State v. District Court, 26 Nev. 258, 66 Pac. 743. This court has repeatedly held that the decision of the court is the announcement by the court of its judgment, and is distinct from the findings. Elder v. Frevert, 18 Nev. 278, 3 Pac. 237; Robinson v. Benson, 19 Nev. 331, 10 Pac. 441; State ex rel. Hoppin v. Cheney, 24 Nev. 222, 52 Pac. 12; Robinson v. Kind, 25 Nev. 261, 59 Pac. 863, 62 Pac. 705; Sholes v. Stead, 2 Nev. 108; Howard v. Richards, 2 Nev. 128, 90 Am. Dec. 520; Telegraph Co. v. Paterson, 1 Nev. 150. Were this question a new one, it might be open to serious question, as many authorities, under similar statutes, take a contrary view. The practice in this state, however, of regarding the oral announcement by the court of its judgment as the decision, has been so thoroughly recognized by the bench and bar that it would not now be proper to announce a different rule.

It is not contended that counsel, prior to November 9th, either by order of court or by stipulation, was allowed any extension of time to file his cost bill. Counsel for appellant argues, however, that because of the fact that the decision was rendered in the absence of counsel on either side, and the clerk was directed to notify respective counsel that he was entitled to two days from the time of receiving such notice in which to file his cost bill, the clerk never did give such notice, and that he filed his cost bill the day he obtained knowledge of the decision. If this state of facts was established by the record, we would be called upon to determine whether such neglect upon the part of the clerk would relieve plaintiff from an enforcement of the strict provisions of the statute. All that the record shows, however, is that the motion to strike out the cost bill was made, that the motion was allowed by the court, and the order of the court excepted to upon the ground that the clerk failed to notify counsel as directed. What showing, if any, was made upon the hearing of the motions that counsel was not served with notice of the decision, and had no such notice, does not appear of record. All presumptions are in favor of the correctness of the rulings of the trial court, and where such rulings are questioned the record must show wherein they are erroneous. It is also a presumption of law, in the absence of a showing to the contrary, that officers perform their duties. Jones on Evidence, vol. 1, § 38. Neither of these presumptions are shown in the record to have been overcome, and we cannot take statements contained in counsel's exceptions or assertions contained in his brief as an equivalent of facts which should be established of record. So far as the record shows, plaintiff's counsel may have had notice of the decision the day the same was rendered. At least there is no showing, and we cannot presume to the contrary. If the facts are as counsel contends in his brief, the situation is unfortunate. The plaintiff was clearly entitled to his costs, unless he waived them by neglecting to file his bill in time. The costs in this case are a very material item. For the plaintiff to have to pay them, under the circumstances of this case, imposes a heavy burden upon him, and takes from him, in a large measure, the benefits of the court's decision; for the costs represent a considerable portion of the value of the property involved. Where courts render decisions in the absence of counsel, they should be particularly careful to direct that notice be promptly given to the attorneys of the parties. The court made such an order in this case. The clerk should have promptly notified counsel, and the presumption is that he did so. The statutes of many of the states allow counsel for the prevailing party a certain time after notice of the decision in which to file the cost bill. An amendment of our statute in this particular would, we think, be advantageous to litigants.

The several orders of the trial court appealed from are affirmed.

The fact that some of the jury in a civil case, during the trial, but before they were instructed and placed in the custody of an officer to consider the verdict, became separated and were not in the custody of the officer, is not ground for reversal, where it does not appear that any juror was improperly influenced, nor that any effort was made to prejudice the rights of the complaining party, nor that any of his rights were prejudiced by the separation.

Appeal from District Court, Elko County.

Proceeding by W. T. Hitt to probate the will of Mary Abel. From a judgment for J. D. Abel, contestant, denying the probate, proponent appeals. Affirmed.

Mack & Farrington, E. J. L. Taber, and C. B. Henderson, for appellant. Cheney, Massey & Price and M. S. Wilson, for respondent.

SWEENEY, J. This is an appeal from a judgment and order denying a motion for a new trial rendered in the district court of the Fourth judicial district of the state of Nevada in and for the county of Elko in a will contest wherein W. T. Hitt, proponent and executor of the estate of Mary Abel, deceased, was successfully sued by J. D. Abel, contestant and respondent in this action. It appears from the record that Mary Abel died on or about the 13th day of March, 1904, at Elko, Nev., leaving an estate in said county consisting of real and personal property. At the time of her death she was 67 years of age, and had been married to her husband, now 83 years of age, since 1873. There were no children born to them. The appellant, W. T. Hitt, four days after the death of the deceased, filed in the said district court of Elko county what purported to be the last will and testament of Mary Abel, and duly petitioned the court to probate the same. Within due time the husband, respondent in this action, filed a contest against the probate of said will, in which it was alleged that the purported will was not the last will and testament of the deceased, because as alleged at the date said will was signed the deceased was mentally incompetent to make a will, that the execution of said will was procured by undue influence of E. C. McClellan and his wife, witnesses thereto, and of Margaret Sheldon, a sister of the deceased. Upon the issues made by the petition for probate and the objections filed by the contestant, the cause came on regularly for trial on the 12th day of January, 1905, before the court, with the aid of a jury. Numerous witnesses were called and sworn, the cause was argued, the jury instructed, and under instructions given by the court returned a general verdict in favor of the contestant. Nine special issues were submitted to the jury, with instructions to return answers to the same. They were as follows: "(1) Did Mary Abel sign the instrument which has been offered in evidence as her last will and testament? A. Yes. (2) Did Mary Abel sign said instrument in the presence of E. C. McClellan and Eleanor A. McClellan? A. Yes. (3) Did Mary Abel, at the time she signed said instrument, if she did sign it, say it was her will? A. Yes. (4) Did E. C. McClellan and Eleanor A. McClellan sign said instrument in the presence of Mary Abel, as witness thereto? A. Yes. (5) Was Mary Abel of sound mind and disposing memory at the time the proposed will was signed? A. No. (6) Was Mary Abel acting under undue influence at the time the proposed will was made? A. Yes. (7) Did Mary Abel, at the time of signing the alleged will, if she did sign it, have sufficient mental [G. S. B.] capacity to recollect the property she intended to dispose of? A. No. (8) Did Mary Abel, at the time of the signing the alleged will, if she did sign it, have sufficient mental capacity to recollect the people who were the natural objects of her bounty? A. No. (9) Was any of the property mentioned in the proposed will the separate property of Mary Abel at the time of her death? A. Yes." Upon the rendition of the verdict by the jury, judgment was entered by the court decreeing that the instrument was not the last will and testament of Mary Abel, deceased, and refusing to admit the same to probate.

Appellant urges that a new trial should be granted, assigning many alleged errors, a number of which we deem harmless, even though conceded to be errors, but which apparently counsel have abandoned, and for these reasons we will not refer to them in this opinion, confining our attention solely to the main alleged errors urged. Appellant contends that the testimony was insufficient to support the verdict as to undue influence, and contends that there is no testimony tending to support the special finding that Mary Abel was acting under undue influence when she executed the will. A careful review of the testimony in this case leads us to conclude that the court and jury had ample evidence, though conflicting in certain respects, upon which to base their verdict. It appears from the testimony that the deceased was under the constant care and attention of physicians, and confined to her home for more than six months prior to the execution of the will; that her condition was so precarious as to require the care of a number of nurses; that the deceased was an elderly woman 67 years of age, weighing over 200 pounds, and during the latter months of her sickness was almost constantly under the influence of opiates for the purpose of allaying the intense pain to which she was subjected; that the disease with which she was afflicted had caused her limbs to become so swollen that it became necessary to split them open with a surgeon's knife. Her husband, the contestant, who was assisting in her care during her last sickness, and was almost constantly in attendance upon her, and who had lived with her for nearly 40 years, testified that her mind was apparently blank at times, and that she was unable to recognize him, and during the latter months of her life her mental condition was failing and very bad all the time; that the expression on her face was very simple, at times idiotic, and that her mind seemed a blank. Another witness who rented a small house from the deceased adjoining her house and who during January, the month the alleged will was executed, saw the deceased two or three times a day, testified that deceased was insane on the 15th of January, and that on the date the will was executed she was no better mentally or physically; that at the time the will was executed and for some time prior thereto she was always in a stupor, and used language which indicated she was mentally unbalanced. This evidence is supported by the testimony of Mrs. Keith, Mrs. Haywood, and Mrs. Watkins, and contradicted to a limited extent by a few reputable witnesses for the appellant. Other witnesses in behalf of the proponent testified in effect that while she was ailing physically and mentally, yet she had a clear mind and disposing memory; but from all the testimony on both sides it appears plain that the mental condition of deceased was very weak at the time she executed the will, and that the jury and judge who passed judgment in this case were thoroughly warranted in finding that at the time of the execution of the alleged will Mary Abel was not of sound mind and of disposing memory.

It appears from the testimony that the purported will was prepared by E. C. McClellan, a notary public, some three or four days before the date of the execution of the same; that Mr. McClellan and his wife were the only persons present at the time of the execution of the will, and that Mrs. McClellan had urged the deceased to make a will; that the McClellans were intimate friends of Mrs. Sheldon, who is charged in part with the procurement of this will in her favor; that the McClellans lived about 90 feet from the home of Mrs. Abel, and were social and intimate friends and called daily on the deceased; that on the day when the will was executed Mrs. McClellan waited with Mrs. Sheldon until the nurse and Mr. Abel had left the house, and there was no one present at the home save Mrs. Sheldon, who, during the time the will was being executed, was out on the porch and had Mr. McClellan bring over the typewritten will which he had prepared for execution; that there was no one present at the time of the execution of the will save Mr. McClellan and his wife, who signed as witnesses to said will; that there was not a word changed in the typewritten will by Mrs. Abel, and the signature to said will discloses a signature which, if not connected with the will itself, would be impossible to recognize as the signature of Mary Abel; that the deceased was either so weak mentally or physically that she did not know how to spell her own name correctly.

Many exhibits were introduced showing the signature of Mary Abel to checks and letters which were submitted to the jury for comparison with that of the signature attached to the purported will. These checks and signatures were written at different periods just prior to the execution of the will. It appears from the evidence that it was her custom to sign in a plain, firm hand, and all her signatures prior to a couple of months before the execution of the will were in a firm, plain hand; that her signatures to different exhibits written after January 7, 1904, evidenced physical, if not mental, decay, and that the jury assumed from the signature to the will, which did not even spell her name properly, omitting one of the letters in the last name, that physically and mentally she was in such a condition that she did not know what she was doing and did not possess the requisite ingredients of mind necessary to dispose of her property. The evidence submitted to the court and jury upon the mental weakness of the deceased was sufficient for them to have found, notwithstanding the conflicting testimony, that the deceased was incompetent and of unsound mind at the time of the execution of the will.

On the day the will was executed, Mr. McClellan testified that he was home all day, and that his wife had informed him that the respondent and the nurse had left the Abel house; that he knew that Mrs. Abel had been sick for six months before she signed the will, and that he had prepared the will upon the information of and solicitation by his wife, Mrs. McClellan, who the evidence discloses was the intimate friend of Mrs. Sheldon, the beneficiary under the will; that he had this typewritten will prepared for several days before it was signed; that he was intimately acquainted with Mrs. Sheldon, who often visited his home, and nearly always talked about the proposed will; that Mrs. Sheldon was at the Abel house when he went there, and on the front porch of said house when he left after the alleged execution of the will; that he never told Mr. Abel, the contestant, anything about the will; that Mrs. Abel never gave him any instructions about the contents of the will, and that after it was executed he delivered it to Mrs. Sheldon; that at the time of the execution of the alleged will Mrs. Abel said nothing about any of her other relatives.

This condition of affairs existing, and the circumstances under which the will was prepared, and the execution of the same, were facts which also warranted the court and jury in finding that Mary Abel at the time the alleged will was executed was acting under undue influence, and that she did not have sufficient mental capacity to recollect the property she intended to dispose of, nor to recollect the people who were the natural objects of her bounty, and was otherwise mentally incompetent to execute a will. There are many respectable authorities holding that in will contest cases, when the question as to the correctness of the verdict in view of the evidence is raised in the appellate court, the verdict will not be set aside unless there is clearly a legal insufficiency in the evidence to sustain the verdict. Smith v. Henline, 174 Ill. 184, 51 N. E. 227; Harp v. Parr, 168 Ill. 459, 48 N. E. 113; White v. Cole (Ky.) 47 S. W. 759; Coates v. Semper, 82 Minn. 460, 85 N. W. 217; Crossan v. Crossan, 169 Mo. 631, 70 S. W. 136; In re Watson, 131 N. Y. 587, 30 N. E. 56; In re Voorhis' Will, 125 N. Y. 765, 26 N. E. 935; In re Elmer's Will, 88 Hun (N. Y.) 290, 34 N. Y. Supp. 406; Robinson v. Robinson, 203 Pa. 400, 53 Atl. 253. And particularly has this been held to be the rule when the trial court has declined to interfere. Petefish v. Becker, 176 Ill. 448, 52 N. E. 71; In re Allison's Estate, 104 Iowa, 130, 73 N. W. 489; Gardner on Wills, p. 332. However in this case the record discloses no such showing for appellant. But this court has repeatedly held that, where there is substantial evidence to support a judgment or verdict, even though the evidence to a degree be conflicting, it will not disturb such verdict or judgment, and in the present case we believe the transcript discloses that such substantial evidence exists, and hold accordingly.

Appellant further urges as reversible error misconduct of the jury. It appears from the affidavits of three of counsel for appellant that during the progress of the trial, but not after the jury were instructed and placed in the custody of an officer to consider the verdict, some of the jury became separated, and were not in the custody of the officer. It is not claimed by the appellant that the jury was allowed to separate after the instructions of the court had been given and while they were considering their verdict, nor is it shown or claimed by said affidavits that at the times said jurymen were separated or out of the custody of the officer that any jurymen had been tampered with or improperly influenced, or at all, or that any effort had been made to prejudice the rights of appellant, nor is it claimed or maintained that because of such separation any of the rights of appellant were prejudiced, nor because of this separation that they were damaged in any way. While there are some authorities, in criminal cases, which hold that this would be proper ground for reversal, we are unable to find any which would make this reversible error in a civil case, under the circumstances of the present case, where it is not claimed that because of a mere separation of the jury any injury or damage was suffered by appellant. When, during the trial of a case in the lower court, the court enters an order that the jury remain together, they should do so, and the jurymen should not be allowed to become separated, even before the instructions are given by the court and the case put into their hands to consider their verdict; but, under the circumstances of the present case, where no damage is alleged to have arisen from such separation, nor where it is not shown that the jurors were tampered with or improperly influenced, or at all, and none of the circumstances indicate any rights were violated or damage suffered, we do not believe it to be reversible error. 17 Encyc. of Law (2d Ed.) pp. 1227, 1228. The authorities cited by appellant are not in point, for the reason that those cases wherein judgment had been reversed, because of the separation of the jury, applied to cases where the jury had retired after being instructed by the court to consider their verdict. In another case cited by appellant a judgment was reversed because of an improper separation during the trial of a criminal action, wherein, during the progress of the trial, a jurymen became separated from the jury, and without the custody of the sheriff; the court holding that the mere fact of his separation in such a case, as distinguished from a civil case, was ground for reversal, unless the presumption is sufficiently rebutted that the juror was not improperly influenced or tampered with, or that the appellant's rights were prejudiced or suffered harm. 17 Encyc. of Law (2d Ed.) 1227. At any rate, in the present case, it being an action wherein a verdict of a jury is merely advisory, the court was not bound by the verdict. The court in the present case could either have accepted the findings of the jury, and accepted its verdict, or set them aside and acted on its own judgment, as it saw fit. In the present case the court saw fit to accept the verdict and findings of the jury and entered judgment against the proponent. Nev. Comp. Laws, §§ 2803, 2805, 3038, 3067; 16 Ency. P. & P. 1042-1043.

This same observation with reference to the jury being improperly influenced or prejudiced is equally applicable to the error assigned by appellant's counsel of certain improper language and argument alleged to have been used by Attorney Massey, one of the chief counsel for contestant, in his argument before the jury. The court evidently, in passing its own judgment, did not consider the language complained of sufficiently harmful or injurious to warrant a judgment otherwise than be rendered. Lake v. Tolles, 8 Nev. 285; Duffy v. Moran, 12 Nev. 97; Van Fleet v. Olin, 4 Nev. 95, 97 Am. Dec. 513. In other jurisdictions where the verdict of a jury is merely advisory in a will contest, as it is in the present case under consideration, the rule prevails, as in this state, that the verdicts of juries are merely advisory, and can be totally disregarded or accepted as a trial court decides. Bryant v. Pierce, 95 Wis. 331, 70 N. W. 297; In re Jackman's Will, 28 Wis. 104; Chafin Will Case, 32 Wis. 569; Wright v. Jackson, 59 Wis. 584, 18 N. W. 486; Loughney v. Loughney, 87 Wis. 101, 58 N. W. 250; Fay v. Vanderford, 154 Mass. 498, 28 N. E. 631; Newell v. Homer, 120 Mass. 277; Hudson v. Hughan, 56 Kan. 152, 42 Pac. 701.

After a careful review of the transcript on appeal, the bill of exceptions, and authorities presented, we are of the opinion that the judgment should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

TALBOT, O. J., and NORCROSS, J. We concur in the judgment and in the opinion of SWEENEY, J., except in so far as it holds that the verdict of the jury is simply advisory, and as to that portion of the opinion which may bear on the provisions of Comp. Laws, §§ 2803, 2905, 3033, and 3067, we express no views, as we do not consider the question necessarily involved.

TALBOT, O. J. About 2½ months before the day set for the hearing a stipulation was filed allowing the appellant 30 days additional in which to file his opening brief, if his time for that purpose had not already expired. No one appeared on the part of the appellant at the hearing, and no brief was filed on his behalf until more than a month after the hearing, when, without any stipulation or order authorizing it, one was filed setting up a question to which no exception had been taken in the trial court, and regarding which no assignment of error had been made. Under these circumstances, and as often held by this court in Matthewson v.

Boyle, 20 Nev. 88, 16 Pac. 434, Goodhue v. Shedd, 17 Nev. 141, 30 Pac. 695, State v. Myatt, 10 Nev. 166, Gardner v. Gardner, 23 Nev. 214, 45 Pac. 139, and other cases, the judgment of the district court is affirmed by reason of appellant's failure to prosecute the appeal.

ST. BENEDICT'S ABBEY v. MARION COUNTY et al.

(Supreme Court of Oregon. Jan. 7, 1908.)

1. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—DUE PROCESS OF LAW—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS—ASSESSMENT OF BENEFITS.

The Legislature may authorize a municipality to assess the expenses of street improvements on property benefited thereby, and such assessment is not a taking of property without due process of law, where the property owner is given an opportunity to be heard before the assessment is made.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 10, Constitutional Law, §§ 870-875.]

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—TAXATION—EQUALITY—STREET ASSESSMENTS.

A statute authorizing a municipality to assess the expenses of street improvements on property benefited thereby does not violate the constitutional provision that taxation shall be equal and uniform.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 36, Municipal Corporations, § 1004.]

3. STATUTES—"LOCAL STATUTE."

Within Const. art. 4, § 23, subd. 10, forbidding the enactment of special or local laws for the assessment and collection of taxes for state, county, township, or road purposes, Act Nov. 22, 1905 (Laws 1905, p. 410), providing for the improvement of roads at the expense of the lands benefited thereby on petition of a majority of the resident landowners, etc., is general and applicable throughout the state, and is not a local statute applicable only to a particular locality or limited part of the state and the inhabitants of that part, though its operation is contingent, depending on the wish of the landowners in the vicinity of a proposed improvement and the existence of certain conditions.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 44, Statutes, §§ 108, 109.]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 5, pp. 4208-4213.]

4. HIGHWAYS—ROAD IMPROVEMENTS—ASSESSMENTS—BENEFITS.

The expenses of road improvements can be assessed against lands benefited only in proportion to benefits, and an act authorizing the assessment of a portion of the expense without reference to benefits is invalid.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 25, Highways, § 390.]

5. SAME.

Act Nov. 22, 1905 (Laws 1905, p. 410), providing for the improvement of roads, the expenses of which are to be assessed on real estate adjacent thereto and benefited thereby, according to the benefits, etc., limits the assessment to lands benefited by the improvement, and in proportion to such benefits and is valid.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 25, Highways, §§ 390-393.]

6. SAME—BENEFIT DISTRICTS.

The Legislature, in providing for the payment of road improvements by assessment on property benefited, may fix the sum to be raised, and prescribe the benefit district, or it may delegate one or both of the questions to a local body.

7. SAME.

The Legislature has a wide discretion in providing for road improvements at the cost of property benefited and prescribing the taxing district and delegating to local boards of viewers power to determine the extent of the benefits and the manner of apportioning the expense, and its action will not be disturbed, unless it clearly appears that it has exceeded its constitutional authority, its taxing power being unlimited except as restricted by the federal Constitution.

8. SAME—"ROAD."

The word "road" in Act Nov. 22, 1905 (Laws 1905, p. 414) § 7, providing that where any "road" has been constructed under the act providing for the improvement of roads at the expense of the property benefited thereby, and another "road" shall be thereafter constructed within four miles thereof, the amount to be assessed against all lands included within the overlapping two-mile lines of each road shall be equitably determined by the county court, on the report of the viewers and appraisers, means the portion improved, and the improvement of any other portion of the same road is another road, and lands within the overlap are protected from unequal burdens.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 7, pp. 6250-6254.]

9. SAME.

Since Act Nov. 22, 1905 (Laws 1905, p. 410), providing for the improvement of roads at the cost of lands benefited thereby, gives a landowner within the taxing district opportunity to question the action of viewers as to whether his land is benefited, or as to how much it may be benefited, and as to whether the assessment on his land is proportionate to the benefits, and gives him a right to appeal to the circuit court, equity will not interfere, unless the method adopted in estimating the benefits and assessing the expenses amounts to a fraud on him, the remedy provided by the statute being otherwise exclusive.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Marion County; William Galloway, Judge.

Suit by St. Benedict's Abbey against Marion county and others. From a decree for plaintiff, defendants appeals. Reversed and rendered.

This is a suit in equity to enjoin the improvement of a county road and to prevent the assessment of any portion of the expense thereof upon plaintiff's lands. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained by the lower court, and decree rendered granting a perpetual injunction against defendant, and it appeals. Based upon the petition of landowners along the line of what is known as the "Silverton-Marquam Road" asking for the improvement of a portion of said road, the county court of Marion county, on about March 9, 1906, commenced proceedings to improve said road, under the provisions of an act of the legislative assembly of the state of Oregon, of date November 22, 1905 (Laws 1905, p. 410), providing for the improvement of roads at the expense of the lands benefited thereby. Viewers were appointed under the provisions of the said act, who proceeded to and did estimate the cost of said improvement to be $23,746.10, and also estimated the value of benefits to all lands within the two-mile limit to be $47,492.20, and in their report to the court itemized such benefits and the apportionment of such expenses by setting opposite the name of each person the description of his land subject thereto, the classification thereof, according to benefits thereby to be derived, the number of acres in each classification, and the estimated benefits and apportionment of expenses thereto. In estimating the benefits, they classified the land as to its relative location to the road and as to its quality, and attempted to make such apportionment of expense according to benefits, which resulted in the assessment of $479 against the lands of plaintiff; and on July 25, 1907, the county court, after disallowing the remonstrances that had been filed to the action of the viewers, approved their report, and ordered the improvement made, the enforcement of which decree of the county court is the proceedings sought to be enjoined.

C. L. McNary, for appellants. A. M. Cannon, for respondent.

EAKIN, J. (after stating the facts as above). The road act in question authorizes county courts to improve any county road by grading, graveling, macadamizing, etc., the same; and to appoint viewers to estimate the cost and expense of the proposed improvement and the benefits to the land within the taxing district; and that the costs and expenses thereof be paid by assessment on the real estate adjacent thereto and benefited thereby within two miles on either side and one mile beyond the terminus of such improvement, in proportion to the benefits to be derived therefrom; and to apportion the estimated costs and expenses of the improvement upon said lands according to the benefits derived therefrom, including the lots in any incorporated city or town.

It is also provided by section 6 that the owner of any lands affected by the work proposed may remonstrate against the report of the viewers for the following causes: "(1) That the report of the viewers is not according to law; (2) that the lands of the party filing the remonstrance are not benefited, or are assessed too much as compared with other lands assessed as benefited, specifying such lands; (3) that the lands of the party filing the remonstrance are damaged, or that the damages assessed are inadequate; (4) that it is not practical to accomplish the proposed work without an expense exceeding the aggregate benefits; (5) that the proposed work will not be of public utility or convenience." Also section 6 further provides that the issues raised by such remonstrance shall be tried by the county court, and, if it finds for the remonstrants upon the fourth or fifth cause thereof, the proceeding shall be dismissed at the cost of petitioners, and if resident owners of lands affected by such proposed improvements, upon which more than two-thirds of the aggregate assessment for benefits has been made, shall remonstrate against said petition for the fifth cause of remonstrance, the said petition shall be dismissed, and if the court finds for the remonstrants for the first, second, or third cause, it shall modify the report accordingly. By section 14 appeal to the circuit court may be taken by remonstrants from the decision of the county court upon any of the first three causes of remonstrance, and the issues therein tried by a jury. That the Legislature may authorize a municipality to assess the expense of the improvement of streets upon the property benefited thereby, and that such assessment is not a taking of property without due process of law, if the property owner has had an opportunity to be heard before the assessment is made, has been frequently held by this court. Nor is such an act a violation of the constitutional provision that taxation shall be equal and uniform. King v. City of Portland, 2 Or. 146; Masters v. City of Portland, 24 Or. 161, 33 Pac. 540; Wilson v. City of Salem, 24 Or. 504, 34 Pac. 9, 691; Elliott, Roads & Streets (2d Ed.) § 543; Cooley, Taxation (2d Ed.) pp. 634-636. This principle is recognized in many other Oregon cases; but, as applied to rural highways, it is contended that the act violates the provision of subdivision 10 of section 23 of article 4 of the Constitution, which provides that the Legislature shall not pass special or local laws "for the assessment and collection of taxes for state, county, township, or road purposes." It cannot be seriously contended that this law is local. It is, by its terms, general and applicable throughout the state, and may be invoked for any road, for the improvement of which a majority of the resident landowners of the county, whose lands are within the taxing district, may petition. A local statute is one which applies only to a particular locality or limited part of the state, and the inhabitants of that part. An act relating to a particular road in Tillamook county was held to be void in Maxwell v. Tillamook County, 20 Or. 495, 26 Pac. 803, because it was applicable only to the one road and was clearly local. In Ellis v. Frazier, 38 Or. 462, 63 Pac. 642, 53 L. R. A. 454, the bicycle tax law was held to be local and special, for the reason that it applied only to a few counties. But a law is not local or special that is applicable throughout the state, even though its operation in any locality is made to depend upon a local contingency, or a particular expediency to be ascertained or determined by a public vote in the locality or by petition, or adjudication of a court or other authority authorized by the act. It is, nevertheless, open to every locality when brought within its terms. This is the holding in Fouts v. Hood River, 46 Or. 492, 81 Pac. 370, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 483, Baxter v.

State (Or.) 88 Pac. 677, Goodrich v. Winchester & Deerfield Turnpike Co., 26 Ind. 119, Palmer v. Stumph, 29 Ind. 329, and Paul v. Gloucester County, 50 N. J. Law, 585, 15 Atl. 272, 1 L. R. A. 86. The Indiana "act concerning gravel and macadamized roads" (Laws of 1903, p. 255, c. 145) is almost identical with the one under consideration, and the Constitution of that state prohibits local laws for the assessment and collection of taxes for road purposes. There it was held that an earlier law of like import is general in its provisions and open to all the citizens of the state to avail themselves of its benefits. Goodrich v. Winchester & Deerfield Turnpike Co., supra; Bowlin v. Cochran et al., 161 Ind. 486, 69 N. E. 153. Statutes in other states authorizing special assessments upon the property benefited for the expense of the improvement of rural highways or drainage districts are upheld. 25 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, 1183; Lewis et al. v. Laylin et al., 46 Ohio St. 663, 23 N. E. 288; Williams v. Cammack, 27 Miss. 209, 61 Am. Dec. 508; Graham, etc., v. Conger, etc., 85 Ky. 582, 4 S. W. 327; Malchus v. District of Highlands, 4 Bush (Ky.) 547. The operation of this statute is contingent, depending upon the wish of a majority of the landowners in the vicinity of any proposed improvement and upon the existence of certain conditions, but it is applicable in every portion of the state alike when the contingencies are met.

It is also contended that the act authorizes the assessment of a portion of the expense of the improvement against plaintiff's property without reference to benefits. It is certain that the expense of such improvements can be assessed only against lands benefited, and it must be apportioned according to such benefits. O. & C. R. Co. v. Portland, 25 Or. 229, 35 Pac. 452, 22 L. R. A. 713; King v. Portland, 38 Or. 402, 63 Pac. 2, 55 L. R. A. 812; Elliott, Roads & Streets (2d Ed.) 542. But this statute is not subject to the criticism that it authorizes such assessment in excess of benefits. The act relates to improvements, the expenses for which are to be assessed "upon real estate adjacent thereto and benefited thereby." This is expressed in section 2 of the act, as well as in the title. In section 2 the viewers are directed to "make an estimate of the value of the benefits to all lands within two miles of such improvements, and if the said viewers and appraisers find that such improvement will be of public utility and convenience, and that the costs or expenses thereof, including damages caused landowners thereby, will be less than the benefit to the lands within two miles on either side and one mile beyond the terminus of such improvement, they shall apportion the estimated costs, expenses, and damages upon all the said lands within two miles on either side, and one mile beyond the terminus, that are benefited, according to the benefits to be derived therefrom." Thus the act clearly contemplates limiting the assessment to lands benefited and in proportion to such benefits.

It is also objected that the limits of the taxing district are fixed arbitrarily by the Legislature, and do not include all lands benefited. It is within the power of the Legislature to fix the sum to be raised, and also to prescribe the benefited district, or they may delegate one or both of these questions to a local board or body. King v. Portland, supra; Spencer v. Merchant, 125 U. S. 345, 8 Sup. Ct. 921, 31 L. Ed. 763; Id., 100 N. Y. 585, 3 N. E. 682; Bauman v. Ross, 167 U. S. 548, 17 Sup. Ct. 966, 42 L. Ed. 270; Williams v. Eggleston, 170 U. S. 304, 18 Sup. Ct. 617, 42 L. Ed. 1047. The Legislature has prescribed the taxing district and delegated to a local board of viewers power to determine the extent of the benefits and the manner of apportioning the expense, and it has a wide discretion in describing the taxing district, and its action will not be disturbed, except where it clearly appears that it has exceeded its constitutional authority. Its taxing power is unlimited, except as restricted by the federal Constitution, and it may authorize local improvements to be made at the expense of the lands benefited. As said in Spencer v. Merchant, 100 N. Y. 585, 3 N. E. 682, "The Legislature may commit the ascertainment of the sum to be raised and of the benefited district to commissioners, but is not bound to do so, and may settle both questions for itself; and when it does so its action is necessarily conclusive and beyond review." This question is exhaustively treated by Mr. Justice Wolverton, in King v. Portland, 38 Or. 402, 63 Pac. 2, 55 L. R. A. 812, and he concludes: "The authority of the Legislature in these respects is almost without limit. Yet that there is a limit beyond which it cannot go all will concede. When, however, it has exercised its legislative discretion, and prescribed a district and adopted a method, it ought to be plain and indisputable that it has exceeded its constitutional authority before the court should undertake to set at naught its declared will." There is nothing suggested in the case before us that indicates that the Legislature has exceeded its authority in fixing the taxing district.

It is also urged that lands assessed for one improvement are unequally burdened in case of a further improvement overlapping the first taxing district. By section 7 of the act (page 414) it is provided: "And in all cases where any road has been constructed under this act, and another road shall be thereafter, under the provisions of this act, constructed within four miles thereof, the amount to be assessed against all lands included within the overlapping two-mile lines of each road shall be equitably determined by the county court, upon the report of said viewers and appraisers, to the end that such lands shall pay only a just and equitable proportion of the cost of constructing each road compared with other lands not within such overlap." The term "road," as used here, undoubtedly means the portion improved, and the improvement of any other portion of the same road would be another road within the meaning of this act, and therefore lands within such overlap are protected from unequal burdens. If the portion of the viewers' report that is in the transcript correctly states the method of computing the assessment against the lands benefited, it would seem to be erroneous in so computing a certain proportion of the total expense against each class regardless of the acreage in such class; but it does not appear how plaintiff's lands are classified, or that they are injuriously affected, and such errors are not for correction in this court. Ample opportunity is afforded a landowner within the taxing district to question the action of the viewers as to whether his land is benefited at all, or as to how much it may be benefited, and as to whether the assessment on his land is proportionate to its benefits, and he has a right to appeal to the circuit court from the action of the county court as to these questions, and that remedy is exclusive, unless it is obvious from the circumstances of the case that the plan or method adopted in estimating the benefits and assessing the expenses amounts to a fraud upon him. Equity will not review the action of the Legislature in fixing the taxing district, or of the viewers in estimating the value of benefits to lands within the taxing district or in apportioning the expense of the improvement, except where it is plain that the constitutional authority of the Legislature has been exceeded. The one is the act of the Legislature itself, and the other the exercise of a delegated power, and hence the power and discretion of the viewers are coextensive with that of the Legislature while acting within the terms of the act, and, as said by Mr. Justice Moore in O. & C. R. Co. v. Portland, 25 Or. 229, 35 Pac. 452, 22 L. R. A. 713, "these are questions of policy with which the Legislature and its creature, the municipal corporation, deals, and the courts have no right to interfere, except in case of fraud or oppression, or some wrong constituting a plain abuse of such discretion."

Therefore the court erred in overruling the demurrer to the complaint, and the decree will be reversed, and decree rendered here dismissing the suit.

(50 Or. 419)

CUSITER v. CITY OF SILVERTON et al.
(Supreme Court of Oregon. Jan. 16, 1908.)

1. CERTIORARI—RETURN—CONCLUSIVENESS.

The return on a writ of review to review judicial proceedings is conclusive as to the facts. [Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 9, Certiorari, §§ 143-144.]

2. SAME.

The return on a writ of review to review proceedings of the recorder's court of a city on a trial for the violation of a municipal ordinance showed that accused demanded a jury, and that, the court having no list of jurors in accordance with B. & C. Comp. § 2251 et seq., ordered an officer to select jurors, and that accused objected to the manner of selecting a jury, and filed a motion that a jury be selected from the jury list. Held to show that accused, at the time of his demand for a jury, demanded, as expressly authorized by section 2257, a jury from the jury list, and the court could not direct an officer to select a jury.

3. JURY—SELECTION—JUSTICES' COURTS.

Where a party, as authorized by B. & C. Comp. § 2237, demands a jury selected from the jury list, provided for by section 2251 et seq., the court cannot, over the objections of such party, direct an officer to summon a jury as authorized by sections 2221, 2222, though the court has no jury list.

4. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—VIOLATION OF ORDINANCE—APPEAL.

Where the error of the court on a prosecution for the violation of a municipal ordinance resulted from exceeding its jurisdiction in directing an officer to summon a jury, notwithstanding the demand of accused for a jury from the jury list, the error amounted to a mistrial only, and the cause, after conviction, must be remanded for new trial.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Marion County; William Galloway, Judge.

Writ of review by George A. Cusiter against the city of Silverton and another to review proceedings of the city recorder's court. From a judgment for petitioner, defendants appeal. Modified and remanded.

This action was brought to review the proceedings of the recorder's court of the city of Silverton, wherein the petitioner was charged with the violation of an ordinance to prevent the obstruction of streets and to prohibit throwing rubbish into streets, and imposing a fine for a violation thereof. It is averred in the petition that the complaint was made and filed on November 21, 1906; that on that date plaintiff was arrested and entered a plea of not guilty, whereupon the trial was set for December 10, 1906; that it was then continued until December 15, 1906, at the hour of 10 o'clock a. m., at which time plaintiff demanded a trial by jury and deposited the required jury fee, and also demanded that a jury be selected from the regular jury list, and be drawn from the jury box of said court; that the court denied plaintiff's demand for a selected jury, but issued an order to the city marshal to summon six citizens of the city of Silverton as jurors in said cause, which he did. Whereupon plaintiff filed written objections to the trial of the cause by the jury so drawn, and objected to each and every member of the jury for reasons particularly specified and set forth. Notwithstanding his objections, plaintiff was tried before the jury thus drawn, convicted of the charge, and sentenced by the court to pay a fine of $10 and the costs of the action. Upon the return to the writ being filed, defendants herein filed a motion to dismiss the writ and affirm the proceedings of the trial court, but also asked that, in the event the court should be of the opinion that the recorder's court exceeded its jurisdiction in refusing plaintiff's request for a selected jury, the cause be remanded to the lower court, with directions to allow plaintiff's request. Upon the hearing the circuit court denied defendant's motion, sustained the petition, and set aside the judgment, but made no order remanding the cause for further proceedings. From this judgment, defendants appeal.

Geo. G. Bingham, for appellants. L. H. McMahon, for respondent.

SLATER, C. (after stating the facts as above). The invalidity of the judgment is based upon the charge that plaintiff was tried over his objection before a jury summoned by the officer of the court, instead of being drawn and selected from the regular jury list, as demanded by him. The charter of the city of Silverton provides, in substance, that the city recorder shall be ex officio police judge, and the judicial officer of the corporation, and shall hold court, which shall be known as "police court"; that he shall have jurisdiction of all crimes defined by ordinance, and the jurisdiction and authority of a justice of the peace, and he shall be subject to the general laws prescribing the duties of justices of the peace; that in all criminal cases before him, including all violation of city ordinances, he shall be governed by the general laws of the state governing justices of the peace in similar cases, but in the proceedings for violation of city ordinances the trial shall be without a jury, unless the defendant, on demanding a jury, shall deposit a sum sufficient to pay the per diem for the jury for one day. The general laws governing trials and proceedings in criminal actions in justices' courts provide that upon a plea other than a plea of guilty, if the defendant does not then demand a trial by jury, the justice must proceed to try the issue (section 2270, B. & C. Comp.), and, if a trial by jury be demanded, a jury must be selected and summoned as in a civil action in a justice's court (section 2271, B. & C. Comp.). In chapter 5, B. & C. Comp., relating to actions and proceedings in justices' courts in civil actions, it is found that each justice is required to have a jury list to be made by him on the first Monday in each year in the particular manner therein stated, from which juries are to be drawn for one year and until another list is selected; but, if for any reason the making of the jury list is omitted and neglected at the time designated, the same may be done on the first Monday of any month following to serve until the close of the year and until another is made. The justice is also required to keep a jury box, in which is to be placed separate ballots containing the name of each person on the jury list. When a right to a selected jury is established, it is to be drawn from this jury box; but section 2257, B. & C. Comp., provides that "when a jury is demanded in a justice's court instead of being selected by the officer as provided in chapter 6 of this act, such jury must be drawn and selected from the jury list of the precinct if either party require it." That section is a part of the original justice's act of 1864, and chapter 6 thereof, referred to in this section, provides another and different mode of obtaining a jury by it being selected by an officer on the order of the court, as was done in the case now under review. That chapter, however, was repealed by act of February 17, 1899 (Laws 1899, p. 119); but those provisions relating to the summoning of a jury by an officer were re-enacted by the repealing act and now appear as sections 2221-2222, in chapter 3 of the Justice's Code (B. & C. Comp. §§ 2221-2222).

It is contended by appellants that, to entitle a party to a selected jury, he must not only demand a jury, but, by the provisions of section 2257, supra, must also at the same time demand that it be drawn and selected from the jury list of the precinct; and the respondent seems to concede that to be the law. Appellants also contend that the demand of defendant, in the action for a selected jury was not in time, because it is claimed it was not made by him when he demanded a jury, but after the jury chosen and summoned by the officer had appeared. This claim is resisted by the plaintiff in the writ, who asserts that his demand for a selected jury was made at the time he demanded the jury. This issue must be determined by the return on the writ, which is conclusive. It contains a transcript of the orders of the court and minutes of the trial, which substantially confirm the averments of the petition. It appears therefrom that on December 15, 1906, at the hour of 7 p. m., the time set for the trial, defendant demanded a jury trial and deposited with the court the required amount as jury fee. Immediately succeeding the entry of this fact is the following: "The court had no selected list of jurors in a jury box in accordance with sections 2251, 2252, 2253, 2254, 2255, or 2256 of said Code, or otherwise, or at all. Whereupon the court issued an order to the chief of police of the city of Silverton, directing him to select six men, or a greater number, if any of those already selected should be rejected." Then follows a full copy of the order of the court, by the terms of which the jurors were to appear "at the hour of 7 p. m. of this day," which order was dated December 15, 1906. After this entry there is recorded the return of the officer, which is without date. Then follows this entry: "The defendant objected and protested against the above manner of selecting a jury, and filed his motion that a jury be drawn from a selected list of jurors and from a jury box, as required by sections 2251, 2252, 2253, 2254, 2255, or 2256 of the statutes of the state of Oregon." After overruling of defendant's motion, it is stated in the record that defendant filed his written objections, which are of the same import and are set out in full.

The record shows conclusively both a demand for a jury and for one selected from a jury list; but, because the entry of the order to the officer and his return thereon intervene between the record of the defendant's demand for a jury and for a selected jury, the conclusion is sought to be drawn that such demands were made at different times, and the latter one after the jury summoned by the officer had appeared. But the order in which these entries have been made is not conclusive that the facts evidenced by them occurred in that order, unless it were so stated in the record. A justice's record is not made in the precise and formal way and with such accuracy as that of a court of record. There is nothing affirmatively stated in this record to indicate at what precise relative time of the proceedings of that session of the court the above objections and protests of defendant and his demand for a selected jury were in fact made with reference to the other noted or recorded events of that evening. But the subject-matter of the entry would indicate that his demand for a selected jury must have preceded in time the order of the court to its officer to bring in a jury, and was coincident with his demand for a jury. If this is not the fact, why is it that the court thought it necessary to state in the record, as it did, that the reason for directing the officer to bring in a jury was that the court had no selected list of jurors in a jury box in accordance with certain sections of the Code? Is the court not there arguing against the right of a selected jury? The sections of the Code there enumerated, being the same sections enumerated by defendant in his demand for a selected jury and recorded later on, is also of some significance. The reason for this entry and its contents can be explained only upon the theory that a previous demand had been made by the defendant for a selected jury, as well as for a jury, but for want of a proper list that part of defendant's demand could not, in the opinion of the court, be allowed, whereupon, it is recorded, he issued the order to the officer. The fact that the trial court had no precinct jury list from which a jury may be drawn is not a valid reason for denying a proper demand by a party to the action for a selected jury. The statute gives that right to a defendant when he makes a proper demand, and the neglect of the court to have a precinct jury list or the convenience of the court in summoning a jury by its officer cannot serve to take away that right. It seems to have been conceded by the court that the defendant in the action was at least entitled to trial by a jury; and, if he were entitled to a jury at all and made the proper demand for a selected jury, which we think the record shows, he was entitled to have it selected as the law provided, and he could not be legally compelled, over his objections, to go to trial before a jury selected by the officer. The trial court, therefore, exceeded its jurisdiction in that respect, and the circuit court committed no error in setting the judgment aside.

The error of the trial court, however, was to the extent only of exceeding its jurisdiction in a particular matter of its procedure in the course of the trial of a cause of which it had jurisdiction as to the subject-matter as well as of the person of the defendant therein, and amounts to a mistrial. For this reason the judgment appealed from should be modified, and the cause remanded to the lower court, with instructions to remand to the trial court, with directions to set aside the judgment and take such other and further proceedings therein as may be proper. The petitioner should recover costs in this court.

BROWN v. CITY OF SILVERTON et al.

(Supreme Court of Oregon. Dec. 31, 1907.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Marion County; William Galloway, Judge.

Action by J. M. Brown against the city of Silverton and another to review the proceedings of the recorder's court. From a judgment for petitioner, defendants appeal. Modified and remanded.

Geo. G. Bingham, for appellants. L. H. McMahon, for respondent.

SLATER, C. The material facts being identical with the case of Cusiter v. City of Silverton, 93 Pac. 234, that case is controlling. Therefore the judgment appealed from should be modified, and the cause remanded to the lower court, with instructions to remand to the trial court, with directions to set aside the judgment and take such further proceedings therein as may be proper not inconsistent with this opinion. The petitioner should recover costs in this court.

STATE v. KLINE et al.

(Supreme Court of Oregon. Dec. 17, 1907.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW—CHANGE OF VENUE—AFFIDAVITS—NECESSITY—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Under B. & C. Comp. § 1250, providing that in an action for a felony, where the cause is at issue upon a question of fact, the court may order the place of trial to be changed, when it appears by affidavit, to the satisfaction of the court, that a fair and impartial trial cannot be had in the county, etc., a motion for a change of venue in an action for a felony, when a transfer of the cause is objected to, raises an issue which must be determined by the court from an inspection of affidavits.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 14, Criminal Law, §§ 251-253.]

2. SAME—APPEAL—RECORD—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—CONTENTS—AFFIDAVITS.

Affidavits for a change of venue must be incorporated in a bill of exceptions and transmitted to the Supreme Court in order to have the action of the trial court reviewed on appeal, if such action is assigned as error, and where such affidavits are merely certified by the clerk, it does not make them a part of the bill of exceptions, and alleged error in refusing to grant a change cannot be considered.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 13, Criminal Law, § 2925.]

3. SAME—SEPARATE TRIAL OF DEFENDANTS—MISDEMEANOR—STATUTORY PROVISIONS—REVIEW OF COURT'S DISCRETION.

Under B. & C. Comp. § 1305, providing that when two or more defendants are jointly indicted for a felony, any defendant requiring it must be tried separately, but that in other cases defendants jointly indicted may be tried separately or jointly, in the discretion of the court, refusal on appeal from justice's court to grant separate trials to persons charged with a misdemeanor, will not be held error, when the bill of exceptions does not show that the court abused its discretion.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 15, Criminal Law, § 3050.]

4. STATUTES—VETO POWER—ABSENCE OF CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS.

In a democratic form of government, the authority of an executive, to veto an enactment of the legislative department, is not an inherent power, and can be exercised only when sanctioned by a constitutional provision.

5. SAME—ENACTMENT—APPROVAL—CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS.

The amendment of Const. art. 4, § 1 (B. & C. Comp. p. 72), reserves to the people the initiative, the right to propose laws and amendments to the Constitution, and to enact or reject them at the polls, and the referendum, the right to approve or reject at the polls any act of the legislative assembly, and provides that the referendum may be ordered by petition or by the legislative assembly; also that the veto power of the Governor shall not extend to measures referred to the people. Const. art. 5, § 15, provides that every bill which shall have passed the legislative assembly shall be presented to the Governor for his approval before it becomes a law. Held, that a law proposed by petition and enacted by the people under the initiative need not be approved by the Governor.

6. CRIMINAL LAW—EVIDENCE—"PRIMA FACIE EVIDENCE."

"Prima facie evidence" is that degree of proof which, unexplained or uncontradicted, is by itself sufficient to establish the truth of a legal principle asserted by a party.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 6, pp. 5349, 5550.]

7. INTOXICATING LIQUORS—CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

Under the local option law (Laws 1905, p. 47, § 10), providing that the order of the county court declaring the result of a local option election shall be held to be prima facie evidence that all the provisions of the law have been complied with in giving notice, etc., the order of the county court is admissible in a criminal prosecution for violating that law, without introducing the petition, notices, etc., but the burden is on the accused to overcome such prima facie proof.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 29, Intoxicating Liquors, § 276.]

8. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—IMPAIRMENT OF VESTED RIGHTS—BURDEN OF PROOF—STATUTORY CRIMES.

The rule which imposes upon the defendant the burden of proof in a prosecution for a statutory crime does not violate any vested right which he possesses.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 10, Constitutional Law, § 261.]

9. CRIMINAL LAW—APPEAL—RECORD—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—MATTERS NOT INCLUDED.

Documentary evidence which is not made a part of the bill of exceptions cannot be considered on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 15, Criminal Law, § 2936.]

10. SAME—REVIEW—NECESSITY FOR PRESENTATION OF QUESTIONS IN TRIAL COURT.

The only questions brought up for review on appeal in a law action are such as have been properly submitted to and considered by the trial court.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 15, Criminal Law, § 2619.]

11. SAME—PRESUMPTIONS—NOTICE TO PRODUCE ORIGINAL DOCUMENT.

B. & C. Comp. § 703, subd. 1, provides that secondary evidence of the contents of a writing may be given when the original is in the possession of the party against whom it is offered, and he withholds it after receiving reasonable notice to produce it, as required by section 771. A bill of exceptions on appeal in a prosecution for violating the local option law showed that an internal revenue license was issued to defendants, and was in their possession, but it was not made to appear that any notice to produce it had been given to them. The only objection to parol proof of the contents of the license was that it was incompetent, immaterial, irrelevant, and not the best evidence. Held that, as want of notice was not suggested, it must be presumed in favor of the judgment rendered that testimony as to the demand to produce the license was duly given.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 15, Criminal Law, § 3029.]

12. SAME—ADMISSION OF MANUSCRIPT—ABSENCE FROM RECORD.

Where a manuscript sent up with a package of papers on appeal is not made a part of the bill of exceptions nor properly identified, it must be presumed that no error was committed in admitting it in evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 15, Criminal Law, § 2936.]

13. SAME—MATTERS NOT OF RECORD.

Where the bill of exceptions on an appeal from a conviction for violation of the local option law referred to a writing in the following terms: "Defendants offered in evidence articles of incorporation of the Corvallis Social & Athletic Club (marked 'Defendants' Exhibit D'), as follows: (Clerk print)"—and that was the only reference to the document, and the direction to print was not obeyed, though the articles of incorporation may have been included in a package of papers certified to by the clerk, it was not a part of the bill of exceptions, and when not identified by the trial judge it cannot be considered on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 15, Criminal Law, § 2936.]

14. INTOXICATING LIQUORS—CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS—SALE—INCORPORATED CLUB.

Under the local option law (Laws 1905, p. 48, § 15), forbidding under penalty any person in prohibition territory to sell, exchange, or give away, with intent to evade the provisions of the law, any intoxicating liquors whatsoever where intoxicating liquors are purchased by an incorporated society, and sold or distributed to the members at approximate cost, the act constituted a sale.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 29, Intoxicating Liquors, § 186.]

15. INFORMATION—WAIVER OF DEFECTS—DUPPLICITY.

Where a complaint charged defendants with selling "and" giving away intoxicating liquors with intent to evade the law, a failure to demur on the ground of duplicity in the specification of the charge was a waiver of any defect on that account.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 27, Indictment and Information, § 635.]

16. INTOXICATING LIQUORS—OFFENSES—SALES—STATUTORY PROVISIONS—EXCEPTIONS—SOCIAL CLUBS.

Local Option Law, § 2 (Laws 1905, p. 42), provides that the inhibition of the sale of intoxicating liquors, when effectuated, shall not prohibit the sale of certain liquors for certain excepted purposes, but no reference is made therein to clubs. Held that, when the prohibition law became operative in a certain county, it ex proprio vigore inhibited all social clubs within the county from selling or giving to members thereof intoxicating liquors with a purpose of evading the law.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 29, Intoxicating Liquors, § 186.]

17. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—DELEGATION OF LEGISLATIVE POWER—LOCAL OPTION LAW.

The local option law (Laws 1905, p. 41) is not unconstitutional as a delegation of legislative power, since the power to enact a law is not delegated, but authority was merely conferred upon the people of the counties to determine by a majority vote whether a law already passed for the entire state shall be applicable to such county, since it is the majority vote of the electors, and not the order of the county court, that effects the result, and the sale is forbidden by operation of the law.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 10, Constitutional Law, § 116; vol. 29, Intoxicating Liquors, § 16.]

18. INTOXICATING LIQUORS—CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS—INSTRUCTIONS.

In a prosecution for violation of the local option law, where B., a witness, testified that at about the time stated in the complaint he went into a building formerly operated as a saloon, and there talked with one of the defendants; that at the time he obtained a half pint of brandy, for which he offered to pay, but that the accused told him that an assessment would subsequently be made for the expense of the Corvallis Social & Athletic Club; that he thereafter paid an assessment of forty cents; that he had not in the meantime procured any other goods at that place; that the sum paid was more than the ordinary price of such liquor, and that he thought the assessment imposed upon him included his right to visit the clubrooms—it was not error to instruct that if the club was the owner of, or kept intoxicating liquor, which was sold or given to B., for the purpose of evading the local option law, and that defendants or either of them aided or authorized such sale or gift with such intent, the averments in the complaint were sufficiently established, for the use of the expression "sale or gift" was proper to dispel any doubt as to the nature of the disposal of the liquor under the circumstances mentioned.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 29, Intoxicating Liquors, § 343.]

19. SAME—EVIDENCE—INTERNAL REVENUE LICENSE—STATUTORY PROVISIONS—"PERSON."

Local Option Law, § 18 (Laws 1905, p. 50), provides that the issuing of a license or internal revenue special tax stamp by the federal government to any person for the sale of intoxicating liquors shall be prima facie evidence that such person is selling, exchanging, or giving away intoxicating liquors. Held, that the term "person," as used, includes the word "corporation"; hence it was not error to instruct that if an internal revenue license had been issued to a certain club, authorizing the sale of intoxicating liquor, such license was prima facie evidence that the club was engaged in selling, exchanging, or giving away intoxicating liquors, but that such finding alone would not be applicable to the defendants or either of them.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 6, pp. 5322-5335; vol. 8, p. 7752.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Benton County; L. T. Harris, Judge.

Charles M. Kline, jointly accused with another, was convicted of violating the local option law, and appeals. Affirmed.

J. R. Wyatt, for appellant. E. R. Bryson, for the State.

MOORE, J. The defendants, Charles M. Kline and Merwin McMaines, were jointly convicted in a justice's court of Benton county, of the crime of selling and giving away intoxicating liquor with a purpose of evading the provisions of the local option law of Oregon, alleged to have been committed in that county, August 18, 1905, by then and there unlawfully selling and giving away, with such intent, intoxicating liquor to one Thomas Bell, at which time the sale of that kind of drink had been prohibited in the entire municipality, stating when and how the interdiction was effected, and further averring that the law was then and there in full force and effect. The defendants appealed from the sentences imposed upon them to the circuit court for that county, where the cause was tried anew, and McMaines acquitted; but Kline was convicted, and, from the judgment which followed, he appeals to this court.

It is contended by his counsel that an error was committed in refusing to grant a change of venue. To secure a transfer of the cause to another county for trial, the defendant interposed a motion which states that it was based on affidavits filed therewith. A number of affidavits, newspaper clippings, and other papers were fastened together and sent up to this court, but they are not made a part of the bill of exceptions or identified in any manner by the trial judge. A motion to secure a change of venue in an action for a felony, when a transfer of the cause is objected to, raises an issue which must be determined by the court from an inspection of affidavits. B. & C. Comp. § 1250. These written declarations under oath constitute the proof, which, like all other evidence, must be incorporated in a bill of exceptions and transmitted to this court, in order that the action of the trial court may be reviewed on appeal, if assigned as error. The affidavits referred to, though certified by the clerk, do not make them a part of the bill of exceptions, and hence the question suggested, even if the crime charged were a felony, is not before us for consideration. State v. Clements, 15 Or. 237, 14 Pac. 410; Roberts v. Parrish, 17 Or. 583, 22 Pac. 136; Craft v. Dalles City, 21 Or. 53, 27 Pac. 163; Fisher v. Kelly, 28 Or. 249, 38 Pac. 67; Farrell v. Oregon Gold Co., 31 Or. 463, 49 Pac. 876; Nosler v. Coos Bay Navigation Co., 40 Or. 305, 63 Pac. 1050, 64 Pac. 855; Multnomah County v. Willamette Towing Co. (Or.) 89 Pac. 389. It is also maintained that the court erred in denying the defendants' motion to grant separate trials. When two or more persons are jointly charged with the commission of a felony, any defendant requiring it must be tried separately, but in all other cases the granting of a separate trial is a matter of discretion. B. & C. Comp. § 1395. The crime charged in the case at bar is only a misdemeanor, and as the bill of exceptions does not show that the discretion reposed in the trial court was abused, its action in refusing to grant separate trials was not erroneous.

It is insisted that the local option liquor law, the provisions of which Kline is charged with having violated, was initiated by a petition and ratified by a vote of the electors of Oregon, but the enactment was not submitted to the Governor for his approval or rejection, and for that reason it never became operative. The amendment of section 1 of article 4 of the Constitution of Oregon (B. & C. Comp. p. 72) contains the following clause: "The veto power of the Governor shall not extend to measures referred to the people." As this amendment provides that the referendum may be ordered either by petition of the electors or by the legislative assembly, it might seem reasonably to be inferred from the limitation of the Governor's authority that he could annul any measure initiated by petition. In a democratic form of government, the authority of an executive to set aside an enactment of the legislative department is not an inherent power, and can be exercised only when sanctioned by a constitutional provision. The fundamental laws of Delaware, North Carolina, Ohio, and Rhode Island do not confer the veto power on the Governors of those states. In this state, prior to the amendment referred to of the Constitution, every bill which passed the legislative assembly was required to be presented to the Governor before it became a law. Const. Or. art. 5, § 15. This provision of the organic act was impliedly changed by the amendment under consideration, so as practically to insert in the original the following parenthetic clause, to wit: "Every bill which shall have passed the legislative assembly (except such as may, by order of that body, be referred to the people for their sanction or rejection) shall, before it becomes a law, be presented to the Governor," etc. The amendment of section 1 of article 4 of our Constitution does not direct that a proposed law, when enacted by the people, pursuant to an exercise of the initiative power reserved, shall, before it becomes operative, be presented to the Governor; and hence the chief executive of this state is powerless either to approve or repudiate a measure passed in the manner indicated. The local option law of Oregon was proposed by initiative petitions, and approved by a majority vote of the electors, June 6, 1904, and took effect 18 days thereafter, conformable to the Governor's proclamation and without his approval.

It is urged that an error was committed in admitting the evidence, over objection and exception, a certified copy of the order of the county court of Benton county, declaring the result of the election, held under the local option law, and absolutely prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors within that municipality, without first having introduced in evidence, as a foundation for such prescription, the petition initiating the right to call the election, the notices issued in pursuance of such call, and the proof of posting the notices. A clause of the local option law relating to the action of a county court in declaring the result of an election, held to determine whether or not the sale of intoxicating liquor should be prohibited, is as follows: "The order thus made shall be held to be prima facie evidence that all the provisions of the law have been complied with in giving notice of and holding said election, and in counting and returning the votes and declaring the result thereof." Laws Or. 1905, p. 47, § 10. Prima facie evidence is that degree of proof which, unexplained or uncontradicted, is alone sufficient to establish the truth of a legal principle asserted by a party. 1 Jones, Ev. § 7. The provision of the law quoted casts upon a party to a criminal action, who is charged with violating the terms of the local option enactment, the burden of overthrowing such prima facie proof, by introducing in evidence the writings which constitute the alleged irregularity of the proceedings, upon which the order of prohibition is primarily based, without which statutory declaration of the character of proof it would have been incumbent upon the state to establish the validity of the several initiatory steps necessary to the making of an efficacious order declaring the result of the election, and prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors in the territory specified. Strode v. Washer, 17 Or. 50, 16 Pac. 926; Harris v. Harsch, 29 Or. 562, 46 Pac. 141; Brentano v. Brentano, 41 Or. 15, 67 Pac. 922. The rule which imposes upon a defendant the burden of proof in a prosecution for a statutory crime does not violate any vested right which he possesses. 12 Cyc. 380. The order of the county court was admissible in evidence without introducing the petition, notices, or proof of posting such notices. State v. Carmody (Or.) 91 Pac. 446.

It is argued, however, that the prima facie proof mentioned was overcome by introducing in evidence the sheriff's certificate of the posting of the election notices. In the package of papers referred to upon the question of a change of venue, appears a memorandum, which has noted in the margin in lead pencil, "Defendant's Exhibit C." This exhibit purports to be the sheriff's return upon the notice mentioned, but it is not made a part of the bill of exceptions or certified to in any manner by the trial judge, and for that reason it will not be considered.

It is contended that the court erred in admitting, over objection and exception, testimony tending to prove the contents of an internal revenue license, without calling for, or producing, the original or attempting to account for its absence. Secondary evidence of the contents of a writing may be given when the original is in the possession of the party against whom it is offered, and he withholds it (B. & C. Comp. § 703, subd. 1) after having received reasonable notice to produce it. Ib. § 771. The bill of exceptions shows that the license mentioned was issued by the collector of internal revenue, and having been displayed in the defendants' place of business, it was in their possession, but it does not appear that any notice to produce it had been given to them. The contents of the revenue stamp was attempted to be given by three witnesses, whose testimony was challenged by defendants' counsel on the ground that it was incompetent, immaterial, and irrelevant, and not the best evidence. It will thus be seen that the objections interposed to such testimony do not negative the implication that the defendants had received reasonable notice to produce the license. The only questions brought up for review in a law action are such as have been properly submitted to, and considered by, the trial court; and, as the want of notice was not suggested, it must be presumed, in favor of the judgment rendered, that testimony in relation to the demand to produce the license was duly given.

R. Turney, as a witness for the state, testified that in August, 1905, as manager of the Corvallis Gazette, he printed in that newspaper office a letter head, the manuscript for which, he believed, was prepared by the defendant McMaines; and, producing the writing, it was received in evidence as "State's Exhibit B," over an objection that it was incompetent, immaterial, and irrelevant; that the witness had not shown himself competent to testify; and that the writing had not been identified as that of McMaines. This witness, on cross-examination, having testified that he did not remember having ever seen McMaines write, the testimony in relation to the manuscript was sought to be stricken out, for the reasons hereinbefore suggested, as to the declarations under oath of this witness, but the motion was denied and an exception saved.

In the package of papers adverted to appears what is marked, "State's Exhibit B," but as the manuscript thus indicated is not made a part of the bill of exceptions, or properly identified, it must be presumed that no error was committed in admitting it.

The following excerpt is taken from the bill of exceptions, and contains the entire reference to the writing mentioned, to wit: "Defendants offered in evidence articles of incorporation of the Corvallis Social & Athletic Club (marked, 'Defendants' Exhibit D'), as follows: (Clerk print.)" This direction was not obeyed, and the articles of incorporation, though probably included in the package of papers mentioned, are not made a part of the bill of exceptions or identified by the trial judge; and, for the reasons hereinbefore given, the charter is not properly before us. Though the manner of conducting the business of the Corvallis Social & Athletic Club is not particularly disclosed by the testimony of any witness, we shall assume, without deciding the question, that the corporation was organized for a bona fide purpose, and not with intent to evade the provisions of the local option law, and that disposition of intoxicating liquors kept by it was made to the members of the organization; and, based on such supposition, we will consider whether a transfer of the possession of alcoholic drink by an agent of a corporation to a member thereof is lawful in territory where the local option law is in effect. Though the bill of exceptions, in the case at bar, is silent as to the manner in which the business of the Corvallis Social & Athletic Club was conducted by the defendant, who, at the time stated in the complaint, was an officer of the corporation, the mode pursued is so nearly uniform to that revealed in Barden v. Montana Club, 10 Mont. 330, 25 Pac. 1042, 11 L. R. A. 593, 24 Am. St. Rep. 27, that a description is taken from a note thereto, as follows: "In nearly every state in the Union social clubs exist; some of which are incorporated, and others are not, and which are conducted for the use of the members only, to provide for their rational entertainment and amusement, both intellectual and social. They generally transact no business whatsoever for the purpose of making any profit, directly or indirectly, for themselves or their members, and the income derived from various sources is applied solely to defraying the expenses of the organization or incorporation. Their sources of income generally consist of an entrance or membership fee, collected from each new member, and such monthly dues as shall be assessed by the management or board of directors each month, together with money paid by members for what refreshments, liquors, and cigars they obtain for their personal use, or that of their especially invited friends, at the clubhouse, and such additional assessments, fines, and penalties as may be, from time to time, imposed upon the members. The money thus received is expended in paying the current expenses of the club, and the other enumerated sources of income are seldom sufficient to meet such expenses without the imposition of additional assessments. The spirituous and fermented liquors consumed by the members are bought by the club, and kept therein under charge of a steward or manager, an employé of the club, under the supervision and control of the board of directors. The members of the club, and no other persons, except especially invited guests, can get what liquors they want, by a member calling for them upon the steward and paying a price fixed by the regulation of the club, either at the time, or at the end of each month, or at such other time as such regulations may require. This price for the liquor is fixed and paid, not for the purpose of making any profit, either directly or indirectly, but merely for the purpose of covering the outlay in the purchase thereof by the corporation or organization. The moneys received are used to replenish the stock of liquors so kept for the use of the members, and the expense attendant upon the keeping and serving thereof at the clubhouse, and other expenses of the club." When intoxicating liquors are purchased by an unincorporated social club, to be used in the manner indicated, it is generally conceded that the members of the organization are the joint owners of the general property in all the alcoholic drinks thus kept; that the officer who, upon a request therefore, dispenses such liquor to members of the club, is their agent, and that the delivery of a quantity of such goods to a member, though for a consideration, whereby a special property is transferred, is not, in the strict sense of the term, a sale, because the element of a bargain is lacking. The people of this state, evidently having knowledge of the manner in which the business of social clubs was usually conducted, and also understanding that the disposal of intoxicating liquor to the members of such organizations might not be construed a sale, apparently intending to prevent such transfers of the special property in alcoholic drinks, as a beverage, adopted section 15 of the local option law, which so far as important herein, is as follows: "When any such election has been held and has resulted in favor of prohibition, and the county court has made the order declaring the result, and the order of prohibition, any person who shall thereafter, within the prescribed bounds of prohibition, sell, exchange, or give away, with a purpose of evading the provisions of this law, any intoxicating liquors whatsoever, or in any way violate the provisions of this law, shall be subject to prosecution," etc.

It would thus seem, from an inspection of the language last quoted, that the section was framed with an intent to prevent the disposal of intoxicating liquors by an unincorporated social club to its members within prohibited territory, even if it were determined that the transfer of the special property in the liquor, by an agent of the organization to a member thereof, constituted only a gift. Where, however, as is assumed in the case at bar, intoxicating liquors are purchased by an incorporated society, to be used, as hereinbefore detailed, it would appear that the corporation is the owner of the liquors, and when they are dispensed to a member, with intent to pass the title in the goods, the act constitutes a sale.

It will be remembered that the complaint charges the defendants with selling and giving away intoxicating liquor with a purpose of evading the provisions of the local option law. No demurrer having been interposed by the defendants on the ground of duplicity in the specification of the charge, any defect in the pleading on that account was thereby waived. State v. Lee, 33 Or. 506, 56 Pac. 415; State v. Carlson, 39 Or. 19, 62 Pac. 1116, 1119.

These preliminary matters having been disposed of, a consideration of the principal inquiry on this branch of the case will be resumed. In the note to the case of Barden v. Montana Club, 24 Am. St. Rep. 27, immediately following the excerpt hereinbefore quoted, the editors of that valuable series of case-law make the following observation, as deducible from an examination of adjudications applicable to the inquiry, to wit: "The question whether or not the furnishing of intoxicating or fermented liquor by a club to its members in the manner above stated constitutes a sale in violation of laws prohibiting sales, or whether or not it constitutes a sale within the meaning of a law requiring a license before one can engage in retailing such liquor, has been the subject of various and conflicting decisions by a number of the appellate courts of the country. While the cases cannot be reconciled, the current as well as the weight of authority is undoubtedly in favor of the rule that the distribution and consumption of liquors in a club by its members in the manner above stated is a sale, and a violation of laws of the nature stated." Several cases are cited, and quotations therefrom are contained in the note that fully sustain the conclusion thus reached, and we adopt that part of such deduction as relates to the disposal of intoxicating liquor by a club to its members in violation of the provisions of a local option law, without further calling attention to the cases relied upon.

Section 2 of the local option law provides that the inhibition of the sale of intoxicating liquors, when effectuated, shall not prohibit the sale of pure alcohol for scientific and manufacturing purposes, or wines to church officials for sacramental purposes, nor alcoholic stimulants as medicine in case of actual sickness. The expression of these exceptions necessarily leaves no room for the consideration of any other exclusion; and hence, we conclude, that when the prohibition law became operative in Benton county, it, ex proprio vigore, inhibited all social clubs within that territory from selling or giving to the members of such organizations intoxicating liquors with a purpose of evading the provisions of the enactment.

Exceptions having been taken to parts of the court's instructions, it is contended that errors were committed in giving them, to wit: The court said to the jury, in effect: (1) That if they should find, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the county court of Benton county made an order, at a specified time, declaring the result of an election, and absolutely prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors within that territory, such declaration was prima facie evidence that all the provisions of the law, relating to giving notice, holding an election, counting and returning the votes cast, and declaring the result thereof had been complied with; (2) that if they should find that the Corvallis Social & Athletic Club was the owner of or kept intoxicating liquor which was by some person, other than the defendants, sold or given to Thomas Bell, with a purpose of evading the provisions of the local option law, and that the defendants, or either of them aided or authorized such sale or gift, with such intent, then the averments of the complaint were sufficiently established; (3) that if they should find that intoxicating liquor was owned by the Corvallis Social & Athletic Club, that such organization was duly incorporated, that the defendants were its agents, and that Thomas Bell was a member of the club, then a sale or gift by them, as such agents, to him, with intent to evade the provisions of the local option law, would not exonerate them from liability; (4) that if they should find that an internal revenue license had been issued to the Corvallis Social & Athletic Club, authorizing the sale of intoxicating liquor, such permission afforded prima facie evidence that the club was, during the time specified in the tax stamp, engaged in selling, exchanging, or giving away intoxicating liquors, but that such finding alone would not be applicable to the defendants or either of them.

Considering these instructions in the order specified, it is argued that the local option law being dependent upon a vote of the people, to determine whether or not it should be operative within a specified territory, contravenes the organic law of the state by delegating legislative power, which fact is evidenced by the order of a county court whereby its mandate, and not the enactment, becomes the rule of prohibition. The power to enact a law was not delegated, but authority was conferred upon the people of Benton county to determine by a majority vote, whether or not a law, which had already passed for the entire state, should be applicable to such county. Fouts v. Hood River, 46 Or. 492, 81 Pac. 370, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 483.

The local option law (section 10) provides that, if a majority of the votes cast at an election be in favor of inhibition, the county court shall make an order declaring the result of the vote, and absolutely prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquor within the prescribed limits. It is the majority vote of the electors in favor of prohibition that effectuates such result, and though the county court is required to make an order absolutely prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquor, such declaration is only tantamount to a proclamation of the consequences which follow a canvass of the votes, and thus the sale is forbidden by operation of law and not by the county court.

The bill of exceptions shows that Thomas Bell, as a witness for the state, testified that, about the time stated in the complaint, he went into a building at Corvallis, formerly used as a saloon, and there talked with the defendant Kline; that at that time he obtained a half pint of brandy which was set out for him, for which he offered to pay, but Kline told him that an assessment would subsequently be made for the expense of the Corvallis Social & Athletic Club; that he thereafter paid an assessment of 40 cents; that he had not in the meantime procured any other goods at that place; that the sum so paid was more than the ordinary price of such liquor; and that he thought the assessment imposed upon him included his right to visit the clubrooms.

The "sale or gift" to which the court referred in the second instruction excepted to was evidently based on the testimony of Bell, in relation to the method pursued whereby he obtained the brandy and paid money, not for the intoxicating liquor, possibly, but on account of an assessment to defray the expenses of the club. To dispel any doubt that might possibly arise in the minds of the jurors as to the nature of the disposal of the alcoholic drink, under the circumstances mentioned, the court spoke of the transfer of the property in the brandy as a "sale or a gift," and, in doing so, committed no error. The disposal of intoxicating liquor by a social organization to a member thereof, as indicated in the third exception to the instruction, has heretofore been discussed under the question of the incorporation of the Corvallis Social & Athletic Club, and needs no further elucidation at this time.

Section 18 of the local option law contains, inter alia, the following clause: "The issue of a license or internal revenue special tax stamp by the federal government to any person for the sale of intoxicating liquors shall be prima facie evidence that such person is selling, exchanging, or giving away intoxicating liquors." The term "person," as used in this provision, is undoubtedly broad enough to include the word "corporation"; and, this being so, the fourth instruction, to the giving of which an exception was reserved, correctly stated the law applicable to the facts involved.

Other exceptions are noted, but believing them immaterial, the judgment is affirmed.

STATE v. BARTLETT.

(Supreme Court of Oregon. Jan. 7, 1908.)

CRIMINAL LAW—INSTRUCTIONS—CREDIBILITY OF TESTIMONY OF ACCUSED.

The court instructed that an accused is deemed a competent witness, and that while the jury should give his testimony such weight and credibility as they might consider it entitled to, yet they were to consider in connection therewith that accused was testifying in his own behalf; that they were not bound to consider his testimony as absolutely true, nor as equal to the testimony of a disinterested witness, but to bear in mind that defendant spoke in his own behalf, and that the jury should consider the great temptation which one so situated was under to speak so as to procure his acquittal. Held, that the instruction was erroneous, as seeming to leave an implication that it was incumbent on the jury to consider defendant's testimony as false.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 14, Criminal Law, § 1896.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Union County; William Smith, Judge.

E. W. Bartlett was convicted of attempting to extort money, and he appeals. Reversed, and new trial ordered.

Samuel White, for appellant. F. S. Ivanhoe, Dist. Atty., and C. H. Finn, for the State.

MOORE, J. The defendant E. W. Bartlett was jointly convicted with one S. A. Gardinier of the crime of attempting to extort money, alleged in the information to have been committed, by unlawfully threatening to accuse certain persons of the offense of gambling and to prosecute them therefor. Bartlett appeals from the judgment which followed, and his counsel contend, inter alia, that the trial court erred in charging the jury. The instruction particularly complained of, and to the giving of which an exception was taken, is as follows: "In this case the defendants went upon the witness stand as witnesses in their own behalf. I instruct you that under the statutes of this state a person accused or charged with the commission of a crime is, at his own request, deemed a competent witness, and while you are to give his testimony such weight and credibility as you consider it entitled to, yet you are to consider the fact in connection therewith that he is the accused person testifying in his own behalf. You are not bound to consider the testimony of the defendants as absolutely true, nor any part of it as absolutely true, nor as equal to the testimony of disinterested witnesses. You are to bear in mind that the defendants speak in their own behalf to discharge themselves of a criminal accusation, and you are to consider the great temptation which one so situated is under, so to speak, as to procure his acquittal." That part of the foregoing charge, commencing with the words, "You are not bound," etc., was evidently patterned after a quotation found in the works of a distinguished author (2 Thompson, Trials, § 2447), in a note to which it is said, "Approved in Solander v. People, 2 Colo. 48, 56." In the case to which attention is called in the note, the plaintiff in error, a woman, was indicted for manslaughter, and, at her trial, one Knauss, a witness for the prosecution, detailed certain declarations against interest which were imputed to her. Upon argument the counsel for the people insisted that the sworn statements of Knauss were entitled to credit, from the circumstance that the accused, though examined in her own behalf, had not contradicted his testimony, and that her counsel had not interrogated her in relation thereto, whereupon her attorney requested the court to give the following instruction: "That, in the examination of the prisoner provided for by the statute, which examination extends only to the facts and circumstances of the cause on trial, and does not confer on the prisoner the right to testify to facts or circumstances tending to impeach any of the witnesses in the cause. Therefore, the fact that defendant did not testify to facts or circumstances calculated to impeach any of the witnesses sworn in the case is not to be taken as properly commented upon, or as a circumstance against her." The report of the case states, "but the court refused to so charge, and the prisoner excepted." The jury were charged in relation to the law involved in the issue, and the court gave, inter alia, the instruction quoted in the latter part of section 2447, as indicated in 2 Thompson, Trials, but no exception thereto appears to have been reserved. The accused, having been convicted, appealed, and, in affirming the judgment, Mr. Chief Justice Hallett refers to the requests made by the appellants' counsel for certain instructions, relating to the corroboration of the testimony of an accomplice, and says: "The prisoner having elected to testify under the act of 1872 (9 Sess. Assem. p. 95), her testimony became a fair subject of criticism before the jury, and the counsel for the people was at liberty to analyze her testimony, to compare it with the other testimony in the cause, and comment upon the omissions and contradictions, if any, therein. The prisoner was at liberty to contradict Knauss, and to give her own account of the matters related by him, and the fact that she did not do so might well be considered by the jury in determining the credibility of Knauss. People v. Dyle, 21 N. Y. 578. The prisoner was not required to testify, and, by the terms of the statute, if she had chosen to remain silent, no inference of guilt could be drawn from her conduct. By taking the witness stand she opened the door to criticism, and cannot now complain that an effort was made to measure her testimony by the ordinary rules which govern human conduct." The foregoing observation, relating to the declarations upon oath of the accused as a witness in her own behalf, constitutes the only reference made by the court to any instruction requested by her counsel or to any charge given to the jury as to her testimony. How then can it be said, as indicated in the note adverted to, that the language quoted in the text by the noted author, and as given by the court in the case cited, was approved, when the instruction does not appear even to have been challenged by counsel for the accused or commented upon in any manner by the justice who wrote the opinion? The only references to the case of Solander v. People, supra, that we have been able to find in the Colorado reports relate to other questions. See, upon this subject, Jones v. People, 2 Colo. 355; Union Gold Mining Co. v. Rocky Mountain Nat. Bank, 2 Colo. 576; Jones v. People, 6 Colo. 456, 45 Am. Rep. 526; Minich v. People, 8 Colo. 449, 9 Pac. 4; Wisdom v. People, 11 Colo. 174, 17 Pac. 519; Babcock v. People, 13 Colo. 518, 22 Pac. 817; Thompson v. People, 26 Colo. 505, 59 Pac. 51; Johnson v. People, 33 Colo. 237, 80 Pac. 133, 108 Am. St. Rep. 85.

In People v. Cronin, 34 Cal. 191, an instruction of similar import to that contained in the latter part of the charge complained of in the case at bar was approved. In People v. Murray, 86 Cal. 31, 24 Pac. 802, Mr. Justice McFarland, referring to the rule announced in the preceding case, says: "That instruction has been approved in subsequent cases, and it is now too late to question its correctness; but if courts and prosecuting attorneys think it their duty to have an instruction on that subject in every case, they should be careful not to go further in that direction than courts have already gone. An instruction giving the general rule can do no harm, and is not of much importance, for every intelligent juror knows, without any instruction on the subject, that a defendant, whether innocent or guilty, is deeply interested in being acquitted. But when such an instruction is reiterated, and put into exceedingly strong language, so as to give it peculiar emphasis, it is too apt to lead the jury to believe that the court thinks the defendant in the particular case on trial to be unworthy of belief."

In People v. Van Ewan, 111 Cal. 144, 43 Pac. 520, the trial court, in referring to the declarations under oath made by the defendant as a witness in his own behalf, charged the jury as follows: "In weighing his testimony you are to consider what he has at stake. You are to consider the temptations that may be brought to bear upon a man in his situation to tell a falsehood for the purpose of inducing you to acquit him, or to disagree." The defendant, having been convicted, appealed, and in reversing the judgment, the court say: "If the question were entirely an open one we would feel constrained to hold, upon principle, that any instruction at all as to the credibility of any witness, or the weight to be given to his testimony, is violative of section 19 of article 6 of the Constitution, which provides that 'judges shall not charge jurors with respect to matters of fact,' and section 1887 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which, referring to a witness, provides that 'the jury are the exclusive judges of his credibility.'" It is further intimated that the instruction last above quoted was more restrictive than the charge approved in People v. Cronin, 34 Cal.

191. It will thus be seen that the Supreme Court of California practically condemned the instruction given in People v. Cronin, supra, but felt impelled to follow the rule thus announced, because of its repeated approvals for nearly a generation.

In Johnson v. United States, 157 U. S. 320, 15 Sup. Ct. 614, 39 L. Ed. 71, cited by counsel for the state in the case at bar, the jury were charged as follows: "The defendant goes upon the stand before you, and he makes his statement—tells his story. Above all things in a case of this kind you are to see whether that statement is corroborated substantially and reliably by the proven facts; if so, it is strengthened to the extent of its corroboration. If it is not strengthened in that way, you are to weigh it by its own inherent truthfulness—its own inherent proving power that may belong to it." This instruction was approved by the Supreme Court of the United States, but as the cause was originally tried in a federal court, where the rules of the common law prevail, thereby permitting the judge to comment upon the weight of the testimony, no other deduction could well have been made. Carver v. Astor, 4 Pet. 1, 79, 7 L. Ed. 761; Magniac v. Thompson, 7 Pet. 348, 389, 8 L. Ed. 709. The conclusion there reached, however, is not controlling in the case at bar, in consequence of our statute prohibiting such method of charging the jury.

In Territory v. Romine, 2 N. M. 114, a similar charge was upheld on the assumption that such an instruction was permissible under the rules of the common law, which at the time of that trial had not been changed, but subsequent thereto, and prior to the hearing of the cause in the Supreme Court a statute had been adopted by the legislative assembly of New Mexico, which precluded a court from commenting upon the weight of the evidence. In that case it is intimated that, after the passage of the statute, the giving of such an instruction would have been erroneous. Our statute, regulating the giving of instructions, was adopted in its present form, December 20, 1865 (Laws Or. 1865, p. 37), and is as follows: "In charging the jury, the court shall state to them all matters of law which it thinks necessary for their information in giving their verdict, but it shall not present the facts of the case, but shall inform the jury that they are the exclusive judges of all questions of fact." B. & C. Comp. § 139. This section practically prohibits the giving of an instruction as to the weight of the evidence, for if a court cannot present the facts of a case it is necessarily precluded from charging the jury in respect to any particular conclusion which might be deduced from a consideration of the testimony.

An early statute of this state prevented a defendant in a criminal action from becoming a witness for or against himself. Section 166, tit. 1 of chapter 16 of the Criminal Code, as compiled by Matthew P. Deady and Lafayette Lane. This section was amended October 25, 1880 (Laws Or. 1880, p. 28), so as to read, as far as deemed involved herein, as follows: "In the trial of or examination upon all indictments, complaints, information, and other proceedings before any court, * * * against persons accused or charged with the commission of crimes or offenses, the person so charged or accused shall, at his own request, but not otherwise, be deemed a competent witness, the credit to be given to his testimony being left solely to the jury, under the instructions of the court." B. & C. Comp. § 1400. As this alteration was made after the passage of section 139, supra, it would seem, from a construction of such amendment in pari materia with that section, that it had been impliedly amended, so as to permit the court to call the attention of the jury to the credibility of a defendant in a criminal action when he appeared as a witness in his own behalf. Our statute, elucidating the general principles of evidence, contains the following clause: "A witness is presumed to speak the truth. This presumption, however, may be overcome by the manner in which he testifies, by the character of his testimony, or by evidence affecting his character or motives, or by contradictory evidence; and where the trial is by the jury, they are the exclusive judges of his credibility." B. & C. Comp. § 695. It has been the practice of courts to give this entire section or the substance thereof in charging juries. Construing this clause together with section 1400, supra, it would further appear that section 695, supra, was also impliedly amended, so as to allow the court to inform the jury that a defendant in a criminal action, when he appeared as a witness in his own behalf, is interested in any verdict which they might return—a fact of which they have knowledge without such declaration. People v. Murray, 86 Cal. 31, 24 Pac. 802.

An instruction stating that, while the defendant in a criminal action is a competent witness in his own behalf, the jury, nevertheless, have the right to take into consideration his interest in the result of the trial, and all the facts and circumstances of the case, and to give his testimony only such weight as they, in their judgment, think it entitled to—has been held proper. Smith v. State, 107 Ala. 139, 18 South. 306; Hamilton v. State, 62 Ark. 543, 36 S. W. 1054; State v. Ryan, 113 Iowa, 536, 85 N. W. 812; People v. Calvin, 60 Mich. 113, 26 N. W. 851; Gatliff v. Territory, 2 Okl. 523, 37 Pac. 809; Emery v. State, 101 Wis. 627, 78 N. W. 145. Under the rule thus announced, the first part of the charge in the case at bar, which was manifestly modeled after section 2447 (2 Thompson, Trials), a note to which is as follows: "Approved in State v. Jones, 78 Mo.

280," is supported by authority, though the jury were not instructed to take into consideration all the facts and circumstances of the case, nor informed that they were the exclusive judges of the defendant's credibility. No request, however, appears to have been made to enlarge the instruction in these particulars.

In Chambers v. People, 105 Ill. 409, the following charge was given: "The court instructs the jury, for the people, that they are not bound to believe the evidence of the defendant in a criminal case, and treat it the same as the evidence of other witnesses, but the jury may take into consideration the fact that he is defendant, and give his testimony such weight as, under all the circumstances, they think it entitled to." In that case it was held that such instruction was calculated to mislead, and was, therefore, erroneous. A similar instruction was also condemned in Sullivan v. People, 114 Ill. 24, 28 N. E. 381, and Hellyer v. People, 186 Ill. 550, 58 N. E. 245.

In State v. Pomeroy, 30 Or. 16, 46 Pac. 797, the jury were instructed as follows: "In this case the defendant and members of his family have given testimony. You have no right to reject the testimony they have given, simply because it comes from a source in which there would be strong motives to give the most favorable coloring possible to the facts on behalf of the defendant, but you have a right to consider, and you should consider, that testimony the same as you would other testimony, taking into account the relationship of the parties and the motives which may induce them to testify." The defendant, having been convicted, appealed, and, in reversing the judgment, it was held that the instruction was erroneous, as an expression of opinion on the motives of the witnesses.

Any person who carefully notices the trial of a cause before a jury must surely observe the attention which they give to the remarks, gestures, facial expressions, or tones of voice which the judge may adopt, in their evident desire to gain from him some information as to the kind of verdict they think he would expect in the case. Any language, therefore, which might seem even to hint at what the court thought of the merits of a case, ought always to be avoided at a trial of the issue before a jury. Though the judge, in the instruction complained of, said to the jury: "You are not bound to consider the testimony of the defendants as absolutely true, * * * and you are to consider the great temptation which one so situated is under, so to speak, as to procure his acquittal"—he seems to leave an implication that it was incumbent upon them to consider the defendants' testimony as false, and for that reason to reject it. Clark v. State, 32 Neb. 246, 49 N. W. 367.

We think the language thus used is not warranted, and hence the judgment is reversed, and a new trial ordered.

ELDRIDGE v. HOEFER et al.

(Supreme Court of Oregon. Jan. 7, 1908.)

1. INFANTS—DECLARATION OF TRUST—VALIDITY.

A minor's declaration of trust is valid until avoided.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 27, Infants, § 35.]

2. MORTGAGES—ABSOLUTE DEEDS AS MORTGAGES.

A deed, absolute in form, will be decreed a mortgage, where it was executed to secure the payment of a debt or the performance of an obligation.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 35, Mortgages, §§ 60-94.]

3. SAME—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

That a deed, absolute in form, was intended as a mortgage, may be established by parol.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 35, Mortgages, § 98.]

4. SAME—REDEMPTION—PERSONS ENTITLED.

Plaintiff, a minor, desiring to purchase land owned by his deceased father, and about to be sold to pay debts of the estate, but having no means, applied to defendant for the loan, who furnished the money pursuant to an arrangement whereby the land was conveyed to a third person, and by him to defendant. In the transactions, the third person was plaintiff's trustee, and his deed to defendant was executed to secure the money advanced. Held, that the deed from the third person to defendant, though absolute in form, was a mortgage, and a subsequent quitclaim deed by the third person to defendant did not transfer plaintiff's equitable estate, and plaintiff was entitled to redeem by paying the sum loaned with interest, etc., less the sums he might be able to show by preponderance of the evidence that he had paid on account of the debt, and the rents and profits which defendant received, as mortgagee in possession.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 35, Mortgages, §§ 1730, 1731.]

5. SAME—SUIT TO REDEEM—TENDER.

Since the law does not impose the performance of a vain thing as a condition precedent to a right, a plaintiff, in a suit to redeem land from a mortgage lien, who alleges that he notified defendant of an offer for the land, and that he would pay defendant the sum admitted to be due on the mortgage, if defendant would permit a redemption of the premises, and that defendant refused to comply therewith, need not allege a tender of the sum conceded by him to be due to entitle him to the equitable relief.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 35, Mortgages, § 1837.]

6. SAME—INCIDENTAL DAMAGES.

Plaintiff prayed that a deed, absolute in form, conveying land to defendant, be adjudged a mortgage, and that he be permitted to redeem, and claimed damages resulting from his inability to furnish title to a purchaser who offered to pay a specified sum for the land. He did not tender the sum conceded by him to be due to defendant, secured by the deed. Held, that plaintiff could not recover the damages, in the absence of a tender.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 35, Mortgages, § 1788.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Marion County; Geo. H. Burnett, Judge.

Suit by F. J. Eldridge against John Hoefer and others. From a decree for plaintiff, defendants John Hoefer and another appeal.
Reversed and remanded.

Geo. G. Bingham and P. H. D'Arcy, for appellants. T. G. Halley, A. M. Cannon, and L. K. Adams, for respondent.

MOORE, J. This is a suit by F. J. Eldridge against John Hoefer and Casper Zorn, partners as Hoefer & Zorn, and David Keen, to have a deed, absolute in form, of certain real property, decreed to be a mortgage and Keen declared to be plaintiff's trustee; that a redemption of the land be allowed, within a reasonable time, on the payment of $14,600, the sum admitted in the complaint to be due from the plaintiff to Hoefer & Zorn, but if such payment cannot be made within the time limited, that the premises be sold, and if the sum realized therefor does not equal $42,000, the price which it is alleged was offered for the land, that Hoefer & Zorn be required to account for that sum, less the debt so specified. The admitted facts are that plaintiff's father died seised of two farms situated in Marion county, containing 728.89 acres, whereupon his mother was appointed and duly qualified as administratrix of the decedent's estate, to pay the debts of which it became necessary to sell the real property. The plaintiff, desiring to purchase the land, but not having the means with which to pay for it, applied to Hoefer & Zorn for a loan of money for that purpose, but they declined the request because he was not then of age, and for the further reason that his mother held a dower interest in the premises. Mrs. Eldridge, at plaintiff's request, executed a deed of such life estate to Keen, who, at a sale of the land by the administratrix, bid therefor $14,577.80, to pay which he borrowed from Hoefer & Zorn $15,600, giving his promissory note for that sum, payable in five years from October 10, 1892, with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, payable yearly, and also stipulating in the note to pay all taxes that might be assessed against it. The sale by the administratrix having been confirmed, she executed a deed of all the estate the decedent had in the land at the time of his death to Keen, who immediately conveyed the premises to Hoefer & Zorn, taking from them a bond for a deed, wherein they covenanted to reconvey the land to him on the payment of the note. No part of the taxes assessed against the note having been paid to Hoefer & Zorn, Keen, on January 25, 1896, executed to them a quitclaim deed of the premises, without securing a surrender of the note or the indorsement of any payment thereon as a consideration for the conveyance, and in August, 1905, this suit was instituted. The complaint states the facts in detail, the substance of which is hereinbefore set forth, and avers, in effect, that at the time the money was so loaned it was agreed by all the parties hereto that in all the transactions mentioned Keen was plaintiff's trustee, which fact was assented to by Hoefer & Zorn, and that the original deed, executed by Keen to Hoefer & Zorn, was given to secure the payment of the promissory note, and the bond taken as a defeasance; that when the land was sold to Keen the plaintiff took immediate possession of the premises, which he retained until October, 1893, when he leased the real property, ever since which his tenants had been in possession thereof; that the plaintiff paid the interest on the note for the first three years after it was given, and in October, 1895, he also paid $1,000 on account of the principal; that about the date last mentioned the plaintiff, desiring to make certain improvements on the land, so as to increase the profits therefrom, and to pay the cost of such betterment from the income received from the premises, entered into an agreement with Hoefer & Zorn whereby they stipulated to accept the rents of the real property in full payment of the interest and taxes, and each year thereafter they received the landlord's share of the crops annually raised on the premises, pursuant to such agreement; that in July, 1905, the plaintiff was offered for the land $42,000, which sum would then have been paid for the premises, if he could have given a sufficient deed therefor; and that, upon receiving such bid, he notified the defendants thereof, in writing, and demanded that he be permitted to redeem the real property by paying the sum of $14,600, but they refused to comply with his request and would not join him in executing a deed of the land. The answer denies the material allegations of the complaint, and that any payments were made on the promissory note prior to January 25, 1896, except $509.50, which sum is the value of grain delivered the preceding year to the defendants; and states that Keen, being unable to pay the note or the interest thereon, and desiring to be relieved from such obligation, executed, with plaintiff's knowledge and consent, a deed of the premises to Hoefer & Zorn in full payment and discharge of the note; that upon the receipt of such deed Keen delivered the possession of all the real property, particularly described in the complaint, to Hoefer & Zorn, who, on April 20, 1896, leased the land to one F. Goffin, and the latter thereafter, and until the commencement of this suit, paid to them the rents, profits, and income of the premises, setting forth the value thereof each year from 1896 to 1904, inclusive, amounting to $6,902.72, and averring that the estimated rent for 1905 was equivalent to $682.62; that Hoefer & Zorn paid the taxes for the years 1892 and 1893, the amount of which they could not state, but approximately $250, and that they also paid the taxes on the real property from 1895 to 1904, inclusive, stating the sum paid each year, amounting to $2,039.88; that in all the negotiations Hoefer & Zorn refused to deal with the plaintiff, but recognized, and did business with, Keen alone, as the principal, at whose solicitation they accepted the deed in discharge of the condition of their bond, and in which transaction they dealt in good faith, believing that he was the owner of the real property against all the world but themselves, and that they were acquiring an absolute title in fee to the premises; that on January 25, 1896, the land was of no greater value than the principal and interest then due on the note, and that they had no notice or knowledge that the plaintiff had or claimed any estate or interest in or to any part of the land, except as the tenant or agent of Keen; and that Hoefler & Zorn, in good faith, took possession of all the real property with plaintiff's knowledge and consent January 25, 1896, and have ever since been in the quiet and peaceable possession thereof under a claim of right as the owner in fee simple, and without objection from the plaintiff or any other person, and have received the rents and profits of the land and appropriated the same to their own use. The reply put in issue the allegations of new matter in the answer, and the cause being tried, it was decreed that the plaintiff might redeem the land on or before October 10, 1906, by paying into court for Hoefler & Zorn, in gold coin, $14,000, upon the receipt of which they were required to execute to him a deed of the premises, but if they neglected to comply therewith, the decree should operate as a deed; that if the plaintiff failed to pay that sum within the time specified, the real property should be sold in the manner provided by law for the foreclosure of liens upon land, and the proceeds arising from such sale applied as in such cases; and that the sum so found to be due should bear interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from October 10, 1906, after which date the plaintiff was to receive the rents and profits of the land. From this decree Hoefler & Zorn appeal. The plaintiff also appeals from the action of the court in refusing to award him a recovery against Hoefler & Zorn of $42,000, less the debt which he claims to be due.

Without alluding to the testimony on this branch of the case, we think the original deed, executed by Keen to Hoefler & Zorn, who will hereafter be designated as the defendants, was intended by all the parties as a mortgage to secure the payment of $15,600, as evidenced by the promissory note, and that Keen was acting for the plaintiff as the trustee of an express trust. Though there is some conflict of judicial utterance as to the power of an infant to create a trust, reason and the weight of authority support the principle that a minor may call into existence a trust which is valid until avoided. Flint, Trusts, § 11; Perry, Trusts, § 33; 28 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law (2d Ed.) 868. The rule is universal that, when a deed, absolute in form, was intended by the parties at the time it was executed to be the means of securing the payment of a debt, the performance of a duty, or the discharge of an obligation, the sealed instrument will, in a suit instituted for that purpose, be decreed to be a mortgage, and such intention may be established by parol. Hurford v. Harned, 6 Or. 362; Stephens v. Allen, 11 Or. 188, 3 Pac. 168; Swegle v. Belle, 20 Or. 323, 25 Pac. 633; Adair v. Adair, 22 Or. 115, 29 Pac. 193; Trust Co. v. Loewenberg, 38 Or. 150, 62 Pac. 647. The court found, according to the averments of the complaint, that for the first three years after October 10, 1892, the plaintiff paid the defendants the interest agreed upon, and within that time he also gave them $1,000 on account of the principal, thereby reducing the debt to $14,600; that about September 30, 1895, he entered into a contract with them, whereby it was stipulated that thereafter they would accept the income and profits of the premises in lieu of the interest and taxes provided for; and that, pursuant to such agreement, the rents, from the time specified, were so received.

The plaintiff, as a witness in his own behalf, referring to the payments which he made to the defendants on account of the promissory note, testified as follows: "The first year's interest I did not pay when it was due, * * * but I got a concession from them for a few months, and I paid them interest on the bank of the Willamette river. I won't say what month, but that was in 1894, but it was summer time and lumber was being unloaded there for them. Q. Well, go ahead and state what you paid. A. Well, then, the next year's interest I borrowed from O. J. Goffin to pay them this $1,000, and I also borrowed some from him, I don't know exactly how much now, to pay on this interest. I know that I borrowed largely from Mr. Goffin to pay them a $1,000, which was two years, which was more than a year, past due—this particular $1,000 I mentioned a while ago having borrowed here. That made a $1,000 paid on the principal and two years' interest paid in money, and that is all the money that I did pay. Q. Who was present when you paid that money? A. Well, there was nobody present that I remember about when I paid the first year's interest; but Mr. Goffin was with me—Dr. Goffin was with me, rather O. J. Goffin—when I paid the last money to him." On cross-examination this witness was asked the following questions: "Q. You say that this $1,000 that you claim to have paid that you borrowed that from Mr. Goffin? A. Yes. Well, now, Mr. Goffin got the money for me, and I remember there were two notes—one to a man named Dufier, and one to another, Guston Bros. Q. And you say he (O. J. Goffin) was present when you paid the money to Hoefler & Zorn? A. Yes, sir. Q. Where was it paid? A. In Hoefler's house—Hoefler & Zorn's house at Champoe. Q. And how was it, in what medium? A. Why, in money. I paid them in money all the time. Q. Gold? A. Well, I don't know. I think—I won't say as to whether it was gold. It could not very well have been silver. Perhaps it was gold. I won't say as to that. Q. And did Goffin go with you for that purpose? A. I don't know but that some of the money—I don't know but that a part of that money was in a check from Hager of the Oregon City Flour Mill. * * * Q. Now, you think a part of this money you paid to Hoefer & Zorn was a check from Mr. Hager? A. Possibly it was. I think rather it was on account of having gotten this Guston Bros.—Guston Brothers had to sell some wheat to loan this money, and they had the wheat at Mr. Hager's, and I know, we were there. There was something about that that I won't be clear and positive about. * * * Q. Now, the first payment, you said that money was paid on the river bank? A. Yes, sir. Q. How much was paid at that time? A. I don't know how much was paid. I know that I got $1,500 in Portland at that time, and it was my intention to get off of the steamer in Champoeg and pay these people and get some conveyance and go home, and Mr. Hoefer was down there and I got on the boat and come up to the Eldriedge Landing and got off there. Q. And you paid him at the boat landing? A. I paid him. They were putting off some lumber, if I remember right, for Hoefer & Zorn. Q. How was that paid? A. Well, that was paid in money. But I won't say as to the kind of money that it was paid in. I can tell you who paid me the money, and where it was paid in Portland at that time. Q. Well, I want to know about the medium in which you paid them. A. Well, I won't say. Q. No checks, were there? A. No; I don't think there was. In fact, I am positive there was not."

O. J. Goffin testified that he had loaned money to Eldriedge, and in 1895 went with him to the home of the defendants, where the plaintiff paid them some money, was asked, "Now, have you any idea approximately how much money he paid at that time?" The witness answered, "No; I could not say. In fact, I don't know just how much money it was. I don't just remember how much money I borrowed for him. Then I would turn over some grain to him, and also borrowed about $40 from a man by the name of Duffer." In cross-examination the attention of this witness having been called to the payments made by the plaintiff to the defendants, was asked, "How much money was it?" and replied, "I could not say. There was considerable money paid, but I don't know just as to the amount of it. Q. Well, considerable money might mean— A. Well, there was some gold there, and some paper there that I know of, and the only thing I have in mind now was I was borrowing some money some time before that, and he told me that he wanted that money to make a showing with Hoefer & Zorn. That is the words that he used, because I remember it. Q. Did you ever borrow money for him? A. I had to borrow money for him ever since 1891. I borrowed money in 1891 for him, and 1892, '93, '94, and made deals like that for him right along just to help him out."

The defendant Hoefer testified that he never received from the plaintiff any money on the bank of the river, and that no interest was paid prior to 1895, but that he did receive from Goffin, who had leased the premises, a quantity of grain of the value of $509.50, which sum was credited to Keen. The defendant Zorn also testified that no part of the principal had ever been paid, and that no money as interest had ever been received, but that Goffin had delivered some rent.

The plaintiff further stated, on oath, that a part of the land in question was overflowed, and, desiring to drain the inundated portion, he procured a survey of the route for a ditch and ascertained that the cost of making the necessary improvement would be $3,000, or more; that Goffin, to whom the premises had been leased, offered to advance the money necessary to dig the conduit, if he could retain the rent until he was repaid the outlay, but would not undertake the enterprise unless the defendants consented, in writing, to such appropriation of the rents; and, referring to the attempt made in the fall of 1895, to obtain their assent, the witness testified as follows: "I went to Hoefer & Zorn then with Goffin myself, and they refused; and I told them that the farm in that condition could not be made to pay the interest and taxes. Whereupon Mr. Hoefer & Zorn said that they would take the farm for interest and taxes, and I said, 'Very well', and gave Mr. Goffin, as my tenant, there in their presence, instructions to turn over all the landlord's interest in that particular part of the ground to them until further notice, and that is about the way it has stood to the present day. Q. Where was this conversation? A. At Hoefer & Zorn's house at Champoeg. Q. Did your tenant continue to pay them the rents and profits? A. Yes, I believe they did. They never paid it to me. I didn't ask them for any accounting, and I never agreed to make an accounting to them. That is, O. J. Goffin was to turn over the landlord's interest to them, that is, much or little. They took it in lieu of interest and taxes." On redirect examination, in referring to the attempt made to secure the defendants' consent to appropriating the rents in making the improvements, the plaintiff was asked, "Why did Goffin want that assurance?" and he replied, "Well, he knew that my note was going to fall due—I call that my note, this note they say was signed by Keen—in 1897, and that was in 1895, and he didn't figure perhaps that the farm would make enough money to pay him in two years, and he thought I might be foreclosed."

O. J. Goffin testified: That in the fall of 1895 he secured from the plaintiff a lease of the premises for the term of 10 years, stipulating in the demise to give as rent one-third of the crops raised and to dig a ditch to drain the overflowed part of the real property, retaining the rent reserved until he was reimbursed for the outlay. That he assigned his interest in the lease to his father, and, desiring to obtain the defendants' written consent thereto, he with the plaintiff called upon them for that purpose, but they refused to ratify the agreement, saying: "I took Eldridge with me there to explain the matter and try to influence Mr. Hofer & Zorn to put their name on there. That my father was very much dissatisfied and would not go ahead with the ditch; and at the time the conversation came up that they could not farm the land to any advantage without the ditch. It is a fact to-day; and I had previous to that tried to dig the ditch with the help of Eldridge, and had to give it up on account of not having enough money, and they were angry. Casper [Zorn] was doing the talking with Mr. Eldridge. They were angry; and Eldridge told him he could not possibly pay on that place and could not pay interest and taxes there unless there would be something done toward clearing up that bottom; and Casper spoke up and said he would pay the taxes and interest for the rent of that farm; * * * and then Eldridge turned around and told me, asked me if I heard that, and he said, 'You pay the rent to them. I am satisfied.' Q. Then he told you that? A. Yes, sir. Q. Then you went away? A. Well, we stayed around there, and we talked about it a little more, and we still tried to get them to sign a contract for this ditch." Goffin further testified that, at his suggestion, his father thereafter secured from the defendants a lease of the premises, but that he did not think the plaintiff ever knew anything about it.

The defendants, as witnesses in their own behalf, severally testified that they never entered into any agreement with the plaintiff whereby they stipulated to receive the rent in lieu of the interest and taxes, but that on April 20, 1896, and after they secured Keen's second deed, they, as the owners of the land, leased it to F. Goffin, who thereafter, as their tenant, delivered to them the rent agreed upon for the use of the premises.

The foregoing excerpts from the testimony show the conflict as to the payments of interest and principal, claimed to have been made by the plaintiff on account of Keen's promissory note prior to January 25, 1896, when the second deed was executed to the defendants, and also indicates the controversy as to the alleged agreement of the latter to accept the rent in lieu of the interest and taxes. The theory of plaintiff's counsel is that their client never consented to the execution of the second deed, and though he was informed thereof soon after the sealed instrument was made, he knew that the equitable estate in the premises, which Keen held in trust for him, and of which the defendants had knowledge, was not thereby transferred, and he supposed that F. Goffin, who had secured from his son an assignment of the lease, was, as plaintiff's tenant, delivering to the defendants the share of the crops raised on the premises, pursuant to their stipulation to receive the rent in place of the interest and taxes, and hence no accounting was required. The defendants' counsel maintain that their clients dealt with Keen in relation to the land, and, having obtained his deed of January 25, 1896, they, as owners in fee, leased the premises to F. Goffin, who thereafter delivered to them the share of the crops agreed upon, and for this reason no accounting for the rents was necessary.

It is impossible to reconcile the testimony, and any conclusion that may be reached on the facts is doubtful. A moment's computation will disclose that the annual interest on the sum loaned, at the rate specified, is $1,092. It seems improbable that the plaintiff would have paid three installments of interest and the further sum of $1,000 on account of the principal, without taking any receipt therefor, or seeing that these sums were indorsed on Keen's note. That the plaintiff did not obtain from the defendants written evidence of the alleged payments or observe that the sums of money claimed to have been paid were indorsed on the negotiable instrument, or give any reason for his failure in these respects, are circumstances tending to discredit his testimony. So, too, the plaintiff's inability to fix the time when the alleged payments were made, or to state the amount of money which he claimed to have given the defendants, are also circumstances tending to weaken his declarations under oath. It must be admitted that in paying out small sums of money a person might not remember the medium or denomination of the coin or currency used, or, if he were daily disbursing large sums of money, it is possible that he might forget the details of the transaction. The testimony does not show that the plaintiff's business was of such magnitude that the giving of $1,092 could be classed as an insignificant sum, or that such payment was with him a matter of common occurrence, and for these reasons it would seem that he should have remembered the time, place, and circumstances of the respective alleged payments, including the medium in which they were made. It will be remembered that the plaintiff testified that, in order to make a payment on the note, O. J. Goffin borrowed money for him from one Dufer and also from Guston Bros., for which promissory notes were given, without stating what sums were thus obtained. Goffin testified that he borrowed money for the plaintiff, saying he secured for that purpose $40 from one Dufer. It is quite probable that the person last mentioned from whom a loan was thus obtained is the same individual indicated by the plaintiff as Dufer. The loan of $40 is the only money particularly specified by this witness, which sum is so small, when compared with a year's interest on the promissory note, that it would appear from his use of the qualifying word "considerable," as employed to express the amount of money which the plaintiff paid the defendants in his presence, that he did not mean thereby a very large sum. This witness further testified that, in addition to the money which he borrowed for the plaintiff, he also turned over to him some grain, which delivery would seem partially to corroborate the defendants' testimony that the only payments ever made on account of Keen's note was some grain, for which proper credit was given. All the testimony relating to the alleged payment of interest and principal for the first three years after the making of the promissory note has been hereinbefore set forth, a careful consideration of which, when examined by the light of reasonable probabilities, convinces us that the entire payments made by the plaintiff to the defendants within the time thus indicated amount only to $509.50, as testified to by the latter. The testimony also shows that the plaintiff represented to the defendants that, unless a ditch was dug, so as to drain a part of the land, thereby increasing the arable area, the interest and taxes stipulated to be paid could not be obtained from the premises by cultivation. According to the plaintiff's own admission, he was more or less in arrears all the time in the payment of the interest, and never paid any part of the taxes mentioned. In consequence of this default the defendants complained at the time it is asserted the rents were accepted in lieu of the interest and taxes. It would seem improbable that the defendants agreed to such terms when they knew that the share of crops stipulated to be given for the use of the premises was not equivalent in value to the interest and taxes.

It would further appear, from Goffin's testimony, that though some negotiations, in relation to the alleged agreement to accept the rent in lieu of the interest and taxes, had been attempted, thereafter efforts were made to obtain the defendants' written indorsement on the lease, to the effect that the tenant might be permitted to apply the rent on account of the expense to be incurred in digging the ditch, and that he might retain possession of the land until the cost of making such improvement was repaid from the revenue to be derived from the source mentioned. The subsequent attempt to secure such consent induces the conclusion that there had been no meeting of the minds of the plaintiff and defendants on this branch of the case, and hence no contract, as alleged, was ever consummated between them in relation thereto. No accounting has been demanded by either party, nor is there any testimony in the transcript from which the value of the rents received by the defendants can be legally determined. We entertain no doubt that the original deed executed by Keen was intended by the parties as a mortgage; and we also think that the subsequent deed did not transfer to the defendants the plaintiff's equitable estate in the land, and therefore a redemption from the lien or a foreclosure thereof should be decreed, in view of which the plaintiff should be charged with the sum loaned and the interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from October 10, 1892, and the taxes annually assessed against the note, as provided for therein, if the amount of such burden can be segregated from the defendants' assessment of money, notes, and accounts; that the plaintiff should be credited with $509.50, admitted in the answer to have been received, and such other sums of money or credits as he may hereafter be able to show, by a preponderance of the testimony, that he has paid or delivered on account of the promissory note, and also credited with the value of the rents and profits of the land which the defendants, as mortgagees in possession, have received since January 25, 1896, when they secured Keen's second deed.

It will be remembered that the plaintiff alleged that he was offered for the land $42,000, upon receiving which bid he notified the defendants thereof and demanded of them that he be permitted to redeem the real property, by complying with the conditions stated, but that they refused to accede to his request. The complaint does not allege a tender or an offer to pay $14,000, the sum admitted by the plaintiff to be due. The rules of law do not impose upon a party to a suit or action the performance of vain things, as a condition precedent to the enforcement of a right; and when the plaintiff averred that he notified the defendants of the alleged offer for the land, and that he would pay them the sum which he admitted to be due, if they would permit him to redeem the premises from their lien, and they refused to comply therewith, the complaint stated facts sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to the equitable relief which he sought, without alleging a tender or an offer to pay the sum conceded by him to be due to the defendants. Lovejoy v. Chapman, 23 Or. 571, 32 Pac. 687; Fitzgerald v. Kelso, 71 Iowa, 731, 29 N. W. 943.

The plaintiff's theory of the transaction is that the original deed executed by Keen was intended to secure the payment of a debt, and hence the sealed instrument is a mortgage. A lien having been thus created, the only way its discharge could have been secured was by tendering to the defendants the amount due on the promissory note, which was not done. Though the averment of a tender or an offer to pay such sum is not necessary to be stated in a complaint, as a condition precedent to the right to redeem property from a lien, when such right is denied by the adverse party, for the reason hereinbefore stated, yet we think that the money admitted to be due the defendants should have been presented to them before they could be in default, so as to render them liable for the sum asserted to have been offered for the land, but no tender having been made, the court properly denied this part of the relief.

The decree will, therefore, be set aside, and the cause remanded, with directions to take further testimony as to the amount due on the note; and after that sum is ascertained in the manner indicated, a decree will be rendered as originally given, with such modifications as the changed conditions may require.

(50 Or. 449)

STATE v. TAYLOR et al.

(Supreme Court of Oregon. Jan. 7, 1908.)

1. ASSAULT—ASSAULT WITH COWHIDE—SELF-DEFENSE.

The offense under B. & C. Comp. § 1766, declaring a punishment for one who assaults another with a cowhide, having at the time in his possession a gun or other deadly weapon, with intent to intimidate and prevent the other from resisting, cannot involve the element of self-defense in favor of the assailant.

2. SAME—UNNECESSARY FORCE IN REMOVING TRESPASSER.

The gist of the offense under B. & C. Comp. § 1766, being to beat another with a cowhide, or like thing, while being armed with a deadly weapon, with intent to intimidate and to prevent the other from resisting, the statute does not apply to an altercation or ordinary assault and battery, though the assailant is armed with a gun; so that, where the element of removal of a trespasser by defendant is involved, the use of more force than necessary for such purposes, while constituting an assault, would not be a violation of such statute.

3. SAME—INFORMATION.

The crime of "assault being armed with a cowhide," denounced by B. & C. Comp. § 1766, declaring a punishment if any person shall assault another "with a cowhide, whip, stick, or like thing," under certain conditions, is not charged by an information, which in the preliminary part names defendants' offense as "assault, being armed with a leather strap," and in the charging part states that they, being armed with a leather strap, assaulted a person, a description of the leather strap being necessary to show that it was a like thing to a cowhide, whip, or stick.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Baker County; William Smith, Judge.

R. H. Taylor and another were convicted under B. & C. Comp. § 1766, and appeal. Reversed and remanded.

Chas. H. Carter and Woodson L. Patterson, for appellants. Gustav Anderson, for the State.

EAKIN, J. Information was filed against the defendants seeking to charge them with the crime of assault, being armed with a cowhide, as defined by B. & C. Comp. § 1766, and which provides: "Assault, Being Armed with a Cowhide. If any person shall assault, or assault and beat another with a cowhide, whip, stick, or like thing, having at the time in his possession a pistol, dirk, or other deadly weapon, with intent to intimidate and prevent such other from resisting or defending himself, such person, upon conviction thereof, shall be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary not less than one nor more than ten years." The information is in the following language: "R. H. Taylor and John S. Traut, the above-named defendants, are accused by Leroy Lomax, district attorney of the Eighth judicial district of the state of Oregon, by this information, of the crime of 'assault, being armed with a leather strap,' committed as follows: 'The said R. H. Taylor and John S. Traut did on the 8th day of April, A. D. 1907, in the county of Baker, and state of Oregon, then and there being and acting together, and being then and there armed with a leather strap, unlawfully and feloniously assault, strike, hit, and beat one Exilda Mitchell upon the body and head of her the said Exilda Mitchell with said leather strap, which said leather strap the said R. H. Taylor and the said John S. Traut then and there had and held in his hands while within striking, hitting, and beating distance of her the said Exilda Mitchell. The said R. H. Taylor and the said John S. Traut having at the time in his possession a pistol and a gun, the said pistol and the said gun being then and there a deadly weapon, with intent then and there and thereby to intimidate and prevent her the said Exilda Mitchell from resisting or defending herself, contrary to the statutes in such cases made and provided,' etc. Defendants were tried thereon, and convicted of the crime sought to be charged, and on June 27, 1906, sentenced to one year in the penitentiary. Exceptions were taken at the trial to various instructions given by the court, of which instructions we shall notice only the second and third, relating to the right of self-defense, and liability for assault in case more force is used than is necessary for such defense, and the right to defend the possession of real property.

This statute was evidently not intended to cover cases of ordinary assault, or assault with a dangerous weapon, as defined by B. & C. Comp. §§ 1771, 1772, but is intended to cover a particular offense, where the assailant, having in his possession a gun with intent to intimidate the object of his attack and thus prevent resistance, administers a cowhiding or beating. This offense can by no possible construction involve the element of self-defense in favor of the assailant. The intention to intimidate by means of a gun is the element that makes it a felony, by which the assailed person is compelled, through fear, to submit to the punishment. Neither could there be any element of trespass involved in the case. To constitute a liability under this statute, the defendant must be armed with a deadly weapon, with the intent and for the purpose of intimidation, to enable him to administer a cowhiding upon the object of his attack, and whether the assailed person is a trespasser or resists such assault can constitute no defense to the assailant; but the proof in such a case must be clearly brought within the spirit of the statute, and it cannot be made to apply to the case of an altercation, or an ordinary assault and battery, even though the assailant is armed with a gun. If the element of the removal of a trespasser from one's property is involved, as presented to the jury by the third instruction, then the use of more force than is necessary for that purpose would constitute an assault, but would not be evidence of a violation of this statute.

Instruction No. 2, as given by the court, reads: "If a person is assaulted by another, such person is then justified in using such force as may be reasonably necessary to defend himself; but if such person under pretext of self-defense exceeds the bounds of what is reasonably necessary for such defense, then such person would nevertheless be guilty of the assault." Here the court instructs the jury that if the defendants are assaulted, they have a right to resist such assault, but an excess of force in such resistance would constitute guilt under this statute, which lacks the principal element of that crime, viz., being armed with intent to intimidate, and thus enable them to inflict the punishment. In Mississippi, under a similar statute, it is held that the gist of the offense is in being armed with a pistol with intent to intimidate the person assaulted and prevent him from defending himself. Lawson v. State, 62 Miss. 556.

The case was presented to the jury upon the theory that if the defendants, being armed, assaulted Mrs. Mitchell, they were guilty, or, if they acted at first in self-defense, but used more force than was necessary in such defense, they were guilty of the crime charged, thus losing sight of the element of intimidation to enable defendants to administer a castigation; hence the second instruction is erroneous in authorizing a verdict of guilty of the charge upon proof of more force than necessary for defense of the person, and the third instruction contains a similar error, in authorizing a conviction if more force is used than necessary to remove a trespasser from real estate.

The sufficiency of the indictment is also questioned by the defendants, in that it does not charge the crime for which they were tried. In the statute of 1864 the name of this crime is given in the index to the sections at the beginning of chapter 43, of which it is a part, and also on the margin opposite section 527, its original number, as, "assault, being armed with a cowhide," and was so adopted by the Legislature, and the name of the crime thus became part of the law (State v. Vowels, 4 Or. 324; State v. Nease, 46 Or. 433, 80 Pac. 897), and "assault, being armed with a strap," does not name the crime defined by this section. However, an error in the name of the crime in the preliminary part of the information is not fatal if the charging part is sufficiently specific. State v. Sweet, 2 Or. 127; State v. Jarvis, 18 Or. 300, 23 Pac. 251. But the charge is, "did assault, strike, hit, and beat one Exilda Mitchell . . . with said leather strap."

The allegation contains nothing to bring the strap within the class of instruments mentioned under "cowhide, whip, stick, or like thing." In Alabama, under a similar statute providing that an assault with a cowhide, stick, or whip, having in his possession a pistol with intent to intimidate, an indictment that charged an assault with a rope, stick, or whip was held sufficient to sustain a conviction for assault, but insufficient if the conviction had been for the offense charged. Higginbotham v. State, 50 Ala. 138. Where the instrument used is not one of those named in the statute, then it must be so described as to bring it within the class named. Where a statute, in defining a crime committed by use of weapons, mentions certain weapons "or other deadly weapon," it is held that those named in the statute need not be described as deadly weapons, but if another than those named in the statute is relied upon as coming within the term "other deadly weapon," it must be so averred as to bring it within that designation. State v. Sebastian, 81 Mo. 514; State v. Hoffman, 78 Mo. 256; State v. Painter, 67 Mo. 84; State v. Porter, 101 N. C. 713, 7 S. E. 902. The language of this statute is, "with a cowhide, whip, stick, or like thing." If the instrument used was one mentioned in the statute, the description of it need only disclose that fact; but if, as in this case, it is some other instrument relied upon as coming within the term "or like thing," then it must be so set forth to disclose that it is a like thing to a cowhide, whip, or stick, and it is not sufficient to refer to it as a leather strap. Therefore the information is insufficient to charge the crime defined by B. & C. Comp. § 1766, but is sufficient to charge the crime of assault and battery.

Therefore the judgment of the lower court will be reversed, and the cause remanded for such further proceedings as may be proper, not inconsistent with this opinion.

APPEAL AND ERROR—TRANSFER OF CAUSE—
TRANSCRIPT—TIME FOR FILING.

B. & C. Comp. § 549, requires an appellant to file a transcript within 30 days after the perfection of the appeal. Held, that where, on notice of appeal, the trial judge entered in the bench docket a memorandum that appellant was given 60 days to file a bill of exceptions, the memorandum did not amount to an order enlarging the time to file a transcript.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Tillamook County; Wm. Galloway, Judge.

Action by R. Robinson against the R. Robinson Cheese Company. From a judgment in favor of respondent, defendant appeals. Motion to dismiss the appeal granted.

W. H. Holmes, for appellant. Ralph R. Dunlway, for respondent.

*Rehearing denied February 11, 1908.

MOORE, J. This is a motion to dismiss an appeal. The plaintiff, on May 2, 1907, secured in the circuit court for Tillamook county a judgment against the defendant, a corporation, whereupon the latter in open court gave oral notice of appeal, and on the same day served and filed an undertaking therefor. The judge at that time entered in the bench docket the following memorandum: "May 2d. Motion for new trial denied. Counsel for defendant saves exceptions and gives notice of appeal, and is given sixty days to file bill of exceptions. Plaintiff takes judgment." Though no exception was taken to the sufficiency of the sureties in the undertaking, and no other order obtained enlarging the time for the performance of any act relating to the appeal, the transcript was not filed in this court until July 22, 1907. The statute regulating the manner of taking appeals contains the following clauses: "Within five days after service of said undertaking, the adverse party or his attorney shall except to the sufficiency of the sureties in the undertaking, or he shall be deemed to have waived his right thereto. * * * From the expiration of the time allowed to except to the sureties in the undertaking, * * * the appeal shall be deemed perfected." B. & C. Comp. § 549. "Upon the appeal being perfected, the appellant shall, within thirty days thereafter, file with the clerk of the appellate court a transcript. * * * If the transcript * * * is not filed with the clerk of the appellate court within the time provided, the appeal shall be deemed abandoned, and the effect thereof terminated, but the trial court or the judge thereof, or the supreme court or a justice thereof, may, upon such terms as may be just, by order enlarge the time for filing the same." Id. § 553.

An examination of these provisions in connection with the facts hereinbefore stated will show that the appeal was perfected May 7, 1907, but that the transcript was not filed in this court within 30 days thereafter. The question presented by this motion is whether or not the entry in the bench docket of the memorandum hereinbefore quoted can be construed as an order enlarging the time to file a transcript. The filing of a transcript in an appellate court is the consummation of the means whereby that tribunal obtains jurisdiction of a cause. A bill of exceptions cannot be incorporated into a record until it has been made a part thereof by being allowed and certified to by the judge. When a court by an order enlarges the time in which to file a transcript, it thereby impliedly extends the time in which to secure a bill of exceptions, on the assumption that the greater regulation necessarily includes the less; but, as an order in an inferior matter does not embrace a superior prescription, it follows that the memorandum hereinbefore set forth, if it be treated as an order duly made and entered, does not enlarge the time for the filing of the transcript.

No jurisdiction of the appeal having been obtained, the motion must be allowed; and it is so ordered.

FARRELL v. PORT OF COLUMBIA et al.

(Supreme Court of Oregon. Jan. 8, 1908.)

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—AMENDMENT OF STATE CONSTITUTION—SUBMISSION TO POPULAR VOTE.

Const. art. 4, § 1, as amended in 1902, reserves to the people the power to propose amendments to the Constitution and to enact or reject them at the polls, independent of the legislative assembly, and provides that, on petition filed with the Secretary of State, the amendment shall be submitted to the people, and, if approved by a majority, shall become operative. Article 17, § 1, provides that an amendment to the Constitution may be proposed in the legislative assembly, and if agreed to by a majority shall be referred to the legislative assembly next to be chosen, and that if the amendment shall be agreed to by a majority of that legislative assembly the amendment shall be submitted to the voters, and if a majority of them shall ratify the same such amendment shall become a part of the Constitution. Held, that article 11, § 2, as amended in June, 1906, prohibiting the Legislature from creating corporations by special laws, was legally adopted, though not twice submitted to and approved by the people; article 17, § 1, having no reference to an amendment made under article 4, § 1.

On petition for rehearing. Petition denied. For former opinion, see 91 Pac. 546.

PER CURIAM. A petition for rehearing was filed in this case in September last. Its consideration was deferred at the request of counsel for defendants, that they might submit an additional argument in its support, and they have just advised that no such argument will be filed. Except on one point the petition is a reargument of the cause, and, notwithstanding the able presentation of counsel, we are constrained to adhere to the former opinion.

It is insisted, however, for the first time, that the amendment of section 2, art. 11, of the Constitution, adopted in June, 1906, prohibiting the Legislature from creating corporations by special laws, was not legally adopted, because it was not twice submitted to and approved by the people. By section 1, art. 4, as amended in 1902, the people reserve to themselves the power to propose amendments to the Constitution and enact or reject them at the polls, independent of the legislative assembly. This section provides that upon a petition of not more than 8 per cent. of the legal voters of the state, proposing any measure, being filed with the Secretary of State not less than four months before the election at which such measure is to be voted upon, the same shall be submitted to the people, and if approved by the majority of the votes cast thereon shall become operative. There is no requirement that an amendment proposed under this section shall be submitted to and approved by the people more than once, and section 1, art. 17, can have no reference to such an amendment, since the power reserved to the people is "independent of the legislative assembly."

Petition for rehearing denied.

CITY OF EUGENE v. LANE COUNTY.

(Supreme Court of Oregon. Jan. 7, 1908.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—ASSESSMENT OF TAXES.

Where, under a city charter, taxes on property within the city, for road purposes within the city, should have been levied by the city, but the same were levied by the county, and the county collected them, as required by B. & C. Comp. § 3094, and the taxes were voluntarily paid, the city was entitled to recover them from the county.

2. TAXATION—RECOVERY OF TAXES PAID.

Where a void tax is voluntarily paid, it cannot be recovered back.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 45, Taxation, § 999.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Lane County; J. W. Hamilton, Judge.

Action by the city of Eugene against Lane county. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

This is a proceeding brought by the plaintiff to review the action of the county court of Lane county in disallowing its claim for road tax money collected by the county from the taxable property within the city of Eugene. The claim presented by the plaintiff against the county recites that the county court of said county did on January 7, 1904, levy a tax against all taxable property in said county, including property within said city of Eugene, in which was computed for road purposes one mill on each dollar, which tax was computed on the assessment roll for the year 1903, and that the same levy was made for a similar purpose January 11, 1905, and computed on the tax roll for the year 1904, and again on January 6, 1906, computed on the tax roll for the year 1905, and that of the taxes so levied there was collected by the county and turned over to its treasurer of the tax so computed for road purposes upon the taxable property within said city of Eugene a total of $5,291.44, and that on the 16th day of June, 1906, the said county court, after consideration, disallowed said claim, and the plaintiff brought the said proceeding to the circuit court of the state of Oregon for Lane county by writ of review, and by it the writ was sustained, and the county court directed to allow the said claim with interest from June 16, 1906; and the county has brought the case to this court by appeal.

Woodcock & Potter, for appellant. Williams & Bean, for respondent.

EAKIN, J. (after stating the facts as above). The city charter of 1893 (Laws 1893, p. 564), in force at the time of the levy of January 7, 1904, and January 11, 1905, provided (section 127) that the city shall constitute an independent road district, and for road purposes is expressly taken from the jurisdiction and control of the county court. The charter of 1905, in force at the time of the levy of January 6, 1906, by section 114, which corresponds with section 127 (page 595) of the charter of 1893, in taking from the county the jurisdiction over the territory within the city of Eugene for road purposes, also expressly takes away the power to levy taxes for road purposes, and road and poll taxes are by both charters given over to the control of the city, and the city is authorized to levy a road tax to be collected as other taxes. By section 3098, B. & C. Comp., which has been in force since 1893, cities and school districts are required, after making their tax levy, to notify the county clerk thereof, and by section 3094 the county clerk shall include such city and other tax levies with the county levy in extending the same upon the tax roll, and they shall be collected by the sheriff as other taxes are collected. It has been decided by this court, in Salem v. Marion County, 25 Or. 449, 36 Pac. 163, and Oregon City v. Clackamas County, 32 Or. 491, 52 Pac. 310, that, where the county collects road taxes belonging to the city that should have been collected by the city officers, the county is required to pay over the same to the city, and this is conceded by defendant; but it is claimed that the case at bar does not come within the ruling in Salem v. Marion County, for the reason that the road tax levy in the latter case, even within the city, was properly made by the county court, but that it was the duty of the city's officers, and not the sheriff, to collect the tax. In this case, as well as in that, the county had no right or claim to the money. It properly belongs to the city. In Salem v. Marion County, supra, the tax was collected by the wrong officer, while in this case it was collected by the right officer, but the levy made by the wrong body; and the whole reliance by the defendant, to justify its refusal to pay the money over to the city, is that it is liable only to the taxpayers, and not to the city. However, if the levy was void and might have been resisted by the taxpayer, yet, when he has voluntarily paid it, he is precluded from questioning the regularity of the proceeding or the validity of the levy. It is held in Brown v. School District, 12 Or. 345, 7 Pac. 357, that the collection of a void tax may be enjoined, or payment thereof may be made under protest and the amount recovered back. But when once voluntarily paid by the taxpayer he is precluded from thereafter attacking its validity.

It is generally conceded that a tax voluntarily paid cannot be recovered back, and it is immaterial in such a case that the tax has been illegally levied. Before a taxpayer can recover it back, the tax must be illegal and the payment must have been made under compulsion. Cooley, Taxation (2d Ed.) 805, 809. In People ex rel. v. Brown, 55 N. Y. 180, 187, where the validity of the tax was questioned by the collector, the court say: "The defendant cannot claim to retain the money as the representative of the taxpayers. There is no relation of principal and agent, or trustee or cestui que trust, existing between the taxpayers and the collector; and it does not appear but that it was paid by them voluntarily, and under circumstances which would prevent their recovering it back from any one." Similar language was used in Berrien County Treasurer v. Bunbury, 45 Mich. 79, 85, 7 N. W. 704, 706: "He received it in payment of taxes, and as money belonging to the public. Whose money is it? Those who were assessed voluntarily paid it in satisfaction of their tax dues and in the discharge of their duty as citizens. * * * Can it be an answer to this suit brought for its recovery to say: * * * But it could not have been obtained if the taxpayers who freely paid and do not complain had held back for compulsory measures? We think not." See, also, Lovington et al. v. Board of Trustees, 99 Ill. 564; O'Neal v. Board of School Com'rs, 27 Md. 227. Cooley, Taxation, 705, says the collector "would not be permitted to rely upon technical objections which might be made to the right of the public to the money. If he receives the money to the use of the public, he should account for it; and it is immaterial that those who have paid it might successfully have resisted the collection from them." "The principles here stated are applicable, not merely to the case of a defect in the official authority, but to the case, also, in which defects, either technical or substantial, might have been urged to the tax the officer has enforced." In Salem v. Marion County, supra, it is said: "The principle that an obligation rests upon all persons, natural and artificial, to do justice, so that, if a county obtain money or property of others without authority, the law, independent of any statute, will compel restitution or compensation, is not questioned."

By the terms of the statute above cited, the county is made the tax collector for cities and school districts, and it stands in that relation to them in all proceedings in relation thereto. If the county tax collector collects a void municipal tax and turns it over to the municipality, the remedy of the taxpayer, if he has saved his rights, is against the municipality, and not against the collector. Cooley, Taxation, 805. The county's position is wholly untenable. It has levied a road tax within the city, evidently in good faith, believing that that was the method for raising road taxes for the city, but now says that the city, and not the county, should have made the levy, and that it will, therefore, keep the money, on the theory that the city has no title to it. Although it was the duty of the city to have levied the tax, the county court assumed to do so, and then collected it, as was its duty, if properly levied. The city, by its conduct in claiming the tax, has ratified the levy, and the taxpayer has voluntarily paid the tax; hence it is clear that the fund is the property of the city, and the county is not justified in refusing to pay it over.

The judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

(13 Idaho, 721)

O'NEILL v. POTVIN.

(Supreme Court of Idaho. Jan. 22, 1908.)

Rehearing denied.

For former opinion, see 93 Pac. 20.

PER CURIAM. A petition for a rehearing has been filed herein, and the main contention is that the judgment roll in the case of Potvin v. Malenfant shows that the court never acquired jurisdiction to enter judgment in that action, and counsel contends that the affidavit and order for service of summons by publication are before the court, and ought to be considered.

It is true the affidavit and order for service of summons by publication are contained in the record, but under our statute are no part of the transcript on appeal, and for that reason this court cannot consider them. As stated in the opinion in this case, the judgment roll in cases where the complaint is not answered consists of the summons with the affidavit or proof of service and the complaint with a memorandum indorsed thereon that the default of the defendant in not answering was entered, and a copy of the judgment. On the trial of this case only the judgment roll in the case of Potvin v. Malenfant could be legally admitted as evidence as to the jurisdiction of the court to enter judgment in that case, and if the judgment roll in that case contained papers not constituting a part of the judgment roll, that court could not legally consider them, nor could such papers be considered on appeal by this court.

Section 4148, Rev. St. 1887, provides how the proof of service of summons and complaint must be made, and is as follows:

"Proof of service of summons and complaint must be as follows:

(1) If served by the sheriff, his certificate thereof;

(2) If by any other person, his affidavit thereof; or

(3) In case of publication, the affidavit of the printer, or his foreman or principal clerk, showing the same; and an affidavit of a deposit of a copy of the summons in the post office if the same has been deposited; or

(4) The written admission of the defendant. In case of service otherwise than by publication, the certificate or affidavit must state the time and place of service."

It will be observed that the third paragraph of said section applies to the proof of service of summons when the service has been made by publication, and it is there provided that the proof of such service is the affidavit of the printer or his foreman or principal clerk, showing the same, and an affidavit of the deposit of a copy of the summons in the post office, if the same has been deposited. As the statute provides just what the proof of service consists of, this court is not empowered to amend that section, and hold that the proof of service of summons by publication shall consist of the affidavit and order for the publication of summons, in addition to the affidavits provided for in said section.

It appears to us that the provisions of said section make it too clear to admit of any controversy as to just what papers the proof of service of summons by publication consists of. As no change could result in the opinion heretofore filed by granting a rehearing, a rehearing is denied.

CANADIAN BANK OF COMMERCE v. WOOD, Judge.

(Supreme Court of Idaho. Dec. 31, 1907.)

1. CERTIORARI—OTHER ADEQUATE REMEDY.

Under the provisions of Rev. St. 1887, § 4902, a writ of review may be granted by any court except a probate or justice's court, when an inferior tribunal, board, or officer, exercising judicial functions, has exceeded the jurisdiction of such tribunal, board, or officer, and there is no appeal, nor, in the judgment of the court, any plain, speedy, or adequate remedy.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 9, Certiorari, §§ 4, 41.]

2. SAME—WHEN ALLOWED.

Under this statute, two things must be shown to exist before a writ of review will be issued: First, that an inferior tribunal, board, or officer, exercising judicial functions, has exceeded its jurisdiction; and, second, that there is no appeal, nor, in the judgment of the court, any plain, speedy, or adequate remedy.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 9, Certiorari, §§ 4, 41.]

3. SAME—APPEALABLE ORDER.

An order made by a judge allowing claims, and disallowing others, against an estate, and directing a receiver to pay, out of the funds in his hands, such claims as the judge has allowed, and distribute the funds in the hands of the receiver, according to the order and judgment of the judge, is an appealable order or judgment, and certiorari will not lie to review such order.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 9, Certiorari, § 5.]

4. SAME—PETITION.

An allegation in a petition for writ of certiorari that, if an appeal be taken, the expense will be heavy and disproportionate to the amount the plaintiff will recover, is not a reason why the appeal will not be a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy, and does not warrant this court in reviewing the judgment by writ of certiorari.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 9, Certiorari, § 5.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Application by the Canadian Bank of Commerce for writ of certiorari to Fremont Wood, judge of the Third judicial district. Writ denied.

Samuel R. Stern, Ezra R. Whitla, and I. N. Smith, for petitioner. John P. Gray and J. H. Forney, for defendant.

STEWART, J. On August 3, 1907, Judge Fremont Wood, judge of the Third judicial district of the state of Idaho, sitting at chambers at Wallace, Shoshone county, Idaho, and within the First judicial district of the State of Idaho, filed in said court the following order or judgment:

"In the District Court of the First Judicial District of the State of Idaho, in and for the County of Shoshone. George B. McAuley and Van B. DeLashmutt, Plaintiffs, v. The Coeur d' Alene Bank, a Corporation, Defendant. Decree. Be it remembered, That the above-entitled action came on to be heard before the judge of the above-entitled court, sitting at chambers in Wallace, Idaho, on the 20th day of April, 1907, the Honorable Fremont Wood, judge of the Third judicial district of the state of Idaho, presiding at the request of the Honorable W. W. Woods, judge of the above-entitled court, said judge of the above-entitled court, being disqualified by reason of the fact that he had been attorney for the receiver of the said bank, and the said receiver, Abner G. Kerns, being personally present and represented by his attorneys, J. H. Forney, John P. Gray, and Henry S. Gregory; and Joseph P. Keane, claiming to be a creditor of the said bank, being personally present and represented by his attorney, Albert H. Featherstone; and the Canadian Bank of Commerce, claiming to be a creditor of said bank, and being represented by its attorney, Samuel R. Stern; and George Stewart, claiming to be a creditor of said bank, being represented by his attorney, A. H. Conner; and John Reedy, Alexander E. Mayhew, Mrs. E. J. Jackson, and Edward Doyle, claiming to be creditors of said bank; being represented by their attorneys, A. H. Conner, Walter H. Hanson, and James A. Wayne; and all of the persons so interested, or claiming to be interested, thereupon consented to the hearing of all matters in connection with the said action before the said court, and the said judge sitting in chambers on the said day, and no objection being made—the court proceeded to hear the said cause on the report of the receiver, filed the 14th day of January, 1907, and upon the petitions of Joseph P. Keane, George Stewart, and John Reedy, Alexander E. Mayhew, Mrs. E. J. Jackson, and Edward Doyle, and the complaint and records and files in the said action, and evidence was introduced and heard by the court, and after argument of counsel for the respective parties present, the court took the said cause under advisement. And now, at this time, the court having fully considered the said cause, and being advised in the premises, and having made its finding of fact and the conclusions of the law therefrom, it is hereby ordered, adjudged, and decreed as follows: (1) That the former order of this court, dated the 20th day of April, 1907, ordering, adjudging, and decreeing that the sum of ten thousand dollars ($10,000) be fixed and allowed as the sum of money to be paid to the said receiver for his compensation and expenses in the employment of counsel, and that the same be in full payment for all services rendered to April 20, 1907, and for such other services as may be rendered in the ordinary administration of the said estate, and directing the said receiver to pay the said sum of money for the said services be, and the same hereby is, confirmed and made a part of this decree; and that the former order of this court, dated April 20, 1907, ordering, adjudging, and decreeing that the expense account of the receiver for moneys expended by him as such officer up to and including the 14th day of January, 1907, amounting to the sum of four hundred eighty dollars and thirty-two cents ($480.32), be allowed, is hereby confirmed and made a part of this decree. (2) That the claim of the Bank of British Columbia, amounting to the sum of fourteen thousand four hundred and five dollars and forty cents ($14,405.40) principal, be, and the same is hereby, disallowed, and that the said Canadian Bank of Commerce, claiming to be the assignee and successor in interest of the said Bank of British Columbia, receive nothing from the said receiver. (3) That the claims of Joseph P. Keane, and each and all of them be, and the same are hereby, disallowed, and that the said Joseph P. Keane receive nothing from the said receiver on account of said claims. (4) That the said receiver proceed to close the administration of the affairs of the said Coeur d' Alene Bank; that a notice be published for a period of ——— weeks in the 'Idaho Press' a weekly newspaper published at Wallace, Idaho, and in 'The Times,' a daily newspaper published at Wallace, Idaho, directing the creditors of the said bank to apply to the said receiver for the payment of their claims, and that the said receiver pay the said claims, together with interest, in proportion as the assets in the hands of the receiver bear to the entire amount of claims of the said creditors. That the said receiver also give personal notice in writing to such creditors whose address is known to him; that in the event any of the said creditors of the said bank do not apply to the said receiver on or before the 1st day of ———, 190—, for the payment of their said claims, the claims of such creditors as fail to make application on or before said 1st day of ———, 190—, shall then be disallowed, and any moneys remaining in the hands of the said receiver after said 1st day of ———, 190—, shall be applied proportionately among these creditors who have appeared and applied for the payment of their claims, as in this decree provided, in payment of any balance due upon their said claims, and the interest thereon; and that the interest so to be paid by the receiver is hereby fixed at the sum of ——— per cent. per annum. (5) That upon the distribution of the money in the hands of the said receiver, as provided in this decree, and upon the filing by the said receiver of proper vouchers showing the payment thereof, the said receiver shall be entitled to be discharged. (6) That the said receiver be allowed the sum of two hundred fifty dollars ($250) for necessary expenses in closing the administration of the estate of the said bank, and in making the distribution as provided in this decree. (7) That the report of the said receiver, filed on the 14th day of January, 1907, be, and the same is hereby, approved except as by this decree modified. Dated this 27th day of July, A. D., 1907. Filed Aug. 3, 1907. Fremont Wood, Presiding Judge."

Thereafter, and on the 7th day of October, 1907, the plaintiff herein filed a petition praying for a writ of certiorari to review said order or judgment. The writ was issued, commanding the defendant to certify to this court a full and complete transcript and record in said proceedings, on the 18th day of November, 1907, and was served upon the defendant by acknowledgment of service on the 15th day of October. On the day set for the return, the defendant appeared and filed a motion to quash the writ upon a number of grounds, one of which is that service of said writ was not made upon the parties in interest in the proceeding, as shown in the petition for the writ. After argument, the court was of the opinion that the affidavit and notice of the hearing should have been served, not only upon the defendant, the judge who made said order, but upon all other parties shown by the record to be real parties in interest, or whose interests would be directly affected by the proceedings under paragraph 5, rule 28 of this court. 32 Pac. xii. Under Rev. St. 1887, §§ 4963 and 4967, and this rule, it is not necessary that any of the parties, except the defendant, should have been named as defendant, but it was necessary that the names of the parties really interested should be disclosed by the petition, and that service of such affidavit and notice should be made upon such persons. The effect of a failure to serve such parties is not a ground for quashing the writ, but, at most, calls only for a postponement of the hearing until such parties have reasonable notice of the time of such hearing. Baker v. Superior Court, 71 Cal. 583, 12 Pac. 685; Havemeyer v. Supreme Court, 84 Cal. 327, 24 Pac. 121, 10 L. R. A. 627, 18 Am. St. Rep. 192. The court, therefore, in this case, postponed the final hearing of this cause to the 15th day of December, 1907, and required that notice of such hearing be given to all parties disclosed by the petition to be parties in interest, or whose interest would be affected by such proceedings. Service was duly made upon such parties, and the cause was submitted thereafter upon the motion to quash the writ. The motion contains nine different grounds, the first eight of which go to the sole question as to whether or not a writ of certiorari would lie in this action. Rev. St. 1887, § 4962, provides: "A writ of review may be granted by any court, except a probate or justice's court, when an inferior tribunal, board or officer exercising judicial functions, has exceeded the jurisdiction of such tribunal, board or officer, and there is no appeal, nor, in the judgment of the court, any plain, speedy and adequate remedy." Conceding, therefore, without deciding, that Judge Wood had no jurisdiction to enter the judgment complained of, yet if the petitioner herein had the right to appeal from said order, the writ of certiorari would not lie to review said judgment or order.

In the case of Chemung Mining Co. v. Hanley, 11 Idaho, 302, 81 Pac. 619, this court had under consideration the question as to whether an order appointing a receiver pending the litigation was an appealable order. Justice Sullivan, speaking for the court in that case, says: "Under the provisions of section 9, art. 5, of our state Constitution, this court has jurisdiction to review, upon appeal, any decision of the district court or the judges thereof. An order granting or refusing a motion for the appointment of a receiver is a decision, and such decision is appealable, therefore the order of the district court denying the appointment of a receiver in this case, is an appealable order."

In the case of Dahlstrom v. Portland Mining Co., 12 Idaho, 87, 85 Pac. 916, this court had under consideration the provisions of said section, and Justice Sullivan, speaking for the court, said: "It will be observed that two things must be shown to exist before a writ of review will be issued. The first is that an inferior tribunal, board or officer exercising judicial functions has exceeded its jurisdiction; and, second, that there is no appeal, nor, in the judgment of the court, any plain, speedy, and adequate remedy. If in the case at bar, the petitioners had an appeal, the motion to quash the writ must be granted."

In the case of Grant v. Superior Court, 106 Cal. 324, 39 Pac. 604, a writ of prohibition was sought to arrest the action of the superior court in making an order fixing the compensation of a receiver appointed by such court, and the court says: "We are of the opinion that, whether the proceeding which the petitioners seek to arrest is or is not without or in excess of the jurisdiction of the superior court, the writ of prohibition ought not to issue, for the reason that the petitioners have a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy by appeal from any order the court may make by which they could be injuriously affected." And, further: "If we are right in the conclusion that any party aggrieved by an order of the court directing him to pay the receiver's compensation, or directing payment out of a fund in which he is interested, has an appeal from such order as from a final judgment in an independent proceeding, collateral to the main action, and that he may stay all proceedings upon such order pending his appeal by filing a proper undertaking, there can be no need of a writ of prohibition in such a case, and it will not lie."

In the case of Grant v. Los Angeles, etc.,

Ry., 116 Cal. 71, 47 Pac. 872, the court had under consideration appeals from two orders of the superior court; the first, an order fixing the compensation of a receiver in the action, and the other, an order denying an application of the appellant to vacate a former order, and substituting him as plaintiff in the action in place of the entered party or original plaintiff. The objection was made that such orders were not appealable and that both appeals should be dismissed. In discussing this question, the court says: "As to the order fixing the receiver's compensation, while not nominally one from which the statute authorizes a direct appeal, and while it sufficiently appears that it is not a special order made after final judgment, it is nevertheless an adjudication from which an appeal will lie. The order not only fixes the compensation of the receiver, but taxes such compensation as costs in the action, as against all the parties, and directs and authorizes the receiver to apply toward its payment the balance of a fund remaining in his hands as such receiver. Such an order, however, it may be designated, is, in legal effect, 'a final judgment upon a collateral matter arising out of the action,' and is 'appealable by any party interested in the fund.'"

In the case of Elliott v. Sup. Ct., 144 Cal. 501, 77 Pac. 1109, 103 Am. St. Rep. 102, the petitioner sought to review by certiorari certain orders of the superior court of San Diego county, made after final judgment. In relation to the payment of certain expenses of the receivership and services of attorneys for the receiver, the court says: "If the order complained of is appealable, certiorari cannot be invoked, and certiorari will not lie to review orders of the superior court directing a receiver in an equity case to pay counsel fees, if there is a remedy by appeal therefor." Rev. St. 1887, § 4962, is practically the same as section 1068, Kerr's Code of Civil Procedure of California.

An examination of the judgment sought to be reviewed in this case discloses that said judgment affirms certain action taken by the same court in a former order, and paragraph 2 of the decree adjudges that the claim of the Bank of British Columbia, amounting to the sum of $14,405.40, principal, is disallowed, and the Canadian Bank of Commerce, claiming to be the assignee and successor in interest of the said Bank of British Columbia, receive nothing from the receiver. Thus it will be seen that by this judgment the plaintiff herein, who claimed over $14,000 due out of said estate, the decree disallows such claim entirely. In paragraph 3 of the decree, the claim of Joseph P. Keane is disallowed. In paragraph 4, the receiver is directed to close the administration of the affairs of the Coeur d'Alene Bank, and to apply the moneys received therefrom in proportion as the assets in the hands of the receiver bear to the entire amount of the claim of said creditors, and that in the event any of the creditors do not apply to the receiver by a certain date for the payment of their claims the claims of such of said creditors who fail to make application shall be disallowed, and any moneys remaining in the hands of the receiver shall be applied proportionately among those who have appeared and applied for the payment of their claims as this decree provides. Paragraph 5 of the decree directs that upon the distribution of the money in the hands of the receiver the receiver shall be discharged, and that he be allowed the sum of $250 for necessary expenses in closing the administration of the estate. It will thus be seen that, by this decree, the plaintiff herein, who made a large claim, was denied any relief whatever, his claim being disallowed in toto, and the funds in the hands of the receiver were directed to be paid out by the receiver and distributed according to the terms of the decree. This decree was a final judgment. It directed the payment of money in the hands of the receiver. It adjudicated and allowed claims against the estate, and disallowed others, and, under the law, it ordered the receiver to pay out and distribute a fund in which the plaintiff and others claimed an interest. It was a final judgment as to plaintiff's claim. Clearly an appeal would lie therefrom, and the right of appeal excludes the right to proceed by certiorari.

In the case of Dahlstrom v. Portland Min. Co., 12 Idaho, 87, 85 Pac. 916, this court said: "If, in the case at bar, the petitioner had an appeal, the motion to quash the writ must be granted."

In the case of Stoddard v. Sup. Ct., 108 Cal. 303, 41 Pac. 278, the court says: "It may be readily admitted that the court had no jurisdiction to make the order, but, as the order is appealable, certiorari will not lie because it lies only where there is no appeal." And, again: "We have been referred to no case in which it has been held that under our Code a writ of certiorari will lie to reverse an appealable order. That the appeal does not afford a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy makes no difference; the provision of the statute governs."

In the case of White v. Sup. Ct., 110 Cal. 54, 42 Pac. 471, the court said: "Void judgments and orders are not less appealable by reason of that fact, and, when that remedy is afforded, it excludes the right to certiorari notwithstanding the order be void in the extreme sense."

In the case of Southern Cal. Ry. Co. v. Superior Court, 127 Cal. 417, 59 Pac. 789, the court reviews the various California cases passing upon this question up to that time, and approves the doctrine that the writ will not lie where there is an appeal provided by law. Counsel for plaintiff, however, contends that an appeal would not furnish a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy, and, as grounds, alleges in his affidavit "that, in view of the peculiar circumstances in this case, affiant and his associates are of the opinion that the court will ultimately hold that the said Canadian Bank of Commerce, said appellant, has no plain, speedy, or adequate remedy, except in the issuance of a writ of certiorari as provided for by the statutes of the state of Idaho; that to attempt to take this appeal means the expenditure of almost a prohibitory sum of money; that owing to the small amount to be distributed to the creditors it is questionable in the minds of affiant and his associates whether or not a sufficient dividend will ultimately be declared to give to the appellant the relief to which it should be properly entitled; that the proposed bill of exceptions, without an amendment, is a very voluminous bill, containing between 60 and 70 pages, and this without amendments, and without considering the printing of briefs, and then to send up the records in this case of appeal means an expenditure of a very large sum of money, scarcely permissible in view of the amount of the dividend likely to be recovered, even in the event of the ultimate allowance of the claim in question." This is the ground upon which the plaintiff relies to show that an appeal would not be a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy. We are not aware of any case wherein it has been held that an appeal is not a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy because the appeal would cost a large sum of money. This is no reason why a writ of review should be issued. If this court should issue the writ in this case, and require the defendant to certify to this court the record, the same expense, almost, which would be incurred by the appellant upon appeal will be shifted to the defendant upon the return to the writ. This reason is no reason at all for not taking the appeal. If an appeal would lie from said order, it was the plaintiff's duty to pursue that remedy. Excessive costs to be incurred on appeal is not a reason why the judgment should be reviewed by a writ of certiorari. The aggrieved party must be relegated to the remedy pointed out by the statute. If the appellant desired to have the order reviewed in the method pointed out by law, he could have secured a stay of execution of said judgment as provided by law. The stay being provided by the statute, and the question of expense being the only reason why the legal remedy was not pursued, is not sufficient to authorize this court in setting aside the method provided by statute for reviewing the judgment, and establishing a new and different method.

The judgment, therefore, sought to be reviewed by writ of certiorari being an appealable judgment, it would be wholly unprofitable, and the court would not be authorized to consider the question as to the jurisdiction of the defendant to enter the judgment complained of.

The motion to quash the writ will be sustained. Costs awarded to the defendant.

RENARD et al. v. BENNETT et al.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. Dec. 7, 1907.

Rehearing Denied Jan. 16, 1908.)

1. DEATH—PRESUMPTION—ABSENCE.

Following Modern Woodmen v. Gerdorn, 72 Kan. 391, 82 Pac. 1100, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 800, it is held that the inference of death to be derived from the unexplained absence of a person from his home for a period of seven years is, at best, only a presumption, and it cannot arise, unless the absence remains unexplained after diligent inquiry is made of the persons and at the places where tidings of the absentee, if living, would most probably be had.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 15, Death, §§ 1-3.]

2. SAME.

The removal of a person to another part of the country, or his mere absence from a former home, where he has been unheard of for seven years, does not create the presumption of death.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 15, Death, §§ 1-3.]

3. SAME—NECESSITY OF INQUIRY.

If the absentee left without intending to return, and there is a change of domicile, the fact that he has not communicated with, or is unheard of, by those remaining at his former home, will not raise the presumption of death. That presumption does not arise until due inquiry has been made at his last-known domicile, and of the persons likely to know of his whereabouts, if living.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 15, Death, §§ 1-3.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from District Court, Cloud County; W. T. Dillon, Judge.

Action by Edward Bennett and Nettie Seyster against Arthur E. Renard and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants bring error. Reversed and remanded.

Park B. Pulsifer and C. L. Hunt, for plaintiffs in error. F. W. Sturges, for defendants in error.

JOHNSTON, C. J. This was an action by Edward Bennett and Nettie Seyster, children of Orrin E. Bennett, to recover an undivided one-half interest in a tract of land lying near the city of Concordia, and they asked for partition as well as rents and profits. The tract was formerly owned by D. W. Williams, who conveyed an undivided one-half interest to Orrin E. Bennett, and together they operated a brewery on the land until 1881, when the prohibitory law went into effect. About that time Williams removed to Missouri, while Bennett remained at Concordia, and for a few years gave the property some attention. In a foreclosure proceeding against Williams the sale of the land was decreed, and the sheriff sold the same to the First National Bank of Concordia, conveying the property by a deed dated May 5, 1892. On December 21, 1900, the bank executed a deed purporting to convey the property to the Renard Bros., who were named as defendants in this action. The theory of the action is that Bennett's interest in the tract had never been sold or transferred by any of the prior instruments or proceedings, that Bennett was dead, and that his interest had passed to his children, who were his only heirs. When plaintiffs had introduced their testimony, which was largely devoted to an attempt to show the death of Orrin E. Bennett, its sufficiency was challenged by a demurrer to the evidence which the court overruled, and at the end of the trial it was adjudged that Edward Bennett and Nettie Seyster each owned an undivided quarter interest in the property in question, the rents and profits were determined, and the partition of the property directed. The only claim of the Bennett children to a share in the land in controversy is based on heirship or inheritance from their father, and it therefore devolved upon them to establish his death. There was no direct proof of death as a fact, and to supply this lack they offered testimony which was intended to raise the presumption of death. The controlling question is, were the circumstances proven sufficient to end the presumption of life and start the presumption of death? and, if not, then the demurrer to the evidence should have been sustained, as counsel for Renard Bros. contend. When the action was brought, Bennett had been absent from Concordia for more than 15 years, but his mere absence from that city, although it extended for more than 7 years, did not create the presumption of death. That presumption cannot arise from a change of residence, or a removal from the place where the family or relatives reside. It is the unexplained absence from the absentee's last-known residence or places of resort for the 7-year period that gives rise to the presumption. Nor is it enough that he is absent and unheard of for this period, but the presumption can only arise after diligent inquiry of persons and at places where news of him, if living, might likely be obtained without gaining information concerning him.

The identical question was before the court in Modern Woodmen v. Gerdorf, 72 Kan. 391, 82 Pac. 1100, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 809. Gerdorf, an unmarried man, left his home in Kansas and went to California, where he obtained employment. After several letters to members of his family, and some changes of location, he ceased to communicate with them, and no tidings of him were received by his father and mother for more than 7 years. He carried life insurance in a fraternal society, which was claimed by beneficiaries who insisted that he was dead. It appeared that only a limited inquiry as to whether he was living had been made by them, his father being the only witness who testified on the subject, and it was shown that he had not inquired of all the people and at all the places where news of the son, if living, might have been obtained. On this state of the case it was held that it was not a question of whether there was some testimony to support the finding of death, but it was rather whether facts indispensable to start the presumption of death had been produced. Justice Burch, in a carefully prepared opinion, in speaking of the missing party and the circumstances which might give color to his absence, said that he "was a young, unmarried man, in good health, with the wander-lure upon him, trying his fortunes in a distant state, able to make his own way in the world, but whose circumstances had become such, or whose disposition towards his relatives had so far changed during his absence from home, that he no longer advised them, as he had been in the habit of doing, of changes in his affairs, of his plans, and of his movements from town to town." In treating of the inquiry which should be made and the preliminary proof necessary to start the presumption of death, it was said: "In order that the presumption of life may be overcome by the presumption of death there must be evidence, not merely of absence from home or place of residence for the period of 7 years, but there must be a lack of information concerning the absentee on the part of those likely to hear from him, after diligent inquiry (quoting authorities). It is conceived, however, that the character of the inquiry, the persons of whom it must be made, and the place or places where it must be made are all to be determined by the circumstances of the case, with the obligation always upon the person who is to derive a benefit from the death of the absentee to exclude by the best evidence, and with as much certainty as possible, reasonable belief that he continues to live." After referring to the fact that inquiry was not made of certain intimate friends with whom the absentee might have communicated, the opinion proceeded: "All those persons who, in the ordinary course of events would likely receive tidings if the party were alive, whether members of his family or not, should be interrogated, and the result of the inquiry should be given in evidence, or the testimony of the parties themselves should be produced at the trial. * * * Any word received by any one who might naturally be expected to hear at any time within the 7-year period destroys the presumption of death, and unless the resources of this field of information have been exhausted, an allegation of death cannot successfully be sustained."

The principles applied in that case control the present disposition of the one before us. While Bennett had been absent from Concordia for a long period of time, it is clear that there has not been the diligent inquiry for him essential to the presumption, that is, the inquiry has not exhausted "all patent sources of information, and of others which the circumstances of the case suggest." He took his departure from Concordia about 1890, leaving a family consisting of a wife and three children, one of whom has since died, and also an aged mother. A married sister of his lives in Concordia, another married sister in Kansas City, Mo., and a half-brother near Frankfort, Kan. It is in testimony that he had a passion for gambling, one of the witnesses stating that "that was really what he lived for," and that he gambled whenever "he had the money to gamble with." Before he left he had become estranged from his wife, and, as one witness expressed it, "he wanted to go away from the family." His relations with his mother were friendly, but he did not want to live in the same town with his wife. He went West, and within six months after leaving he wrote a letter to his mother from a town on the Pacific Coast stating that he was in good health and was just about to sail on a vessel from that port to one in Alaska. About the same time he wrote a similar letter to his son William, who afterwards died in the Philippines. His wife, who died in 1894, never received a letter from him, nor did he ever write to his surviving children, Edward and Nettie. There was a rumor that he had been seen by some one in a town in the state of Washington, who was not within speaking distance, and his sister wrote a letter addressed to him at that place but received no reply, and, although there was a return address on the envelope, the letter was never returned to her. When his mother died, which occurred about a year after he left Concordia, notices of action to be taken in the probate court towards a settlement of her estate were published in the newspapers, and copies of these papers were mailed to him at the town where rumor said he had been seen. The sending of the letter and the newspapers was the extent of the inquiry made to find Bennett in his new home in the West. Rumors of his having been in Kansas City, Mo., reached some of the members of his family, but they did not appear to have any foundation. It does not appear that his children, who are claiming his property as an inheritance, ever made any effort to find their father. The testimony of his brother who lives in Kansas was not produced, nor was that of his sister who lives in Kansas City, Mo., nor of the brother-in-law, a former partner, who still resides at the latter place. More than that it was not shown that any inquiry was made at the place from which the letters to his mother and son were written. His letter to his mother gave the name of the place on the coast, but which the witnesses could not remember, and that furnished a clue from which those interested might have learned something of him, the name of the ship upon which he sailed, as well as his destination and subsequent domicile in Alaska. It does not appear that any inquiry was made in Alaska, nor any effort to learn from sailing lists, public records, or other sources of information what had become of the absentee. According to his own statement, his departure from his Kansas home was final and permanent. It was a case of a change of domicile, and therefore little can be based upon the fact that he did not return to Concordia. Since the removal was permanent and without an intention to return, a more extended inquiry should be made. It should extend to the new home. It is absence from his last known domicile that gives rise to the presumption. It was said of the absentee in the Gerdom case that "there was nothing to indicate that a purpose to return was bound up with his going." Here there was an avowed purpose to stay away from Concordia, and in the letters received from him there was no hint of an intention to return. It is quite unlike a case where there is a sudden disappearance of one of good habits, who is successful in business and respected by his neighbors, having a good home and pleasant relations. There were no attachments to draw Bennett back to Concordia, no business interests, and the only property left was incumbered and unprofitable. There is no proof of illness, disease, dangerous occupation, or disposition to suicide, nor yet that he had been exposed to any specific perils likely to have ended his life, to support the presumption. On the other hand, it does appear that he was a healthy, vigorous man, in middle age, as there was testimony that he was from 55 to 59 years of age at the time of the trial, and besides there is an absence of any special circumstances inconsistent with the continuation of life. The patent defect in the testimony, however, is the lack of diligent inquiry. To establish a death and right of inheritance, plaintiffs rely only upon the presumption arising from absence. The inference of death to be derived from unexplained absence is, at most, only a presumption, and it cannot arise, unless the absence remains unexplained after diligent inquiry is made of the persons and at the places where tidings of him, if living, would most probably be had. Modern Woodmen v. Gerdom, supra; Iberia Cypress Co. v. Thorgeson, 116 La. 218, 40 South. 682; Barr v. Chapman, 30 Wkly. Law Bul. 285; Burnett v. Costello, 15 S. D. 89, 87 N. W. 575; Hitz v. Ahlgren, 170 Ill. 60, 48 N. E. 1068; Francis v. Francis, 180 Pa. 644, 37 Atl. 120, 57 Am. St. Rep. 668; Posey v. Hanson, 10 App. D. C. 496; Latham v. Tombs, 32 Tex. Civ. App. 270, 73 S. W. 1060; 2 Greenl. Ev. (Lewis' Ed.) § 278; 13 Cyc. 301. Diligent inquiry, as held in the Gerdom Case, required the interrogation of the members of Bennett's family with whom he might have communicated; but it appears that there was a failure to produce the testimony of a sister and a brother which was accessible, and could easily have been obtained. The rule of that case also required that reasonable inquiry should have been made at the place on the Pacific Coast where Bennett was when the letter to his mother was written, and also at his last domicile or places of resort in Alaska, which might have been ascertained by inquiry. Until diligent inquiry is made, and the sources from which information is likely to be obtained have been exhausted, the presumption of death does not arise and hence there was error in overruling the demurrer to plaintiff's evidence.

The judgment will therefore be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

MINOR v. FIKE.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. July 5, 1907.

Rehearing Denied Jan. 16, 1908.)

1. COMPROMISE AND SETTLEMENT—DISCHARGE OF LIABILITY.

A compromise and settlement of a bona fide dispute, though the amount agreed to be paid may be much less than is actually due, if supported by a consideration and fairly made, bars a recovery on a claim included in the settlement.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 10, Compromise and Settlement, §§ 54-65.]

2. SAME—EVIDENCE.

In an action by the former owner of land sold by a broker for a higher price than he had reported to recover part of the excess, evidence held to support a finding that the parties had compromised and settled their dispute prior to the trial.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 10, Compromise and Settlement, § 94.]

Smith, J., dissenting.

Error from District Court, Thomas County; Charles W. Smith, Judge.

Action by P. C. Minor against J. N. Fike. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

H. J. Harwl and Garver & Larimer, for plaintiff in error. Asa M. Smith and Chas. Hayden, for defendant in error.

PER CURIAM. Action by Minor to recover from Fike part of the price of a tract of land, the sale of which had been negotiated by Fike. Minor had previously purchased the land through Fike, and before the transfer was consummated it was again sold through Fike to another. It was alleged that Fike agreed to sell it on commission; that later he reported the sale at $4,600, when in fact he had received $5,900, and therefore Minor asked for the balance, $1,300. Fike denied that he was to sell the land on commission, but claimed that it was to be a sale at a net price, satisfactory to Minor. Minor agreed to and did sell the land at $4,600, and before the transaction was closed he learned that Fike had received more than that sum for the land. In a dispute which arose between them Minor insisted that as Fike had gotten more than $4,600 for the tract he should not only forgive the commission, the compensation for selling the land, but should pay him part of the excess which had been received. After considerable bantering a compromise was made by which Fike agreed to pay and Minor to accept $30 as a final settlement of the transaction. Fike issued his check for that amount and gave it to Minor, and on the back of the check there was written a receipt or statement that the check was given as payment and settlement in full on the land transaction. Upon testimony, some of which was conflicting, the trial court found that Minor, knowing and insisting that Fike had received much more than $4,600 for the land, settled with him, and that this settlement was binding upon both parties.

Granting that there was misrepresentation as to the price received for the land when the sale was reported, it must be held under the testimony and findings of the court that there was no fraud in the compromise and settlement subsequently made. There was knowledge that Fike had received considerable more than was paid to Minor, a dispute as to what portion of the excess should be paid to Minor, and a settlement without fraud as to the amount. A compromise and settlement of a bona fide dispute, although the amount agreed to be paid may be much less than is actually due, is supported by a consideration, and if fairly made bars a recovery on the claim included in the settlement. The settlement in this case, resting as it does on sufficient testimony, makes the findings of the trial court conclusive on this review.

Judgment affirmed.

JOHNSTON, C. J., and GREENE, BURCH, MASON, PORTER, and GRAVES, JJ., concurring.

SMITH, J. (dissenting). The per curiam decision announces, in effect, that all the justices of this court are of one mind regarding the same, and that the case is so clear as to render discussion thereof unnecessary. 6 Words & Phrases, 5285, and authorities there cited. However, I feel compelled to dissent from the decision.

The uncontroverted evidence, to which there is no adverse finding, shows that the agent procured the conveyance of the land from his principal to the real purchaser through a sham purchaser, who paid no consideration therefor; that he falsely reported to his principal the amount received for the land, and concealed the true amount up to and including the time of settlement. He even demanded a commission on the false amount ($4,600) reported which negatives his claim of a contract that he was to have all he could secure in excess of $4,600. The concealment of the amount received at the time of settlement was of itself a fraud and vitiates the settlement. I have misread the law of agency, if an agent, knowing all the facts involved in a matter, and knowing his principal's ignorance thereof, can speculate upon his principal's ignorance, and upon his own dereliction of his duty to inform his principal, and thus obtain great advantage to himself through a compromise settlement. The whole effect of the evidence is that the principal did not know, but only suspected or believed that the agent had received more than $4,600 for the land, although the evidence shows that in the conversation leading up to the settlement he told the agent he knew he (the agent) had received more. The whole transaction is tainted with circumvention, misrepresentation, and concealment in a fiduciary relation in which the law imposes upon the agent the duty of reporting to his principal the full facts, the strictest integrity, and open-handed dealing.

The finding of the court that the principal settled with knowledge that his agent received considerably more than the amount reported is unsupported by any evidence that the principal knew of any specific sum received in excess of the $4,600 reported. The testimony of the agent as to the conversation between him and his principal at the time of the settlement shows of itself that they were haggling over a small difference. There is nothing in the evidence to indicate that the principal even suspected the sum was $1,300 or a sum in any way approximating thereto. Thus the agent's fraud procured the settlement, and he should not be rewarded therefor.

ROBINS MINING CO. v. MURDOCK.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. Dec. 7, 1907.
Rehearing Denied Jan. 10, 1908.)

1. APPEAL — RECORD — PRESENTATION OF GROUNDS FOR REVIEW.

Where a case has been reversed and sent back for a new trial, proceedings in the first trial are not properly made part of the record on second appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 2327-2330.]

2. ACCOUNT, ACTION ON—OPEN ACCOUNT—EVIDENCE.

Evidence, in an action on account, held to support judgment for plaintiff.

Error from District Court, Cherokee County; W. B. Glasse, Judge.

Action by J. C. Murdock against the Robins Mining Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Chesney & Sanders, W. R. Cowley, and Clay H. Alexander, for plaintiff in error. S. C. Westcott, Tracewell & Moore, H. C. Finch, and E. E. Sapp, for defendant in error.

PER CURIAM. Action on account for miners' supplies and merchandise sold. There was a trial to the court, and judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error.

A former judgment in the same case was reversed for error in admitting evidence of certain statements made by the president of the mining company. Robins v. Murdock, 69 Kan. 596, 77 Pac. 596. For some reason not apparent there has been inserted in the record the entire proceedings of the former trial. The trial judge at the settlement of the case made ordered this stricken, and lines were drawn through the pages referring to the first trial. Plaintiff in error's brief, however, contains hundreds of references to what is termed the "first record," which it is insisted is before us for examination. The cause was remanded for another trial. The second trial had nothing to do with the first, and the record of that trial has no place in these proceedings and cannot be considered. There are 22 assignments of error. Most of these are abandoned in the brief, and we are obliged to ignore others. For instance, an extended argument is made, with numerous citations of authorities, in support of a claim that it was error to overrule a demurrer to the petition, while the record itself makes no reference to any demurrer having been filed or passed on. Again, it is argued that the court committed error in overruling the demurrer to plaintiff's evidence. As there was no demurrer to the evidence filed or presented, this is easily disposed of.

It is argued at great length in the brief that the trial court refused to follow the law of the case as declared in the former opinion in this court. There is no ground for this contention. The only rule of law announced in the former opinion which controls this case is that certain admissions by the president of the mining company not being shown to have been made by him while engaged in the business of the corporation were not admissible as evidence to bind the corporation. Upon the second trial no such testimony was offered.

The principal, and indeed the only, contention deserving consideration, is the claim that the judgment is not supported by the evidence. The petition contained several causes of action. Some of these were on account for supplies sold direct to the Robins Mining Company. The others were for supplies sold to Robins & Co. The latter, it seems, was a partnership, which for several months conducted mining operations on the mining property under a lease. A transfer of all the rights under the lease and of all the property was made to plaintiff in error. The transfer was in writing, and for the nominal consideration of $100. At the same time the partnership bank account amounting to $153 was transferred to the new company, and the latter continued the operation of the mine without any apparent change of ownership. Supplies were ordered and furnished in the same way as before the transfer, and cash payments on account were made from time to time by the new company. In several instances the new company paid on account more than the purchases it had made amounted to. The company also assumed other indebtedness of the partners due to the bank. These and other circumstances in evidence were, in our opinion, sufficient to support the judgment.

Judgment affirmed.

Ex parte GRAYE.

(Supreme Court of Montana. Dec. 28, 1907.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW — APPEAL—RECORDS—MATTER TO BE SHOWN.

A transcript of the docket of a justice of the peace on a summary prosecution properly forms part of the record on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 14, Criminal Law, § 579.]

2. SAME—TRANSFER OF CAUSE—DEFECTS—OBJECTIONS—WAIVER.

Where, after a change of venue in a criminal prosecution from a police court to a justice of the peace, defendant appears and expressly waives all informalities and irregularities and submits without objection to trial before the justice, he cannot thereafter object that the justice of the peace had no jurisdiction because of irregularities in the transfer, if the justice has jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the offense.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 14, Criminal Law, § 216.]

3. SAME—APPEAL—JURISDICTION.

Under Pen. Code, § 2717, providing that appeals from justices of the peace must be tried anew in the district court, the district court does not sit as a court of review, but must try the case de novo, and where the action was properly instituted in the first place, it is immaterial that the justice of the peace lost jurisdiction by conducting the trial in part on a holiday, or by not pronouncing judgment within the time allowed by statute, unless objection was made at the trial.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 14, Criminal Law, §§ 571, 584.]

Application by L. Vernon Graye for writ of habeas corpus. Writ denied.

C. A. Spaulding and E. A. Carleton, for petitioner. Albert J. Galen, Atty. Gen., and E. M. Hall, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

BRANTLY, C. J. Habeas corpus. The petition filed herein alleges, substantially, that on May 10, 1907, the complainant was by complaint under oath, filed in the police court of the city of Helena, charged with a violation of section 457, of the Penal Code; that, having been brought before the police judge under arrest and duly arraigned, he entered his plea of not guilty, and was admitted to bail; that the cause was not set down for trial, but that on May 20th the court, of its own motion and without any showing by affidavit or otherwise, transferred it to the court of S. W. Langhorne, a justice of the peace of Helena township, and forthwith transmitted the original papers in the cause to said justice; that the justice thereupon entered the cause upon his docket and fixed May 29th, at 2 o'clock p. m., as the date of trial; that on the date fixed the trial was begun, but, not being concluded, was adjourned to May 30th, at 10 o'clock a. m., the same being a legal holiday; that the hearing of the evidence was concluded on that day, and the cause taken under advisement until June 1st, at 10 a. m.; that on the latter date the justice rendered his decision finding the defendant guilty and appointing June 3d, at 10 o'clock a. m., as the time for pronoun-cing judgment; that at the appointed hour the complainant appeared and was sentenced to pay a fine of $100, and was committed to the county jail until the same should be satisfied; that judgment was thereupon entered by the justice upon his docket; that an appeal was on the same day taken to the district court; and that thereafter, on November 26, 1907, the complainant was by a jury again found guilty, and by the judgment of the court sentenced to a term of four months in the county jail, where he is now detained. It is alleged that this detention is illegal for the following reasons: (1) That the police judge had no power upon his own motion to transfer the cause to the justice's court, and for this reason the justice was without jurisdiction to try it; (2) that, if the justice did have jurisdiction to try it, he lost jurisdiction during the course of the trial by proceeding with it on May 30th, a legal holiday, and by not entering judgment at the close of the trial; and (3) that by reason of the lack of jurisdiction by the justice's court the district court had no power to try the cause and impose sentence. Upon the filing of the petition this court issued the writ to the sheriff, and also a writ of certiorari to the clerk of the district court, requiring him to certify up a copy of the docket of the justice who tried the cause. Upon the production of the prisoner the Attorney General interposed a motion to quash the writ, contending that, since upon the face of the proceedings it appeared that the justice had jurisdiction of the offense, and the complainant voluntarily submitted to a trial, thereafter taking an appeal to the district court, he could not question the jurisdiction of the latter to try the cause and enter judgment. Upon the questions thus raised the cause was submitted for decision.

1. It is conceded by counsel for complainant and the Attorney General that a police judge is authorized by statute to grant a change of the place of trial in a criminal cause, upon a motion supported by a proper showing, either of bias or prejudice of such judge, or prejudice in the citizens of the township, by reason of which in either case the defendant cannot have a fair and impartial trial. Pen. Code, § 2685. We are inclined to the opinion that the concession is properly made, though the question does not arise here, for the reason that the jurisdiction of police judges extends to all misdemeanors enumerated in the statute defining the jurisdiction of these officers (Pol. Code, § 4911, amended by Sess. Laws 1903, p. 27, c. 16), including the offense defined in section 457, supra, and is concurrent with that of justices of the peace. The statute (Pen. Code, § 2682) requires the justice or police judge to enter upon his docket all proceedings in the cause, and, upon a change of the place of trial, to transmit with the files a certified copy of his minutes. For some unexplained reason the police judge failed to observe this requirement. There is no provision in the Penal Code indicating what record shall be transmitted to the district court when an appeal is taken. But we must presume that the original files, together with a copy of the docket minutes, constitute the record. This is the requirement in civil cases, the trial being de novo upon the papers filed in the justice's court, unless the court for good cause permit others to be filed. Code Civ. Proc. § 1761. Since in criminal cases the trial is also de novo (Pen. Code, § 2717), in the absence of specific provision on the subject, we must conclude that the same method of procedure must be followed in criminal cases. At any rate, in the absence of specific provision on the subject, this course would seem most appropriate, and it would seem to be necessary, for the reason that the plea is oral, and an appeal may be taken by oral notice at the time of the rendition of the verdict or judgment. Pen. Code, § 2713. A copy of the docket is necessary to show the nature of the plea that a judgment has been entered and that the appeal has been properly taken. Furthermore, on appeal in civil cases each party has the benefit of all legal objections taken in the justice's or police court, and since no bill of exceptions is provided for, the docket furnishes the only means by which some, at least, of the objections may be made to appear. These remarks dispose of the incidental question, made by the attorney general, whether the transcript of the docket properly forms part of the record on appeal.

The absence of the copy of the docket of the police judge does not, however, affect the merits of this application. The justice's docket recites that, when the defendant, accompanied by his counsel, appeared before him on May 20th, he set the cause for trial on May 29th, "all informalities and irregularities being waived by counsel for defendant." It is not a material inquiry, therefore, whether the change of the place of trial was ordered by the police judge of his own motion, or whether it was made upon the application of the defendant. Since it is conceded that he had jurisdiction of the offense under the statute that a complaint was filed giving him jurisdiction of the particular cause, and that the defendant had been properly arrested and brought before him, he could upon proper application order a change of the place of trial. The justice had jurisdiction of the offense. The irregularity of the procedure by which the cause was brought into his court was expressly waived by the defendant. He submitted to a trial upon a complaint charging him with the particular offense. He cannot now be heard to say that the justice did not have jurisdiction of the cause or of his person. He was entitled to make his objection at the time. Having failed to do so, or, rather, having expressly waived the irregularities, the court had jurisdiction to proceed. In Woldenberg v. Haines, 35 Or. 246, 57 Pac. 627, there was an application to the justice by the defendant for a change of venue after answer. The affidavit for the change was not sufficient. The parties, however, thereafter appeared before the justice to whose court the change had been made, and stipulated for a continuance. The defendant had judgment on his counterclaim. Thereupon, upon application of the plaintiff, the judgment was annulled by the circuit court, on the ground that the justice trying the case had not jurisdiction. On appeal the Supreme Court held that the appearance of the parties and their submission of the case waived the irregularity and the jurisdiction was complete. The court said: "Justices' courts having jurisdiction of actions for the recovery of money, when the amount involved does not exceed $250 (Hill's Ann. Laws 1892, § 906), the transcript sent to the justice's court of Harney district gave it jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and the general appearance of the plaintiff, and his participation in the trial of the action, gave it jurisdiction of his person, and authorized it to hear and determine the issues." The same conclusion was reached in Magner v. Renk, 65 Wis. 364, 27 N. W. 26, wherein the affidavit for a change of venue was wholly insufficient; but after the change was directed, the parties proceeded with the trial without objection. Smith v. Judge, 46 Mich. 338, 9 N. W. 440, was a case in which the justice before whom it was brought directed a change of venue because, being ill, he was not able to proceed with the trial. The parties appeared before the justice to whose court it was transferred and proceeded with the trial without objection. On application for mandamus to set aside the proceedings had under the judgment, on the ground that it was void because the justice had no power to order the change, it was held that the parties had waived the irregularity of the transfer, and that the judgment was valid. In Moore v. Railroad Co., 51 Mo. App. 504, the court granted a change of venue over the objection of one of the parties. Nevertheless the party objecting appeared in the court to which the case was sent, and went to trial without objection. It was held that the objection to the jurisdiction, after verdict came too late. All of these cases proceeded upon the theory that, since jurisdiction of the subject-matter was conferred by law, errors and irregularities in acquiring jurisdiction of the particular case, and of the person, could be waived by the parties, and the validity of the resulting judgment could not be assailed by reason of them. With this view we agree. It in nowise conflicts with the conclusion, several times announced by this court, that jurisdiction of justices' and police courts must appear affirmatively, and is not aided by the presumption attaching to the judgments of courts of general jurisdiction. State v. Laurendeau, 21 Mont. 216, 53 Pac. 536; Duane v. Molinak, 31 Mont. 345, 78 Pac. 538; Oppenheimer v. Regan, 32 Mont. 115, 79 Pac. 695. Here jurisdiction of the offense is not controverted. That a complaint was filed as the statute requires (Pen. Code, § 2680) charging an offense is admitted. The defendant was arrested and brought before the court and entered his plea. After the cause was transferred to the justice's court and was filed there, he made no objection, but waived all previous irregularities and submitted to a trial. He must be held to be bound by this action. And it is immaterial to inquire whether the transfer was regular. There is some conflict in the decisions on this point, but with perhaps some exceptions, which it is not necessary to notice here, the better rule is that, if a court has jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action, a general appearance of the defendant to the merits, without objection, is a waiver of all personal privilege in respect of the particular court in which the action is brought. St. Louis & San Francisco R. R. Co. v. McBride, 141 U. S. 127, 11 Sup. Ct. 982, 35 L. Ed. 659. This rule applies to courts of limited, as well as to courts of general, jurisdiction. 2 Ency. Pleading & Practice, 613. The following cases, all of which are cited in Woldenberg v. Haines, supra, either directly or by analogy support this view: Insurance Co. v. Johnson, 46 Ind. 315; Christ v. Flanagan, 23 Colo. 140, 46 Pac. 683; In re Whitmore, 9 Utah, 441, 35 Pac. 524; Cherry v. Lilly, 113 N. C. 26, 18 S. E. 76; Seley v. Parker (Tex. Civ. App.) 45 S. W. 1026; Solomon v. Norton, 2 Ariz. 100, 11 Pac. 108; Yater v. State, 58 Ind. 299; Hazard v. Wason, 152 Mass. 268, 25 N. E. 465; Breathwit v. Bank, 60 Ark. 26, 28 S. W. 511. See, also, Galveston, etc., Ry. Co. v. Baumgarten, 31 Tex. Civ. App. 253, 72 S. W. 78; Railway Co. v. Ramsey, 22 Wall. (U. S.) 326, 22 L. Ed. 823.

2. The last two contentions may be met by answer to the single question, What was the effect of the appeal to the district court? The statute, as already pointed out (Pen. Code, § 2717), requires the district court upon appeal to try the cause de novo, that is, just as if the cause had originated in that court, its jurisdiction being dependent, of course, upon the jurisdiction of the justice's court of the subject-matter and of the parties. It does not sit as a court of review for the correction of errors, but to give the defendant a new trial upon the merits. While it may dismiss a cause on the ground that it has no jurisdiction of the subject-matter, just as the justice should have done, if the action was properly instituted in the first place, the appeal clothes that court with the power to proceed, no matter what irregularities may have attended the trial in the justice's court. State v. O'Brien, 35 Mont. 432, 90 Pac. 514. It is therefore immaterial whether the justice lost jurisdiction of the defendant by conducting the trial in part on a legal holiday, or by taking the cause under advisement from May 30th until June 1st, or by not observing the directions of the statute in pronouncing sentence. A party may not, under the guise of an application for a trial de novo, insist that irregularities, to which he made no objection, shall be taken note of, or that the judgment, which is abrogated by the appeal, be reversed on account of them. The case of State ex rel. Collier v. Huston, 36 Mont. —, 92 Pac. 476, recently decided, is not in point. In that case the justice took the case on trial before him under advisement for an indefinite time. It was held that this was violative of an express direction of the statute requiring him to render judgment at the close of the trial. Moreover, the cause was not removed to the district court by appeal. If such had been the case, doubtless the conclusion would have been reached that the appeal was a waiver of the irregularity, and that the district court should have proceeded with the trial on the merits. What the result would have been in this case, had an appeal not been taken, it is useless to inquire.

The motion of the Attorney General to quash the writ and dismiss the proceeding is sustained, and the complainant is remanded to the custody of the sheriff for execution of the sentence.

Dismissed.

DEMERS v. GRAHAM, Sheriff, et al.

(Supreme Court of Montana. Dec. 23, 1907.)

1. CHATTEL MORTGAGES—CONSTRUCTION—TITLE OF MORTGAGOR.

A chattel mortgage only creates a lien, and hence, under Civ. Code, § 3750, providing that a lien transfers no title, does not pass title from the mortgagor to the mortgagee.

2. SAME—ANIMALS AND INCREASE.

Civ. Code, § 3815, providing that a mortgage is a lien upon everything that would pass by a grant of the property, does not apply to the natural increase of domestic animals by procreation, and hence a chattel mortgage on cattle does not cover calves in gestation when the mortgage was executed.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 9, Chattel Mortgages, § 204.]

Appeal from District Court, Missoula County; F. C. Webster, Judge.

Action by Alexander L. Demers against Davis Graham, sheriff, and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, M. H. Prideaux appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Harry H. Parsons, for appellant. Marshall & Stiff, for respondent.

SMITH, J. The only question for determination in this case is whether a chattel mortgage of certain cows covers their calves in gestation at the time the mortgage was executed, but born prior to foreclosure; there being no reference in the mortgage to the increase of the cows. The defendant, Graham, holds in his possession, as sheriff of Missoula county, the sum of $609, the proceeds of the sale of 87 calves, sold by him under a stipulation that he should hold the proceeds until the final determination of this action. The plaintiff claims the money by virtue of the fact that he held a chattel mortgage on the mothers of the calves at the time the young were born. The appellant, Prideaux, claims to be entitled to the sum by virtue of a sale of the calves to him by Sloan, the mortgagor, after the sheriff had seized but before he sold the same under plaintiff's mortgage. Prideaux set forth in his answer the respective claims of the parties, as above recited. The district court of Missoula county sustained a general demurrer to the answer, and, in default of further pleading by Prideaux, entered a judgment in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant Graham, as sheriff, for the sum of money in dispute. From that judgment Prideaux has appealed.

The law is well settled in this state that a chattel mortgage only creates a lien and does not pass title from the mortgagor to the mortgagee. Bennett Bros. Co. v. Tam, 24 Mont. 457-467, 62 Pac. 780; Mueller v. Renkes, 31 Mont. 100, 77 Pac. 512. Such lien transfers no title. Civ. Code, § 3750. The question of the extent of the lien created, in those jurisdictions where no title passes, has been a fruitful source of litigation for many years. The immediate question that we are to decide has never been before this court, and we feel therefore that in the determination of the same we should point out what seem to us to be the principles involved, and not merely cite the precedents of the courts. The Supreme Court of California, in the case of Shoobert v. De Motta, 112 Cal. 215, 44 Pac. 487, 53 Am. St. Rep. 207, took occasion to examine and differentiate the decisions on this subject in the following language: "It has been held in some states that the lien of a mortgage of domestic animals extends to the increase of the animals during the life of the mortgage, whether the terms of the mortgage include such increase or not, and, following these decisions, such a rule is stated in text-books upon chattel mortgages. It will be found, however, upon examination of these cases, that the decisions therein are based upon the principle of the common law, which was in force in those states, that by the mortgage the mortgagee is vested with the title to the mortgaged property, and becomes the owner thereof; and that in the case of domestic animals, applying another rule of both the common and the civil law, that 'the brood belongs to the owner of the dam or mother, partus sequitur ventrem' (2 Blackstone's Commentaries, 390), he thereby becomes the owner of such increase, and, being the owner, his title in any action at law must prevail. The earliest application of this rule was in the case of a mortgage of a female slave (Hughes v. Graves, 1 Litt. 317), which was decided in Kentucky in 1822, and was afterward followed in Maryland in 1836, in the case of Evans v. Merriken, 8 Gill. & J. 39, which also involved the offspring of a female slave which had been mortgaged; and these cases are cited as the authority upon which cases involving the same question have been decided in other states, in some instances referring also to the principle upon which the rule rests, and in others merely referring to the cases as an authority (Cahoon v. Miers, 67 Md. 573, 11 Atl. 278; Gundy v. Biteler, 6 Ill. App. 510; Ellis v. Reaves, 94 Tenn. 210, 28 S. W. 1089). The rule has also been stated in many other cases in which the question was neither involved nor decided (Kellogg v. Love-ly, 46 Mich. 131, 8 N. W. 690, 41 Am. Rep. 151; McCarty v. Blevins, 5 Yerg. (Tenn.) 195, 28 Am. Dec. 262; Gans v. Williams, 62 Ala. 41); and there is still another line of decisions in which it has been sought to uphold the propriety of the rule by holding that the increase which was in gestation at the execution of the mortgage was inferentially included therein as a part of the mortgaged property (Funk v. Paul, 64 Wis. 35, 24 N. W. 419, 54 Am. Rep. 576; Rogers v. Hyland, 69 Iowa, 504, 29 N. W. 429, 58 Am. Rep. 230; Edmonston v. Wilson, 49 Mo. App. 491). Another line of decisions limits this application of the rule by holding that the increase is subject to the lien of the mortgage only for so long a time as the young are in a state of nurture from the mother. Rogers v. Gage, 59 Mo. App. 107; Darling v. Wilson, 60 N. H. 59, 49 Am. Rep. 305; Forman v. Proctor, 9 B. Mon. (Ky.) 124. The want of logical sequence in this limitation has been felt by the courts, and some of them have sought to place their decision upon the fact that, while the young were following the mother, a purchaser from the mortgagor had notice by that fact that it was her offspring, and subject to the mortgage, and was thus prevented from claiming to be a purchaser in good faith. Placing the decision on this ground is, however, necessarily a repudiation of the principle upon which all the above cases rest, for, if the mortgagee is in fact the owner of the increase, the question of good faith in a purchase from the mortgagor is immaterial. Prior to 1873 the giving of a chattel mortgage in this state vested the mortgagee with the title to the property mortgaged (Heyland v. Badger, 35 Cal. 404), and, while this rule of law prevailed, the foregoing decisions would have been applicable. The Civil Code, however, went into effect at the beginning of that year, and under its provisions the mortgagor is not, by the execution of the chattel mortgage, divested of his title to the property, but still remains its owner, while the mortgagee has only a lien thereon. Civ. Code, § 2888; Bank of Ukiah v. Moore, 106 Cal. 673, 39 Pac. 1071. Consequently the foregoing decisions cannot be regarded as having authoritative force, but the rights of the parties must be determined upon the general principles controlling the relations between a mortgagor and mortgagee. In the absence of any express agreement upon the subject, the lien created by a mortgage is limited to the property which is described in the mortgage, and does not include other property of the same character which the mortgagor may have afterward acquired and placed with the mortga-

ed property. Jones on Chattel Mortgages, §§ 138, 154. If the mortgagor retains the possession of the mortgaged property, he is at liberty to deal with and use it as is its owner, and whatever income or profit may be derived from such use belongs to him, and not to the mortgagee. See Simpson v. Ferguson, 112 Cal. 180, 40 Pac. 104, 44 Pac. 484, 35 Am. St. Rep. 201. If, in the case of sheep, the use to which he puts the ewes is for breeding lambs, there can be no sufficient reason given why the lambs that are dropped by the ewes should belong to the mortgagee, any more than the wool which is sheared from their backs. We are aware that the Supreme Court of Texas, in First Nat. Bank v. Western Mortgage, etc., Co., 86 Tex. 636, 26 S. W. 488, held that, although by the laws of that state the mortgagor of personal property remains the owner thereof after the execution of the mortgage, the foregoing decisions control the right of the mortgagee to the increase of domestic animals; but the opinion in which the decision is given merely states the proposition without presenting any reasoning in its support, and does not meet with our approval. We are not called upon to determine in the present case whether, if the lambs in question had been in gestation at the date of the mortgage, they would have been included as a part of the property mortgaged, but we hold that, inasmuch as they were begotten upon the ewes after the mortgage was executed, the mortgagee has no lien upon them, or right to their possession." This case was supplemented by the later case of First Nat. Bank v. Erreca, 116 Cal. 81, 47 Pac. 926, 58 Am. St. Rep. 133, wherein the facts relative to the time at which the offspring were begotten are like those in the case at bar. In that case the court said: "The present case presents a question which was not involved or decided in that case, i. e., whether the lien of the mortgage includes lambs in gestation at its date, but upon the principles of that case it must be held that they are not so included. As the lien of the mortgage extends only to the property described therein, and as the mortgagor remains the owner of the property mortgaged, he has an unrestricted right to sell or dispose of its fruit or increase. His right to dispose of lambs in gestation or wool upon the backs of the sheep at the date of the mortgage is the same as would be his right to dispose of oranges which were on the trees, or wheat which was in the ground or standing in the field when a mortgage of the land was made." We think these cases correctly state the rule of law, and we adopt the conclusions reached together with the reasons assigned therefor.

Section 3893 of the Civil Code reads as follows: "The increase of property pledged is pledged with the property." Counsel for appellant contends that this legislative language ought to be interpreted as showing an intention to lay down a different rule as to pledges, from that pertaining to chattel mortgages.

We are inclined to think there is merit in the suggestion.

On the part of the respondent our attention has been directed to section 3815 of the Civil Code, reading as follows: "A mortgage is a lien upon everything that would pass by a grant of the property." It is contended that the foregoing language, applied to this case, means that the lien of the mortgage attached to the calves in question. This section is found in the Code under the following article heading: "Mortgages in General." It applies, therefore, to both real estate and chattel mortgages. There is this analogy between real estate and chattel mortgages, that both are simply liens. Hull v. Diehl, 21 Mont. 71, 52 Pac. 782. A mortgage does not entitle the mortgagee to the possession of the property, unless authorized by the express terms of the mortgage. Civ. Code, § 3816. While in possession of mortgaged real property the mortgagor may collect and appropriate to his own use the rents and profits thereof. 20 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law (2d Ed.) p. 979, and cases cited. Growing crops may be the subject of chattel mortgage, even though the owner of the same also owns the land upon which they are growing. And this rule prevails even in those jurisdictions where growing crops are part of the realty. 8 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law (2d Ed.) 311; Civ. Code, § 3876. Now it will not be contended that a grant of the land would not pass title to a growing crop. So, too, the sale of a cow would undoubtedly carry with it her unborn calf; but we cannot assent to the conclusion that because thereof, a chattel mortgage describing the cow only would also create a lien upon her offspring.

The statute referred to by the learned counsel is comprehensive, and the construction to be placed upon it should be reached only after full consideration in any particular case in which it may be invoked. We do not think it wise or necessary in this case to construe it further than to hold that it does not apply to the natural increase of domestic animals by procreation. We think, if the Legislature had intended that the lien of a chattel mortgage describing particular animals should attach to their young thereafter to be born, it would have said so plainly, as it did in the case of a pledge. In the absence of such a declaration it seems reasonable to hold that because the mortgage is simply a lien passing no title the mortgagor in possession has the right to deal with the property as his own, and in the case of domestic animals may dispose of the young not mentioned in the mortgage as he sees fit. This construction leaves to the mortgagee the security described in the mortgage, and does away with the confusion that experience has taught invariably follows the adoption of any other rule. If, in cases like this, it be intended to include the offspring, the mortgage should so state.

The judgment of the district court of Missoula county is reversed, and the cause is remanded, with instructions to vacate the order sustaining the demurrer to the appellant's answer, and to enter an order overruling the same.

In an action against a carrier for injuries in a collision between a water car and a passenger coach, evidence held to show a defective brake chain on the water car.

2. EVIDENCE—WEIGHT AND SUFFICIENCY—INFERENCES FROM EVIDENCE.

It is not essential, before a fact is made evident, that its existence be established by positive and conclusive evidence, especially when it pertains only to the identity of a thing.

3. CARRIERS—CARRIAGE OF PASSENGERS—ACTIONS FOR INJURIES—PRESUMPTION AND BURDEN OF PROOF.

Where the engine and water car were uncoupled from defendant's train, and a flying switch made with the water car, which became uncontrollable because of the breaking of a brake chain, and the car on that account collided with a passenger coach, causing plaintiff's injuries, the fact that the chain broke was sufficient evidence of its defective or unsuitable character to make a prima facie case against, and cast the burden of explanation on, defendant.

4. SAME—QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

In an action against a carrier for personal injuries sustained in a collision between a water car and a passenger coach while a switch was being made, evidence examined, and held sufficient to take the case to the jury as to the negligence of defendant's servants in the handling and management of the cars.

5. SAME—PRESUMPTION AND BURDEN OF PROOF.

Where the engine and water car were uncoupled from defendant's train, and a flying switch made with the water car, which became uncontrollable because of the breaking of the brake chain, and the car on that account collided with a passenger coach, causing plaintiff's injuries, there arose, in conformity with the maxim "res ipsa loquitur," a prima facie presumption that the accident was due to the negligence of defendant or its servants.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 9, Carriers, § 1283.]

6. SAME.

In an action against a carrier for personal injuries, where it is shown that the injuries were sustained under circumstances where the maxim "res ipsa loquitur" applies, plaintiff is not required in the first instance to prove any particular defect by evidence other than that establishing the prima facie presumption, even though the facts with respect to some defect are unnecessarily alleged with particularity in the complaint.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 9, Carriers, §§ 1282-1284.]

7. TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—KNOWLEDGE OF JURORS.

In an instruction to the jury that it is their duty to pass upon the merits of the case, according to the evidence given in open court, and exclude from their minds any special knowledge that any of them may have concerning the matter, "except such matters as are of common knowledge," the use of the words "except such matters as are of common knowledge," is not objectionable.

Appeal from District Court, Fifth District; Joshua Greenwood, Judge.

Action by Joseph H. Dearden against the San Pedro, Los Angeles & Salt Lake Railroad Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. W. N. Whitecotton and Pennel Cherring-ton, for appellant. W. F. Knox and Powers & Marioneaux, for respondent.

STRAUP, J. This action was brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff while a passenger on the defendant's train. Plaintiff had judgment, from which the defendant appeals.

That the plaintiff was a passenger and that his injury, if any, was received while he was being transported by the defendant, are not controverted. The train ran from Milford to Newhouse, this state. It consisted of an engine, a combination baggage and passenger coach, a box car, a flat car loaded with lumber, and a water car, or water tank. It stopped at a place called the "Old Hickory Switch," where the engine and the water car were uncoupled from the train, and a flying switch made with the latter car. In so doing, the brake chain of that car broke as the brakeman was winding the brake with a stick. The car got beyond his control and collided with the passenger coach on which the plaintiff and other passengers were with such force as to break the king bolt, to slide the water tank containing 7,000 gallons of water weighing about 56,000 pounds, and to push back the lumber on the flat car. When the chain broke, the brakeman called out "No brake," and jumped from the car. Some one called to the passengers to "get out of the car." As the passengers arose to leave, the conductor, who also was on the passenger coach, told them to be seated. Fearing the passengers in their attempt to get off the car might be thrown under it, the conductor closed the car door to prevent their leaving, and then jumped from the car. When the collision occurred, the passengers were all thrown to the floor or against the seats of the car. These facts do not seem to be in dispute.

The plaintiff in his main case also introduced evidence in support of allegations in the complaint that the water car was equipped with a defective and unsuitable brake chain. He and another witness, a Mr. Powell, who also was a passenger, testified that after the train was made up at Milford, and while it was standing near the platform of the depot, they examined the brake chain of the water car and found it spliced with baling wire, badly worn. About 10 minutes after the examination was made the train was moved to one end of the yard. It remained there while the witnesses and others, including the engineer of the train, went to dinner. In about one-half hour after the examination the train departed. These witnesses testified that after they examined the brake chain, no switching was done to their knowledge; that they did not see the water car taken out of the train; that to their best knowledge the water car which was examined by them was in the train when it left Milford, and was the same water car with which the flying switch was made, and which collided with the passenger coach; that when the train reached "Old Hickory" the cars in the train were in the same position as they were when the examination was made at Milford; that the brake chain examined by them was at the end and center of the car. Another witness testified for the plaintiff that the brake chain on the water car which collided with the passenger coach was at the end and center and not on the side of the car. That the water car with which the flying switch was made was taken out of the train which left Milford on that trip, and that the chain broke as the brake was being applied by the brakeman, there is no conflict in the evidence. The plaintiff and the witness Powell were asked if they would swear positively that the car which they examined at Milford was in the train when it departed, and whether it was the same car which collided with the passenger coach. One of them answered: "I think it was. I think it was the same car all right. Well, I am almost positive it was." He was asked: "Will you swear that this was the same car? A. Yes; I think I could. Q. You think you could, but do you? A. I think that it is. I think it is the same car that I saw at Milford. Q. That is as far as you will go? A. Yes, sir; to the best of my judgment. Q. What makes you think so? A. Why, it looked just like it." The other witness testified that to his best judgment the water car which he examined at Milford was in the train when it left Milford and was the same water car that collided with the passenger coach. He further testified: "I don't know that that car went in our train to Frisco that day. I wouldn't swear that it did." He also testified that if the car which collided with the passenger coach had the brake and brake chain on the side, it was not the same car as was examined by him at Milford.

The first assignment of error is based upon the ruling of the court denying the defendant's motion for nonsuit. It is urged that the motion should have been granted for the reason that plaintiff's case was predicated alone upon allegations of negligence relating to a defective and unsuitable brake chain on the water car; that because the plaintiff alleged the facts of such negligence with great particularity, before he was entitled to recover he was required to prove such defect, and the defendant's negligence with respect to it, substantially as alleged, unaided by and independent of any presumption of negligence arising from the circumstances of the breaking of the chain and of the collision; that the plaintiff failed in his proof, in that the evidence is insufficient to show that the water car concerning which the plaintiff and his witness testified as having had a defective brake chain was in the train when it left Milford, and was the same car as collided with the passenger coach. Before it can be said that the ruling of the court was erroneous the appellant must necessarily maintain the affirmative of all these propositions. We think it has failed, not only as to one, but as to all of them. The complaint consists of nine paragraphs, and covers nearly nine pages of the printed record. It is not necessary here to set it forth at length. It charges negligence with respect to the defective brake chain with great particularity, and specifically points out the character of the defect. It also charges negligence with respect to the making of a flying switch under detailed circumstances. It also charges negligence in the management and handling of the cars by the defendant's servants, and in their permitting one to collide with the other. The complaint is not open to the construction contended for by appellant, that the allegations of negligence are confined alone to a defective and unsuitable brake chain.

We think the contention made that the evidence is insufficient to prove a defective brake chain on the water car is likewise untenable. The only claim made in this regard is that because the witnesses would not swear positively that the car on which they saw the defective brake chain was the same car taken out of the train at "Old Hickory," and which collided with the passenger coach, the proof was insufficient to show that it was the same car. The testimony of the witnesses on this point has already been referred to. We think it quite sufficient to justify a finding that it was the same car. Of course it was not impossible, after these witnesses examined the water car in the train at Milford, and before the train departed, that the defendant, unknown to them, might have switched that water car out of the train and put another water car in its place. That such was done is not probable, under the circumstances. No witness testified to such fact, nor is there anything in the evidence from which the inference could be drawn that such was done. Because of its better knowledge, the proof of such fact would naturally be expected to come from the defendant rather than from the plaintiff, especially since it involved the proving of an affirmative by the defendant and a negative by the plaintiff. However, it is not essential, before a fact is made evident, that its existence be established by positive or conclusive evidence, especially when it pertains, as here, only to the identity of a thing. If such were the case, the rule of evidence permitting the drawing of inferences and the deducing of facts from other facts is rendered useless. The fact that the chain broke, under all the circumstances of the case, was sufficient evidence of its defective or unsuitable character to make a prima facie case, and to cast the burden of explanation on the defendant. Though it were conceded that the plaintiff failed to prove the defective brake chain as alleged, he still was entitled to go to the jury upon the alleged acts of negligence with respect to the carelessness of the defendant's servants in the handling and the management of the cars. The evidence in support of these allegations was sufficient to send the case to the jury. The appellant does not claim, nor could the claim be successfully made, that if a plaintiff alleged several independent and separate acts of negligence, any one of which, if proved, was sufficient to entitle him to recover, his right of recovery would be defeated if he only proved one and not all the alleged acts. Eliminating the allegations in the complaint with respect to the defective brake chain, and all the testimony of the witnesses relating to the chain being spliced with worn wire, the complaint is still left good, and the evidence sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to recover.

Aside from these considerations, the motion for nonsuit was properly overruled, because of the presumption of negligence arising in conformity with the maxim "res ipsa loquitur." That the plaintiff was injured by reason of the breaking of the chain and of the collision of cars operated and managed by the servants of the defendant while he was being transported as a passenger was amply shown by the testimony. From the facts and circumstances which the plaintiff showed in this regard a prima facie presumption arose that the accident was due to the negligence of the defendant or its servants. 3 Hutchinson on Carriers (3d Ed.) §§ 1413, 1414; Moore on Carriers, p. 769; 3 Thompson, Com. on Law of Negligence, § 2754. Had the plaintiff averred the relation of passenger and carrier, negligence in general terms arising from the breaking of the chain, and the collision of cars on which the plaintiff was being transported and which were operated and managed by the defendant's servants, and a resulting injury, counsel for appellant concede that the evidence, in conformity with the maxim, was sufficient to let the case to the jury. But it is urged that, since the plaintiff made specific allegations of negligence with respect to a particular defective and unsuitable brake and brake chain, he was required to prove such facts specifically as alleged by some direct evidence, independent of, and in addition to, any presumption arising from the application of the maxim. That is to say, while the presumption arising from the maxim showed negligence of some kind on the part of the defendant, it did not sufficiently show the particular negligence alleged with respect to the defective brake chain; and since the plaintiff by his specific allegations confined his actionable negligence to a particular thing or defect, his right of recovery must be limited to the negligence concerning such thing or defect. Such claim is necessarily based upon the assumption (1) that the complaint contained no allegations of negligence, except such as related to the defective brake chain; (2) that the evidence is insufficient to show such a defect; and (3) that in a case, such as this, where the plaintiff is not required to allege nor prove in the first instance a particular defect, or any specific act or acts of negligence, he is required to make such proof, if a particular defect or a specific act is alleged, independent of, and unaided by, any presumption of negligence arising from the circumstances, when such presumption points not alone to the particular thing or things alleged, but as well to other acts of negligence on the part of the defendant not alleged.

We have already held against the appellant on the first and second propositions assumed by it. We are also of the opinion that its contention cannot prevail as to the third. When it is shown that a person has sustained an injury under circumstances where the maxim referred to applies, he is not required in the first instance to prove any particular defect by evidence other than by the prima facie presumption, although the facts with respect to some defect are unnecessarily alleged with particularity in the complaint. All that the plaintiff here was required to aver and prove to entitle him to recover was the relation of passenger and carrier, that the accident through which he received his injuries was connected with the means or instrumentality used by the defendant in the transportation, and an injury resulting therefrom. When such facts were shown, a prima facie presumption arose that the accident was occasioned by the defendant's negligence, and the burden was cast on it to show that it was not at fault and that the accident was not caused by its negligence. Because the plaintiff alleged and attempted to prove more than he was required to do did not displace the presumption of negligence as an element in his case nor change the rule of evidence with respect to the burden of proof. Had the plaintiff averred his freedom from contributory negligence when, as is the rule in this jurisdiction, such averment is not essential, the burden of proving such fact being upon the defendant, it might almost as well be said he was required to prove it before he was entitled to recover. The essential and ultimate fact alleged in the complaint and in dispute was the negligence of the defendant in causing the collision. A prima facie case of such negligence was proven by the showing of the circumstances of the collision heretofore referred to. That the plaintiff averred and undertook to show a defective brake chain as evidence of negligence causing the collision, did not waive nor affect the presumption of negligence arising from the circumstances, which was in itself sufficient to show such negligence. A relevant fact may frequently be proved in several different ways. The circumstances from which the presumption referred to arose were evidence for plaintiff of the fact of the defendant's negligence causing the collision. The evidence of a defective brake chain which the plaintiff produced was also some proof of such negligence, and was in aid of and not adverse to the presumption. And though he had failed in such proof, the presumption of negligence which had been shown to exist independent thereof was in no wise displaced nor weakened. We are of the opinion that no error was committed in overruling the motion for nonsuit. Other assignments of error are made, based upon the charge of the court and its refusal to charge as requested by the defendant. They present the same questions which we have already considered.

Complaint is also made of the following charge: "In deciding this case I charge you are the sole and exclusive judges of the facts. You should look only to the evidence introduced and allowed to remain as evidence in the trial. You should not allow outside matters of any kind to influence your minds. It is your duty to pass upon the merits of this case according to the evidence given in open court, and exclude from your minds any special knowledge that any of you may have concerning this matter, except such matters as are of common knowledge. You should take into consideration the whole of the evidence relating to the case and all the facts and circumstances proved at the trial." Exception is taken to the language "except such matters as are of common knowledge." This instruction did no more than to tell the jury that they had a right to avail themselves of such general knowledge as all men possess, but not to resort to any special knowledge possessed by them. No error was committed in giving the charge. Sanford v. Gates, 38 Kan. 405, 16 Pac. 807; Craver v. Hornburg, 26 Kan. 94.

We think the judgment of the court below should be affirmed. It is so ordered. Costs to respondent.

MCCARTY, C. J., and FRICK, J., concur.

(33 Utah, 156)

GESAS v. OREGON SHORT LINE R. CO.
(Supreme Court of Utah. Dec. 21, 1907.)

1. TRIAL — NONSUIT — MOTION — SPECIFICATION OF GROUNDS.

A motion for nonsuit must specify wherein it is claimed the proof is deficient, so that plaintiff may supply it, if he is able to do so.*

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 46, Trial, § 371.]

Frank v. Bullion Beck, etc.*, Min. Co., 19 Utah, 35, 56 Pac. 419; Skeen v. O. S. L. Rd. Co., 22 Utah, 413, 62 Pac. 1020.

2. SAME.

Where, on motion for nonsuit, plaintiff offered to supply proof as to the points wherein it was claimed to be deficient, and such offer would have occasioned no unreasonable delay in, or interference with, the trial, he ought to have been permitted to do so, since, if not afforded such opportunity, the rule requiring specification of particulars on which the motion of nonsuit is based is in part rendered useless.

3. WITNESSES — COMPETENCY — MEANS OF KNOWLEDGE.

That offered witnesses, in an action for injury sustained in attempting to pass between cars obstructing a crossing, were boys 9 and 12 years old, who had been standing between trains and were climbing over the cars, did not authorize the court to conclusively assume that they had no such means or opportunity as to have heard the bell had it rung, or that there was such a want of attention on their part as to prevent their hearing it had it rung.†

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 50, Witnesses, §§ 80-85, 97, 98.]

4. TRIAL—NONSUIT.

Where plaintiff's offer on a motion for nonsuit was not that offered witnesses would merely testify that they did not hear the bell, but that the bell did not ring, and the whistle did not blow, the court ought either to have assumed the fact in evidence as offered, or to have given plaintiff an opportunity to so prove it, and not merely have assumed the fact in evidence that witnesses did not hear the bell.

5. RAILROADS — OPERATION — DUTY TO USE CARE.

The duty of a railroad company to use reasonable care in the operation of trains is not confined alone to crossings, but applies to all cases where the failure to exercise it may result in injury to others.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 41, Railroads, §§ 711, 981-987.]

6. SAME—INJURIES TO PERSONS ON TRACK—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Evidence, in an action for injury sustained in attempting to pass between cars obstructing a crossing, held to warrant a finding that the trainmen in the exercise of ordinary care ought to have anticipated that persons might be in the act of crossing, or be on or between or about the cars, and that not to give warning before moving the train would result in injury.

7. SAME.

Where trainmen in charge of a train obstructing a crossing, in the exercise of ordinary care, ought to have anticipated that persons might be in the act of crossing, or be on or between or about the cars, and that not to give warning before moving the train would result in injury, it was their duty to give such warning and failure to do so was negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 41, Railroads, §§ 964-967.]

8. SAME.

Where railroad crossings had been obstructed for an hour or more, and many persons had passed between or over the cars to the trainmen's knowledge, negligence in moving the train without warning did not depend on notice to the trainmen that the particular person injured was between or on the cars or that his position was one of peril when the train was moved.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 41, Railroads, §§ 964-967.]

9. SAME—TRESPASSER.

One who had remained at a railroad crossing obstructed by a train about half an hour, and then climbed on the cars for the purpose of crossing, was not a trespasser, to whom the railroad company owed no duty until it discovered his danger.

10. SAME—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

In an action for injury sustained in attempting to pass between cars obstructing a crossing, the railroad company's negligence held for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 41, Railroads, § 1154.]

11. NEGLIGENCE—DEGREE OF CARE REQUIRED—CHILDREN.

The degree of care required of a child must be graduated to its age, capacity, and experience, and measured by what might ordinarily be expected from a child of like age, capacity, and experience under similar circumstances.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 37, Negligence, §§ 121–129.]

12. RAILROADS—INJURIES TO PERSONS ON TRACK—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Whether a child 8 years old was guilty of contributory negligence in attempting to cross between cars obstructing a railroad crossing, held for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 41, Railroads, § 1167.]

Appeal from District Court, Third District; M. L. Ritchie, Judge.

Action by Jesse Gesas, by his guardian ad litem, Morris Levy, against the Oregon Short Line Railroad Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded for a new trial.

Powers & Marloneaux, for appellant. P. L. Williams, Geo. H. Smith, and J. G. Willis, for respondent.

STRAUP, J. This was an action brought by plaintiff to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by the negligence of the defendant. The accident occurred at Blackfoot, in the state of Idaho. The plaintiff, at the time of the accident, was 8 years of age. It was alleged in the complaint that the defendant obstructed certain street crossings in Blackfoot for 30 minutes by suffering and permitting a train of freight cars to stand upon the street; that the plaintiff and other children desired to pass over one of the crossings thus obstructed; before doing so the plaintiff inquired of the brakeman in charge of the train how long it would stand before the cars would be moved; that the brakeman told him that the cars would not be moved for half an hour; that while the plaintiff, relying upon what the brakeman told him, was attempting to pass between two cars, the servants of the defendant in charge of the train, and with knowledge of the plaintiff's presence, negligently, and without warning, moved the cars, by reason of which the plaintiff was injured. The answer was a general denial and a plea of contributory negligence. At the conclusion of plaintiff's case the defendant's motion for nonsuit was granted, from which judgment of nonsuit the plaintiff has prosecuted this appeal.

The evidence shows that the railroad tracks run north and south through the town of Blackfoot dividing the business district on the one side and the residence district on the other. Three crossings were blocked by two freight trains, one called the "Mackey" and the other the "St. Anthony" train, for some thing over an hour. Plaintiff's father testified: "I went to dinner about 12 o'clock. I went over first to Ellis street, crossing where I usually cross to my home, and I stood there for quite a while. I went to the third crossing in order to get over there. I had to walk across by the tank. It was pretty near a quarter to 1 o'clock before I got to dinner. It took me three-quarters of an hour to get across. The train held those crossings for three-quarters of an hour. The only means of crossing the tracks there on these three crossings was to get over the cars. If I didn't go over the cars, I would have had to walk above the water tank, three crossings and probably two blocks farther. At the crossing where the boy was hurt you couldn't cross at all, unless you went over the train or under it, and one would have to go around the train about six blocks either way if one went north or south. The last time I saw that train upon that track blocking that crossing was at 1:30 o'clock. * * * Plaintiff was 8 years old at the time of the accident. He had been going to school two years and a half." The plaintiff himself testified: "I was waiting there (at the crossing) about half an hour, and the brakeman came along and I asked him how long before the train would be going. He said it would be 30 minutes. * * * When I first saw that brakeman, I was by that first crossing towards the north, the one where I was hurt. We were right by the train when I asked the brakeman when the train would move. He was walking down by the train, and when he went past me I asked him, 'Brakey, how long before the train will be going?' and he said, '30 minutes.' Earl Rogers, Keeny Donell, Frank Dekay, and my older brother Charlie were with me. Charlie and the other boys was about two heads taller than myself. We were all there together when I spoke to the brakeman. My brother went over the top of the train. The brakeman went on up. When I asked him he said I had time if I wanted to. It was at the time my brother went over the train that the brakeman told me I had time to go if I wanted to. After the brakeman told me that I went over the couple. He said I had time. I went over what pulls the cars together so that the engine can pull them. The train gave a jerk, and I fell across the track. We saw men and other boys doing it, so we thought we could. After the brakeman said that to us I saw 10 or 15 other people doing it. I saw 10 or 11 boys and men both going over ahead of me. I was going over to get some money so I could go to the show—to get a quarter from papa so I could go to the show that day. The show was on the other side of the track. It had not started yet. The brakeman said it would be 30 minutes before the train would go, and that I would have time. I and the other boys with me had waited there half an hour before we saw the brakeman and asked him that. There was two main tracks to get across. We was waiting there for half an hour for Mackay train to get loose. I thought when it left or separated we was all through. I didn't tell the brakeman I was going to climb under the cars. We just asked him if we had time to get over there. He said: 'You have 30 minutes. I suppose you have time.' My brother climbed the side ladder and went over the top, and then I started over the couplings. My foot was caught by the wheels when I fell. I asked the brakeman because I wanted to know how long it was going to stay there before I attempted to go over. After the brakeman told me that the train wouldn't move for half an hour I didn't hear any warning, any bell ring, or any whistle blow. If I had heard a signal, the whistle, or bell, I would know what is meant. When I went to go through that train I looked to see whether an engine was attached and I didn't see any. I looked both sides to see whether an engine was attached to that train or not, and I didn't see any engine at all." Charles Gessas testified: "We had been waiting at the crossing for about half an hour. We wanted to go across there. He [the plaintiff] asked the brakeman how long before the train would move, and the brakeman said 30 minutes. My brother [the plaintiff] crawled over the couple. The couple gave a jerk and threw him down and cut his foot off. I crossed over the cars before he was run over. I never crossed between the couple. I did not attempt to cross over that car before the brakeman told my brother that. Other persons were crossing there, passing through between the train before I started to go over. There were men and children crossing. Ten or eleven crossed under the couples. Some crossed over where Jesse crossed over the bumpers. Others crossed on different cars over different couplings. We had been there about 20 or 25 minutes when the brakeman came along. There were two trains standing on these tracks. He was caught in the St. Anthony mixed train that was on the west track. The other train had uncoupled right there. We walked through. The engine had gone a ways. Then we got in there, and was waiting for the other one to get out, and the brakeman came walking down between them. Then we couldn't get out or in. The brakeman was between the trains when we spoke to him. The people were climbing over both of them until the one opened, and as soon as the other one opened they went through until it closed up. As soon as it closed up they had to go over them again." Earl Rogers testified: "There was a whole lot more boys around there, but me and Charlie and them three stood together. I saw a brakeman there. Jesse asked him how long before the train would go, and he said it would be half an hour before it would move. Charlie went over the cars. Jesse tried to go through the couplings and it bumped and knocked him down. I saw the wheel pass over his leg. After the first train parted and let us through there we waited a little while close to the other train as we could get. Boys were going right through where Jesse did, and up above; also some men." A Mr. Hilliard testified that for 14 or 15 years he had been acquainted with the tracks and the depot at Blackfoot, and was familiar with the running of the trains; that when a train came in the conductor ordinarily got off the caboose when it was in motion and went to the operator, got his orders, and then proceeded to the warehouse to unload; that after the train came to a stop at Blackfoot signals were given before it was moved, and that the signals would be given either by the head brakeman, the rear brakeman, or the conductor. The foregoing is a substantial statement of the evidence, except the testimony of plaintiff relating to his knowledge of the danger, which will be referred to later.

The defendant's motion was based upon the grounds that the evidence was insufficient to show negligence on the part of the defendant, and that the evidence showed contributory negligence upon plaintiff's part. After the motion had been argued, the court, in reviewing the evidence, among other things, observed that it had not been sufficiently shown that the injury occurred on a crossing, or that the train was moved without ringing the bell or blowing the whistle, and, for these reasons, intimated that the evidence was insufficient to show negligence upon the part of the defendant, and that in such view of the case it was not necessary to pass on the question of contributory negligence. Thereupon counsel for plaintiff stated: "In view of what your honor said about the evidence being somewhat obscure as to whether this accident happened on a crossing or not—

The Court: A little later I assume that I will treat it as though it did occur on a crossing. Counsel for Plaintiff: In view of what your honor said about the testimony of the plaintiff not being plain that a bell did not ring, we would like to call the other boys to prove that it did not. The Court: I suppose they would swear they did not hear it, and the court, under those circumstances, would not submit it to a jury. That is one of the points that testimony is always in conflict. People standing around always swear they did not hear it, and railroad people swear they did. If that is all there is to it, even assuming the boys all swear they did not hear the bell ring— Counsel for Plaintiff: (Interrupting.) The Court: I do not think it is necessary to argue it any further. Counsel for Plaintiff: I do not want to argue it. I simply want to ask your honor to allow me to call Charlie Gessas and Earl Rogers to testify whether or not the bell rang or the whistle blew. And I offer to prove by Charlie Gesas and Earl Rogers that the bell did not ring and the whistle did not blow." Thereupon defendant's counsel objected on the grounds that the offer came too late, and that the testimony offered was irrelevant and immaterial, and would not change the situation. The Court: "If there were any real reason to suppose it would throw any additional light upon it, the mere fact that the application comes too late would not be refused, but the witnesses could not testify that the bell did not ring because it was manifest, standing between two trains, they could not see the bell. They might testify they did not hear it. The court will give you the benefit of that as though it were in evidence, and the application is refused." The motion for nonsuit was thereupon granted.

When the plaintiff rested his case, the only evidence that the train had moved without warning was the plaintiff's testimony that after the brakeman told him that the train would not move for half an hour, and before he attempted to go through, he did not hear the bell ring nor the whistle blow, nor anything to give warning that the train was going to start. We need not consider the question whether this evidence was sufficient to have carried the case to the jury on this point, for the court, after the attention of plaintiff's counsel was called to a want of evidence in this regard, ought to have granted plaintiff's request to supply it. It is well settled in this jurisdiction that a party making a motion for nonsuit is required to "specifically state the grounds upon which the motion is based, and thereby call the attention of the court and opposing counsel to the point on which he relies." Frank v. Bullion Beck, etc., Min. Co., 19 Utah, 35, 56 Pac. 419; Skeen v. O. S. L. R. Co., 22 Utah, 413, 62 Pac. 1020. As stated in the foregoing authorities, the purpose of requiring such specifications is to apprise the plaintiff of the particulars wherein it is claimed his proof is deficient, so that he may supply it if he is able to do so and prevent the expense and necessity of a retrial of the case. If the plaintiff is not afforded such opportunity, upon the making of an offer such as here, occasioning no unreasonable delay in, nor interfering with, the progress of the trial, the rule requiring specifications of particulars upon which the motion is based is, in part, rendered useless. The court, however, did not refuse the proffered evidence because it came too late, but on the assumption that the witnesses by whom it was offered to show the fact did not possess sufficient knowledge to testify to it, because, standing between the two trains at the time in question, they could not see the bell, and hence could only testify that they did not hear it. To such extent the court treated the proffered testimony as in evidence; but, assuming that the fact is always in conflict, and that people standing around always swear they did not hear it and railroad people swear they did, he would not, under such circumstances, submit the question to the jury. We do not think, however, the court meant to say that the offer was denied, nor that he declined to submit the question to the jury, because the fact offered to be proved was generally in conflict, nor that it would likely be denied by witnesses for the defendant, nor that one did not possess sufficient knowledge to testify concerning it unless he saw the bell, nor that the court meant just what his language fairly imports. We think all the court meant by the observations was that, in view of the surroundings of the witnesses, their situation at the time, and of their lack of attention, it was not probable that they would have heard a bell had it rung, particularly not the bell of the train in question. And the negative testimony of the witnesses that they, under the circumstances which had already been disclosed to the court, did not hear it, would not be sufficient evidence that it did not ring, especially when, as is generally the case, there is some positive testimony that the bell did ring. Undoubtedly there may be a variety of cases where the circumstances are such that the court may conclusively assume that if the bell had rung the witness would not have heard it and his testimony that he did not hear it would not be sufficient evidence to prove the fact that it did not ring. But this was not such a case. Here the means and opportunity of hearing and knowing the fact by the witnesses had been sufficiently shown, especially by the older boy who at the time of the accident had just climbed or was climbing over the top of the car. If not, the plaintiff had the right to show their means of knowledge. That they were boys, 9 and 12 years of age, who had been standing between the trains, and were climbing over the cars on their way to carry placards in the parade, did not authorize the court to conclusively assume that they had no such means or opportunity, or that there was such a want of attention on their part as to prevent their hearing the bell had it rung. The remarks of the court were more pertinent to the weight of the testimony than to its competency. Haun v. R. G. W. Ry. Co., 22 Utah, 346, 62 Pac. 903. Furthermore, the plaintiff's offer was not that the witnesses would merely testify that they did not hear the bell, but "that the bell did not ring and the whistle did not blow." The court ought either to have assumed the fact in evidence as offered, or to have given the plaintiff an opportunity to so prove it. The court did neither. We will therefore review the ruling granting the motion for nonsuit from the standpoint that the train was put in motion without warning.

It is in effect urged by the respondent that no duty of giving warning before moving the train was imposed upon it, and hence it was not negligent in failing to do so. This claim is made on the grounds that the requirement to give warnings and signals applies only to cases where the train is approaching crossings, or is being operated along or across streets of a town or city; that the duty is owing only to those who are ahead of the engine or train; and that the plaintiff was a trespasser to whom the defendant owed no duty until he was discovered in a place of danger. We think neither of the positions tenable. Because the duty to give signals at crossings and when trains are being run through towns or cities is generally imposed by statute or ordinance, it does not follow that such duty is alone confined to such cases, or that it exists merely because its performance is required by statute or ordinance. It may well exist independent of any statute or ordinance, when measured by the standard of ordinary care and prudence. The rule of law which requires railroad companies to use reasonable and ordinary care in the operation and handling of their trains and cars so as not to injure others is not confined alone to crossings. It applies to all cases where, from all the circumstances surrounding the case, care and prudence are required of them, and where the failure to exercise it may result in injury to others. Railroad companies, like natural persons, must so use their own property and privileges as not to injure the rights of others, and in running and operating their cars they must exercise care proportioned to the danger of injury to others. When in the exercise of such care ordinary caution and prudence require the giving of signals or warning, the failure to do so is negligence. In the case in hand it is made to appear: That the crossings had been blocked by the defendant for about one hour. That many persons of the town had been attracted by some kind of a show or a parade about to take place. Some of them were about the street at the crossings and near the track where the cars stood. A number of them had crossed between the cars and over them. It is but fair to presume that the train operatives well knew these things, or that they, in the exercise of ordinary care, ought to have known them. Moreover, there is evidence in the record that men and boys, in the presence of the brakeman, passed between and over the cars. It was well observed by Mr. Justice Holmes in the case of Schlemmer v. Buffalo, Rochester, etc., Ry., 205 U. S. 1, 27 Sup. Ct. 407, 51 L. Ed. 681: "Negligence consists in conduct which common experience or the special knowledge of the actor shows to be so likely to produce the result complained of, under the circumstances known to the actor, that he is held answerable for that result, although it was not certain, intended, or foreseen." Aside from the knowledge possessed by the brakeman that the plaintiff and his companions and others, were about the cars, a jury may well find from all the circumstances that the train operatives, in the exercise of ordinary care, ought to have anticipated that persons might be in the act of crossing, or be on or between or about the cars, and that not to give warning before moving the train would result in injury. In a case where the facts were quite similar to those before us, where a boy 8½ years of age "attempted to climb between the cars for the purpose of going to his home and the train started and killed him," it was said: "Whatever may be the law in other jurisdictions, it is very well settled in this state that trains cannot be operated in such places in the same manner that they may be lawfully operated in the country. Such a state of facts calls for the exercise of some additional care in the movement of trains. The care to be exercised is undoubtedly that degree of care which is reasonably adequate to meet and avoid the dangers which ought to be anticipated under the circumstances. Townley v. Railway Co., 53 Wis. 626, 11 N. W. 55; Whalen v. Railway Co., 75 Wis. 654, 44 N. W. 849; Johnson v. Transfer Co., 86 Wis. 64, 56 N. W. 161. It was clearly a question for the jury in the present case to decide whether the trainmen ought, in the exercise of due care, to have anticipated that a child might be present on the track or on the cars when the train started, and, if so, whether some greater degree of care should have been exercised in giving warning of the starting of the train, or some greater precaution taken to guard against such an accident. The train had stood in that place for nearly an hour, blocking all the communication between the two sides of the village. The proof was ample to show that grown persons and children frequently crawled under or climbed over trains at that place under like circumstances. Upon this very day the conductor of the train saw children playing between the tracks and attempting to ride on the cars of his train when it pulled in. The question whether he and his colleagues in the management of the train exercised that degree of care when the train pulled out which ought to have been exercised, in view of the dangers to be reasonably anticipated, was a question for the jury." Carmer v. Chicago, St. P., M. & O. Ry. Co., 95 Wis. 513, 70 N. W. 560. Nor did the defendant's negligence in moving the train depend upon notice to the employes that the particular person injured was between or on the cars, or that his position was one of peril when the train was moved, where the crossings had been obstructed for an hour or more and many persons had passed between or over the cars, to the knowledge of the defendant's employes. San Antonio & A. P. Ry. Co. v. Green, 49 S. W. 670, 20 Tex. Civ. App. 5. The plaintiff was not a trespasser, and therefore the contention made that no duty was owing from the defendant until he was discovered in a place of danger is not sound. The evidence tends to show that the plaintiff was rightfully upon the crossing. He was at a place where he had a right to be. His right to the use of the crossing was in most respects mutual, reciprocal, and equal with that of the defendant, except as to the right of way of passage. He had remained at the crossing about half an hour, waiting for the removal of the obstruction. His climbing upon the cars, under the circumstances, for the purpose of crossing and passing over the obstruction, did not make him a trespasser. Littlejohn v. Richmond & D. R. Co., 49 S. O. 12, 26 S. E. 967; Mayer v. O. & A. R. R. Co., 63 Ill. App. 309; Krenzer v. Pittsburgh, C., C. & St. L. Ry. Co., 151 Ind. 587, 43 N. E. 649, 68 Am. St. Rep. 252. We think the evidence sufficient on the question of the defendant's negligence to let the case to the jury.

We now come to a consideration of the question of contributory negligence. Even an adult may or may not be guilty of negligence, depending upon the circumstances of the case, in climbing over stationary cars obstructing a crossing. In some cases he may be guilty of negligence as matter of law; in others, it is a question of fact for the jury. This is well illustrated in the following cases: Corcoran v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. Ry. Co., 105 Mo. 399, 16 S. W. 411, 24 Am. St. Rep. 394; Sheridan v. B. & O. R. Co., 101 Md. 50, 60 Atl. 280. In the first case the plaintiff was held guilty of negligence as matter of law, where it appeared he attempted to climb over stationary cars without looking to see or knowing whether they were attached to an engine, or were liable to be moved at any time, although the cars were obstructing the street crossing in violation of the city ordinance. In the other case the plaintiff, on his way to dinner, in approaching the crossing, found it blocked by a long freight train. He met a brakeman of the train, who told him to jump over it, but he crawled underneath the cars and crossed in that way. On his return from dinner, going towards the factory where he was employed, he found the train still standing across the street. He met the same brakeman, who again told him to cross the train. The plaintiff hesitated to do so, when the brakeman told him he had plenty of time, and further stated: "We cannot leave here until we get a helper, and probably we will be here an hour," and said that a signal had to be given the engine ahead before starting the train. The plaintiff thereupon took hold of two cars and attempted to get upon the bumpers between them, so as to cross over the train, but just as he got his foot on the bumpers, the train started without signal or warning, and crushed his foot between the bumpers. In holding that the plaintiff was not guilty of negligence, the court said: "The appellant does not appear to have attempted to make the crossing in a negligent manner. To cross over the bumpers between two freight cars when at rest is not necessarily a dangerous operation. The peril of the situation arises from the danger of the cars starting before the crossing is completed. In the present case the appellant used reasonable care to ascertain when the train would start by making inquiry of one of the brakemen in charge of it, who informed him that it would remain for some time longer until a helping engine came, which would signal its approach by blowing a whistle. Assuming that the appellant had the implied assent of the appellee to make this crossing, we do not think it can be said as a matter of law that he was guilty of contributory negligence in attempting to make it in the manner appearing from the evidence."

The case is somewhat stronger in its facts than is the one in hand in the particulars that the plaintiff was there informed that a signal would be given before the train would be moved, and was invited by the brakeman to cross, while here the brakeman told the plaintiff he would have time to cross if he wanted to. But it must be remembered that the conduct of a boy 8 years of age is not to be judged by the standard applied to an adult. It may well be that the statement made to the boy, if it did not amount to an implied invitation to cross, nevertheless was so understood by him. Though the statement was not an invitation to cross, and though the boy was not justified in accepting it as such, nevertheless it well tended to induce or at least influence him in believing that the cars would not be moved for some time, and that the crossing could be made by him in safety, especially when considered in connection with the other circumstance that he saw others doing so with apparent ease and in safety. The degree of care required of a child must be graduated to its age, capacity, and experience, and must be measured by what might ordinarily be expected from a child of like age, capacity, and experience under similar conditions. If it acted as might reasonably be expected of such a child, it cannot be charged with contributory negligence. It, however, is urged that, notwithstanding plaintiff's age, he had sufficient capacity to know and understand the character of his act and the risks incident thereto, and for that reason his conduct was to be measured by the same standard as is applied to an adult. This is principally based upon the following testimony given by plaintiff on cross-examination: "Q. You knew when you started to cross if the train was standing there it was likely to go most any time? A. I thought— When the Mackay train left, we thought we was all through. Q. When it separated—you didn't know the other train was there until it separated? A. No; we was waiting there for half an hour. Q. You don't know how long the other train had been there, and when it came there? A. No; the Mackay train was there half an hour. Q. Of course you knew that when a train is standing on the track it is likely to move at any time. You never know when it is going to move? A. No. That is right. Q. You knew that you were taking chances when you undertook to crawl under or over the train, didn't you? A. Yes. Q. You knew— A. I didn't think nothing at the time. Q. I understand. But when you stop to think about it you knew then and do now that it was a dangerous thing to go under or over a train because you don't know when it might start? A. I didn't think of it at all when I done it. Q. If you had stopped to think you would have known it would be dangerous? A. Yes. I think it now after it is already done. Q. You knew that the couplers that were there were not made to stand on, walk across the train on, didn't you? A. I saw so many people do it. Q. But you knew that was not what it was provided for? A. I know it. I know it was provided just to pull the train along. Q. It was not for people to ride or stand on, or anything of the kind? A. No. * * * Q. And you knew if it did move and you were under it or on it somewhere it might shake you off and run over you? A. Yes; I didn't think of that at the time though. Q. You didn't stop to think, did you? A. No. Q. You thought you would get across before it would start? A. Yes, sir; the brakeman told me I would have time. Q. You knew that if it was likely to start you wouldn't have started to go through there if it was going to start? A. No, sir. Q. And you wouldn't have done that because you knew it would be dangerous? A. I know I wouldn't. Wouldn't take chances on my life like that if I knew it was going to go. Q. It was because you thought it was not going to go that made you climb through there? A. Yes. Q. If you thought it was going to go you wouldn't have risked your life, as you say, by going through there? A. This brakeman ought to give me a kick and sent me away from there, knocked me out of there. That is the way I think of it now." This testimony shows that the boy possessed some knowledge that danger was involved in an act of climbing over cars if they were set in motion. But it also shows, especially when read with his testimony on direct examination, that he, from what the brakeman told him, did not anticipate that the cars might be moved. The danger to which he was exposed arose from the starting of the train. The happening of the thing which made his undertaking dangerous was not expected by him. He thought there was no danger because he did not expect the train to move. So thinking and so believing he acted. Is he to be charged with negligence as matter of law because he did not think otherwise, and did not anticipate that the cars might be moved, notwithstanding what the brakeman told him, the length of time the cars had stood blocking the crossing, and what he saw others doing? We think not. Furthermore, the testimony does not so clearly show that he at the time fully appreciated the danger to which he was exposed, or that he had such thoughtfulness or discretion to avoid it which is possessed by an ordinarily prudent adult person as to require his conduct to be measured by such a standard. The respondent's contention in this regard is well answered by the court in the case of Thompson v. M., K. & T. Ry. Co., 93 Mo. App. 548, 67 S. W. 693, in the following language: "Suppose the fact to be conceded that the plaintiff had sufficient mental capacity to know that it was dangerous to undertake to pass between the cars of defendant's train while it was standing on its track at said station, and that notwithstanding this knowledge of the danger he attempted to pass between such cars and was thereby hurt, is that of itself sufficient to charge him with contributory negligence? A boy may have the knowledge of an adult person in respect to the danger which will attend a particular act, but at the same time he may not have the prudence, thoughtfulness, and discretion to avoid them which is possessed by the ordinarily prudent adult person, and therefore it has become a settled rule of law in this state that a child is not negligent if he exercise that degree of care which, under like circumstances, would be expected of one of his years and capacity. And whether he uses such care in any given case is a question to be left for the jury to decide. Anderson v. Railroad, 81 Mo. App. 116; Riley v. Railroad, 68 Mo. App. 652; Burger v. Railroad, 112 Mo. 249, 20 S. W. 439, 34 Am. St. Rep. 370; Anderson v. Railroad, 161 Mo. 411, 61 S. W. 874. The defendant's instructions, as have been seen, told the jury that if it found the fact to be that the plaintiff had sufficient mental capacity to know the danger attending an attempt to pass between the cars, and with this knowledge made such an attempt and was thereby injured, he was guilty of contributory negligence, without reference as to whether or not he had the prudence, thoughtfulness, and discretion to avoid it (the danger) which is possessed by an ordinarily prudent adult person."

While a child 8 years of age may, in some cases, be guilty of negligence as matter of law, the question is generally one of fact for the jury. 1 Thompson's Commentaries on the Law of Negligence, § 309; 3 Elliott on Railroads, § 1261. We are of the opinion that, under the facts and circumstances of this case, the question here was one of fact.

The judgment of the court below is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial. Costs to appellant.

MCCARTY, C. J., and FRICK, J., concur.

(11 Ariz. 270)

TERRITORY ex rel. CLARK, Atty. Gen., v. GAINES, Tax Collector.

(Supreme Court of Arizona. Jan. 18, 1908.)

1. COURTS—MANDAMUS—JURISDICTION—VENUE.

Rev. St. 1901, par. 1294, subd. 16, providing that suits against public officers must be brought in the county in which the defendant holds his office, refers to the venue of cases in the district courts only, and does not apply to a mandamus proceeding in the Supreme Court, the jurisdiction of which extends throughout the state.

2. MANDAMUS—PERSONS ENTITLED TO SUE—INTEREST.

The beneficial interest of the territory in the collection of certain taxes, to an extent in excess of one-third the total amount thereof, is sufficient to entitle the territory to maintain a proceeding by mandamus to compel the county tax collector to sue to collect the tax, within Rev. St. 1901, par. 3074, providing that a writ of mandamus shall be issued on the application of the party beneficially interested.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 33, Mandamus, § 55.]

3. STATUTES—GENERAL AND SPECIAL LAWS—TAXATION.

Laws 1903, p. 162, No. 92, providing for the collection of delinquent taxes and directing the striking of all taxes due prior to 1888 from the forfeited list, and imposing interest on delinquent taxes only after January 1, 1901, was not objectionable as a special law, as both provisions were general in character.

4. SAME.

The provision of Laws 1903, p. 162, No. 92, that if taxes covered by the provisions of the act should remain delinquent on January 1, 1904, the tax collector should enforce payment with certain penalties and costs by suit, was general, and not special in its application.

5. COURTS—DECISIONS—STARE DECISIS.

Determination of a legal question by the affirmance of a judgment by an equally divided court does not have the force of a cogent precedent.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 13, Courts, § 316.]

6. TAXATION—ACTION TO RECOVER TAXES—COMPROMISE—BOARD OF SUPERVISORS—POWERS.

Rev. St. 1901, par. 973, conferring on boards of supervisors power to direct and control the prosecution and defense of all suits to which the county is a party, and to compromise the same and to do and perform all other acts and things which may be necessary to the full discharge of the chief legislative authority of the county government, did not confer on a county's board of supervisors authority to compromise an action for the collection of taxes.

7. SAME—TERMS OF COMPROMISE.

A compromise of delinquent taxes, made subsequent to the passage of Act March 19, 1903, Laws 1903, p. 168, No. 92, amending Revenue Law, § 91 (Rev. St. 1901, par. 3922), and specifying the conditions under which a board of supervisors may compromise taxes, which compromise was not based on any of the conditions specified, was void.

8. SAME—DUTY TO SUE—DISCRETION.

Under Revenue Law, § 86 (Rev. St. 1901, par. 3917), as amended by Act March 19, 1903 (Laws 1903, p. 165, No. 92), requiring the county tax collector to sue for the collection of delinquent taxes, it is the duty of such officer to bring such suit, in the exercise of which he has no discretion.

Mandamus by the territory of Arizona, on relation of E. S. Clark, Attorney General, against J. N. Gaines, tax collector of Cochise county. Peremptory mandate granted.

E. S. Clark, Atty. Gen., for petitioner. Ben Goodrich, for respondent.

NAVE, J. This is a proceeding brought in this court by the territory of Arizona, upon the relation of the Attorney General, to compel the tax collector of Cochise county to institute a suit pursuant to Act No. 92, p. 162, of the Laws of the Twenty-Second Legislative Assembly (Laws 1903), to collect delinquent taxes from the Copper Queen Consolidated Mining Company, a corporation. The issues before us are of law; the facts appearing in the pleadings of the respective parties. The more important averments of the petition are that in 1901 the Copper Queen Consolidated Mining Company, a corporation, was the owner of certain real and personal property situated in Cochise county, whereof it made return to the tax assessor; that the property was assessed by that officer; that the board of equalization of that county, upon due notice and hearing, added to the assessed valuation thereof; that the total valuation as increased was $3,833,034.76; that the territorial board of equalization in that year fixed the rate of taxes for territorial purposes at $1.17 on each $100 valuation; that the board of supervisors of Cochise county levied for county purposes a tax of $2.03 upon each $100 valuation, whereby there became a total levy for county and territorial purposes in the sum of $3.20 on each $100 valuation in said county; that the assessment roll was made, and duplicate thereof placed in the hands of the tax collector; that the total taxes levied as aforesaid on the property of said company amounted to the sum of $122,657.09; that the said company paid to the county treasurer in partial payment thereof the sum of $23,265.76; that the remainder of said taxes became delinquent, and was and still is delinquent and unpaid, in the sum of $99,391.33; that the said delinquent taxes were placed upon the back-tax book; that by virtue of Act No. 92, p. 162, of the Laws of the Twenty-Second Legislative Assembly, it became the duty of respondent to collect said delinquent taxes by suit, which duty respondent has neglected and refused to perform, although demand has been made upon him by petitioner.

Respondent demurs that this court is without jurisdiction of this action, that the petitioner is not shown to have legal capacity to maintain this action, and that Act No. 92, supra, is invalid, wherefore petitioner has no cause of action. Upon the merits, respondent pleads that the Copper Queen Consolidated Mining Company brought suit against the county of Cochise and the tax collector thereof to restrain them from collecting or attempting to collect the taxes in question in excess of the amount tendered; that this suit was determined favorably to the company in the district court, was appealed to this court, and by it reversed and remanded for a new trial (County of Cochise v. Copper Queen Consol. Min. Co., 8 Ariz. 221, 71 Pac. 940, and Id., 8 Ariz. 459, 76 Pac. 595); that thereafter, by resolution of the board of supervisors of Cochise county adopted on June 7, 1904, said action was compromised; that under the compromise said company paid all the taxes thereby found to be justly and equitably due from it for the year 1901, and, pursuant to its stipulation in the compromise, dismissed that action on June 25, 1904.

1. Respondent contends that by virtue of subdivision 16, par. 1294, Rev. St. 1901, he must be sued in Cochise county, wherefore this court, sitting in Maricopa county, is without jurisdiction of this action. That subdivision reads as follows: "Suits against public officers must be brought in the county in which the officer holds his office." Paragraph 1294 has reference to the venue of cases in district courts only. This is disclosed, not merely by the context, but is irresistibly clear when it is observed that the provisions of that paragraph are inconsistent with the exercise of original jurisdiction by the Supreme Court in any case. In a technical sense, proceedings in this court do not have their venue in a county. Original jurisdiction is unequivocally conferred upon this court in a variety of proceedings, among them, by paragraph 8073, in proceedings in mandamus. Such jurisdiction must be exercised wherever this court may have its seat, but the geographical limits of the jurisdiction are not those of a county, but those of the territory. The demurrer as to jurisdiction is not well taken.

2. It is contended that the territory is without legal capacity to maintain this action, in that it is not beneficially interested. Paragraph 3074, Rev. St. 1901, requires that the writ of mandamus "shall be issued upon affidavit on the application of the party beneficially interested." The petitioner has a beneficial interest in the collection of the taxes in question to the extent in excess of one-third of the total amount thereof. It is true, as urged by the respondent, that the machinery of tax collection is in the hands of the county officers, and that until the taxes are collected the duty does not devolve upon any county officer to account for the territory's proportion of the taxes or to remit it. But to the extent of collecting the territorial taxes, the officers of the county are acting as agents of the territory, and not independent of, or without relation to, the territory and its corporate interest. County of Sacramento v. C. P. R. Co., 61 Cal. 257. We have no difficulty in finding that the territory is beneficially interested in this matter within the purview of the statute. State v. Gracey, 11 Nev. 223.

3. It is contended that Act No. 92, supra, is obnoxious to the Harrison act in the respect that it is a special law. This contention has been before us in some aspects and determined adversely to the contention. Wal- lapal M. & D. Co. v. Territory (Ariz.) 84 Pac. 87; Hughes v. Lazard, 5 Ariz. 4, 43 Pac. 422. It is now urged that the act makes an unlawful discrimination in that it provides for the remission of all taxes delinquent prior to the year 1888, and in that it imposes interest on delinquent taxes from January 1, 1901, only. With respect to the taxes delinquent prior to the year 1888, the effect of the provision objected to is that of a statute of limitation, applicable to all of a general class. As to the second feature of the special objection, the act prescribes the same procedure for the collection of all taxes delinquent after the year 1888, but provides for the imposition of a charge of interest on delinquent taxes computed only from the 1st day of January, 1901. This, also, is general in its application. As a final objection to the act in this respect, it is pointed out that special penalties attach to those delinquents against whom suit may be brought, it being provided that if on the 1st day of January, 1904, any of the taxes covered by the provisions of the act shall remain delinquent (the act is of date March 19, 1903), the tax collector shall proceed to enforce the payment thereof, together with certain penalties and costs, by suit. This provision is also general in its application. We cannot affirm that any of the classifications involved are unreasonable or unjust. The principles governing such an inquiry have been adequately treated in former opinions. Bennett v. Nichols (Ariz.) 80 Pac. 393; Sanford v. Tucson, 8 Ariz. 247, 71 Pac. 903; Maricopa County v. Burnett, 8 Ariz. 242, 71 Pac. 908. This act, in the features considered, is not obnoxious either to the letter or the spirit of the organic law.

4. Upon the merits, as we have shown, respondent presents as his excuse for refusing to institute suit to collect the unpaid taxes in question, and as a bar to the issuance of a writ of mandate to bring such suit, the acts of the board of supervisors and the Copper Queen Consolidated Mining Company, in compromise of a suit to restrain the collection of these taxes. The Attorney General maintains that the board of supervisors had no power to compromise the action, and contends that the matter is now to be resolved by the application of the doctrine stare decisis. He refers us to the case of Schuerman v. Territory (Ariz.) 85 P. 1134. We decided that case by divided bench without rendering an opinion, Mr. Justice Sloan not sitting. It is true that the judgment there affirmed determined, among other matters, the precise point now before us; but, the affirmation being by a divided court, it does not have the force of a cogent precedent. Etting v. U. S. Bank, 11 Wheat. (U. S.) 59, 6 L. Ed. 410. Wherefore, we will inquire into the matter involved as if it were a matter of novel impression. Respondent finds in paragraph 973, Rev. St. 1901, full authority for the board of supervisors to make the compromise in question. By a subdivision of that paragraph, there is conferred upon boards of supervisors the power "to direct and control the prosecution and defense of all suits to which the county is a party, and to compromise the same." The defendants in the suit in question were the county of Cochise and M. D. Scribner, the tax collector of that county. Under our revenue law, the board of supervisors has a supervisory function to perform in the assessment and collection of taxes, but assessment and collection do not directly devolve upon that body. Assessments are made by the county assessor, and may be raised or lowered by the county board of equalization. The county board of equalization, although its personnel is that of the board of supervisors, is a distinct tribunal, and is not the board of supervisors. Moreover, after the board of equalization has performed its duties of rectifying undervaluations or overvaluations, it has exhausted its functions. The collection of taxes then devolves upon the tax collector, over whom the board of supervisors exercises only the same control which it exercises over all other county officers. The county of Cochise, as a municipal body, was not a proper party to the suit brought by the Copper Queen Consolidated Mining Company to restrain the collection of the taxes assessed upon it by the board of equalization, and which, by virtue of that assessment, it became the duty of the tax collector to collect. It follows that the board of supervisors did not derive authority from the provisions above quoted to compromise this suit. Its authority would be more appropriately attributable to another provision of the same paragraph, conferring upon that board authority "to do and perform all other acts and things which may be necessary to the full discharge of the duties of the chief legislative authority of the county government." But our system of revenue collection is inconsistent with a theory that, under that or any other provision, a board of supervisors may raise, lower, or remit taxes. The only powers possessed by such boards are those expressly conferred by statute or necessarily implied therefrom. Santa Cruz County v. Barnes (Ariz.) 76 Pac. 621; State v. C. P. R. R. Co., 9 Nev. 70. Jurisdiction to remit or compromise taxes we should find conferred in express terms carefully conditioned; it may not be predicated upon an inference. We conclude, therefore, that the attempted compromise pleaded by respondent was void. State v. C. P. R. R. Co., 9 Nev. 79; Id., 10 Nev. 87; Sacramento Co. v. C. P. R. R. Co., 61 Cal. 254. It is cogent that the Legislature, by a necessary inference from its enactment of Act No. 34, p. 56, of the Laws of 1891, has given our statutes the same construction. The parts of paragraph 973, above quoted, and the general system of the assessment and collection of taxes (except as to matters of procedure alone in the collection of delinquent taxes) have been in effect since 1887. Section 1 of Act No. 34, supra (page 56), reads as follows: "That all rebates, adjustments, settlements, or compromises heretofore made by the boards of supervisors, in the various counties, of tax values, tax assessments, or taxes, upon any property or of any suit or proceeding for the collection of any tax or taxes, be and the same are hereby ratified and confirmed, provided, however, nothing herein contained shall be construed or held to mean that the said boards of supervisors shall hereafter have any right, power or authority to rebate, adjust, settle, compromise or diminish any tax, taxes, tax values, assessments or levies, or any suit or proceeding for the collection of any tax or taxes upon any property except as a board of equalization in the manner prescribed by law." This curative act, though not re-enacted in the Revision of 1901, its purpose having been served, is an implicit recognition by the Legislature that such compromises by boards of supervisors were without authority of law.

It is fitting still further to point out that section 91 of the revenue law (Rev. St. 1901, par. 3922), as amended by Act No. 92, supra, specifies conditions under which the board of supervisors may compromise taxes. That act took effect on March 19, 1903, and therefore was in effect at the time of the attempted compromise. The compromise was not based upon any conditions upon which a compromise may be made under the authority conferred by that section. Even if the board of supervisors, by virtue of the provisions of paragraph 973, Rev. St. 1901, had possessed the power to compromise taxes, the enactment of a statute specifying the terms upon which taxes may be compromised would have the effect to restrict the authority formerly possessed by it.

Under section 86 of the revenue law (Rev. St. 1901, par. 3917), as amended by Act No. 92, it is the duty of respondent, in the exercise of which he is without discretion, to bring suit to collect the delinquent taxes in question.

The peremptory mandate will issue as prayed.

In re FRETWELL'S ESTATE. (S. F. 4,884.)
(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 26, 1907.
Rehearing Denied Jan. 23, 1908.)

1. EXECUTORS—RIGHT TO APPEAL—PARTY AGGRIEVED—CREDITOR OF ESTATE—FAMILY ALLOWANCE.

A creditor of an insolvent estate is a "party aggrieved," by an erroneous order making a family allowance to the widow, and may therefore appeal, under Code Civ. Proc. § 963, subd. 3, and section 938, providing that an appeal may be taken from such order by a party aggrieved.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 22, Executors and Administrators, § 723.]

2. SAME—RIGHT OF ADMINISTRATOR—NOTICE.

It is not material to the right of a creditor of an insolvent estate to appeal from an erroneous order granting a family allowance to the widow that the executor or administrator is also authorized to appeal by Code Civ. Proc. § 963, subd. 3, and section 938, and that such order may be made without notice.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 22, Executors and Administrators, § 723.]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Marin County; Thos. J. Lennon, Judge.

Proceeding for settlement of estate of Edwin Fretwell, deceased. From an order making a family allowance to the widow, a creditor of decedent appeals. On motion to dismiss. Denied.

John Flournoy, for appellant. Barclay Henley, Jos. K. Hawkins, and Crittenden Thornton, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is a motion to dismiss an appeal taken by a creditor of deceased from an order making a family allowance to the surviving wife.

The sole ground of the motion is that a creditor of the deceased may not maintain such an appeal. It appears from the record that appellant claimed in the court below that the estate is insolvent, and that the order making the allowance appears to have been made on that theory, for it limits the allowance to a period of 12 months, and provides that it is made without prejudice to application for a further allowance "in case hereafter said estate should turn out to be solvent." We can conceive of no ground upon which it can be held that a creditor of an insolvent estate, who must look to the general assets for the payment of his claim, is not a party aggrieved by an order of family allowance erroneously made, the necessary effect of such an order being to diminish the amount he would otherwise receive on account of his claim. The statute expressly provides that an appeal may be taken from such order (Code Civ. Proc. § 963, subd. 3), and that any party aggrieved may appeal (Code Civ. Proc. § 938). It has never been held that such a creditor may not maintain an appeal. On the other hand, this court has annulled on certiorari an order requiring an administrator to pay family allowance theretofore ordered during the pendency of an appeal taken by other claimants to the estate from the order granting the allowance. Pennie v. Superior Court, 89 Cal. 31, 26 Pac. 617. It does not assist respondent that this court has held that the executor or administrator may appeal from an order directing him to pay moneys as family allowance. Such ruling does not exclude an appeal by a creditor. While the executor or administrator may properly be held to be a party aggrieved by such an order, the creditor may also be such a party, and, as such, the statute gives him his own appeal. Nor is it material that an order for family allowance may be made without notice.

The motion to dismiss the appeal is denied.

ROSENBERG BROS. & CO. v. ROSS. (Civ. 372.)

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. Nov. 14, 1907.)

1. APPEAL—REVIEW—FINDINGS—CONCLUSIVENESS.

Where a finding of the court is not attacked on appeal for insufficiency of evidence to support it, it must be taken as true.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 3955-3969.]

2. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—WHO MAY ATTACK—TRANSFER BY HUSBAND—VALIDITY AS AGAINST CREDITORS OF WIFE.

Where a person, under a parol agreement with his wife, was the owner of and in possession of a crop raised upon her land, and sold it for a valuable consideration, the transfer was not void as against his wife's judgment creditor, of whom he was not the debtor, and did not come within Civ. Code, §§ 3440, 3442, making certain transfers presumably fraudulent.

3. HOMESTEAD—ESTABLISHMENT—WIFE'S SEPARATE PROPERTY—JOINT HOMESTEAD.

Where a wife selects a homestead from her separate property, she and her husband become vested with a joint title therein to the extent of the homestead, and upon the death of either, the homestead will vest absolutely in the survivor.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 25, Homestead, § 245.]

4. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—PERSONAL PROPERTY—DELIVERY AND CHANGE OF POSSESSION—NATURE OF PROPERTY—GROWING CROPS.

Growing crops are chattels not susceptible of manual delivery until harvested, and are not in the possession or under the control of the vendor, within the meaning of the statute requiring an immediate delivery and continued change of possession.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 24, Fraudulent Conveyances, § 459.]

5. SAME—IMMEDIATE POSSESSION—EVIDENCE.

Evidence held to show that a vendee of a growing crop took immediate possession of it as soon as it was severed from the land, as required by Civ. Code, § 8440, making certain transfers of chattels presumably fraudulent.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 24, Fraudulent Conveyances, § 885.]

6. SAME.

What constitutes an immediate delivery and an actual and continued change of possession of chattels sold must be determined upon the evidence in each particular case.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 24, Fraudulent Conveyances, § 462.]

7. SAME—SUFFICIENCY OF CONSIDERATION.

Labor and expense incurred by a husband in cultivating and caring for a joint homestead is a valuable consideration for the transfer to him of the wife's interest in a crop to be grown on the land, and hence, though the wife was insolvent, the transfer was not fraudulent and void as to her creditors.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; M. H. Hyland, Judge.

Action of claim and delivery by Rosenberg

Bros. & Co. against Frank H. Ross, Jr. Judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying defendant a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

Will M. Beggs, for appellant. Rogers, Bloomingdale & Free, for respondent.

HALL, J. This action of claim and delivery was brought to recover the possession of a lot of prunes taken by the defendant, as sheriff of Santa Clara county, under a writ of execution upon a judgment against Grace M. B. Odell. Plaintiff recovered judgment for the possession of the prunes, and this appeal is from the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial. The complaint is in the ordinary form of an action for claim and delivery, and defendant justifies under a judgment and execution against Grace M. B. Emerson, otherwise Grace M. B. Odell, and in favor of one Mrs. J. M. Sweetzer, upon which levy was made upon the property sued for on the 30th day of August, 1905, as the property of Grace M. B. Odell. The evidence shows without conflict that the prunes were the crop grown during the year 1905 upon the homestead of Grace M. B. Odell and her husband, F. E. Odell, which homestead had theretofore been duly selected by Mrs. Odell for the benefit of herself and husband from her separate property. In the month of January, 1905, F. E. Odell and his wife, Grace M. B. Odell, entered into a parol agreement, by the terms of which he agreed to do all the work and bear all of the expenses of cultivating and caring for the premises, and in return the crop was to belong to him. He lived on the premises, performed all the work, and paid all the expenses of caring for the place, and cultivating and gathering the crop. On the 29th day of July, 1905, said F. E. Odell, by an instrument in writing, sold for a valuable consideration the crop of prunes then growing on the trees to Rosenberg Bros. & Co., a copartnership, and to whose business and contracts plaintiff succeeded. The prunes were taken possession of by the defendant under the writ issued on the Sweetzer judgment against Mrs. Odell August 30, 1905, at which time they were all on the homestead premises, part being in trays, part in the field, part in bins in a barn, and part in boxes bearing the name of F. E. Odell. Mrs. Odell at all times during the year 1905 was insolvent and unable to pay the Sweetzer judgment. The court found that plaintiff, on the 30th day of August, 1905, was, and ever since had been, the owner and entitled to the possession of the lot of prunes sued for, and gave judgment accordingly.

Appellant contends that the transfer of the fruit by Mrs. Odell to her husband F. E. Odell was void as against Mrs. Sweetzer, the judgment creditor of Mrs. Odell, under sections 3440, 3442, Civ. Code, and that for this reason the findings in favor of plaintiff were not sustained by the evidence, and a new trial should have been granted. We do not think that this contention can be sustained. In addition to the general finding above referred to, the court also found that F. E. Odell performed all the work and labor, and bore all the expenses in cultivating and raising said crop of prunes, and was the owner thereof and in the possession of the same at the time he sold them to Rosenberg Bros. & Co. This finding is not attacked in defendant's specifications of insufficiency of the evidence to support the findings, and must therefore be taken as true.

Starting with the premises, then, that F. E. Odell was on the 29th day of July, 1905, the owner and in possession of said crop of prunes, the evidence shows that on that day he sold the same to Rosenberg Bros. & Co. for a valuable consideration, and as F. E. Odell was not indebted to Mrs. Sweetzer or to anybody else, so far as the evidence discloses, the provisions of sections 3440 and 3442 of the Civil Code have no application to the sale of the prunes by F. E. Odell to Rosenberg Bros. & Co. The ownership and possession of F. E. Odell on the 29th day of July, 1905, being unchallenged, the ownership and right of possession of plaintiff at the beginning of the action follows from the evidence that plaintiff purchased from F. E. Odell, who was not the debtor of Mrs. Sweetzer. For this reason we think that the court did not err in denying the appellant's motion for a new trial. But if it be conceded that upon the record before us the appellant may attack the validity of the transaction between Grace M. B. Odell and her husband, F. E. Odell, concerning the prune crop in question, we still think the court did not err in refusing defendant's motion for a new trial.

At the foundation of appellant's claim to retain the prunes sued for must be the contention that the prunes were once the separate property of Mrs. Odell. This contention is of course predicated upon the fact that the homestead upon which they were grown was selected from the separate property of Mrs. Odell. But it was selected by her, and upon such selection she and her husband became vested with a joint title therein to the extent of the homestead. Burkett v. Burkett, 78 Cal. 310, 20 Pac. 715, 3 L. R. A. 781, 12 Am. St. Rep. 58; Porter v. Bucher, 98 Cal. 454, 33 Pac. 335. Upon the death of either spouse a homestead so selected will vest absolutely in the survivor. Section 1474, Code Civ. Proc.; Weinrich v. Hensley, 121 Cal. 647, 54 Pac. 254; Estate of Fath, 132 Cal. 609, 64 Pac. 995; Estate of Young, 123 Cal. 337, 55 Pac. 1011. Mr. Odell was in possession of the homestead upon which the prunes were subsequently grown as fully as was his wife, and he had the same right to such possession that she had, and the same right to the absolute fee thereto in case he survived her that she would have in case she survived him. Neither could alone sell, encumber, or relinquish the homestead. Under these conditions it may not be perfectly clear that a growing crop, or rather a crop with only a potential existence, was the separate property of Mrs. Odell.

But conceding that in January, when she made the agreement with her husband, Mrs. Odell had a separate interest in the crop, it is well established that growing crops are chattels not susceptible of manual delivery until harvested, and are not in the possession or under the control of the vendor within the meaning of the statute requiring an immediate delivery and continued change of possession. Davis v. McFarlane, 37 Cal. 634, 99 Am. Dec. 340; O'Brien v. Ballou, 116 Cal. 318, 48 Pac. 130. If it be said that it was the duty of Mr. Odell to take immediate possession of the prunes as soon as they were severed from the land (O'Brien v. Ballou, supra), we think the evidence in the record sufficient to show that he did take such possession. He was, in fact, in possession of the land, and lived thereon with his wife. Mrs. Odell never had any possession of the prunes except such as was incident to her possession and interest in the homestead. Mr. Odell had at all times the same possession of the land, and did all the work and bore all the expenses of cultivating and harvesting the crop of prunes. The evidence is that Mr. Odell "raised the crop," and that Mrs. Odell had nothing to do with the prunes except that they were grown on the homestead, which was as much in the possession of Mr. Odell as it was in her. "What constitutes an immediate delivery and an actual and continued change of possession is a fact to be determined upon the evidence in each particular case." Porter v. Bucher, 98 Cal. 454, 33 Pac. 335; Byrnes v. Moore, 93 Cal. 394, 29 Pac. 70; Claudius v. Aguirre, 89 Cal. 503, 26 Pac. 1077; Dubois v. Spinks, 114 Cal. 289, 46 Pac. 95. The facts of this case make as strong if not a stronger showing of an immediate and continued change of possession than was made in Porter v. Bucher, supra, which was held a proper case for the jury. In Porter v. Bucher a husband sold to his wife hay in the stack on the homestead raised by him on the homestead. Substantially the only possession taken by the wife in this latter case was to close and fasten the gate to the corral where the hay was, and to cause her stock to be fed therefrom. In the case at bar the husband (vendee) cultivated and harvested the prunes, and in so doing necessarily exercised acts of ownership and possession continually over the prunes.

The evidence is sufficient to show a change of possession sufficient to meet the requirements of section 3440, Civ. Code. The labor and expense incurred and to be incurred by Mr. Odell in cultivating and caring for the premises was a valuable consideration for the transfer to him of the interest of Mrs. Odell in the prunes to be grown. The transfer, therefore, was not as a matter of law fraudulent as one made by an insolvent without valuable consideration. Section 3442, Civ. Code.

No other reason is urged for a reversal of the order, which is therefore affirmed.

We concur: COOPER, P. J.; KERRIGAN, J.

STECKTER v. EWING et al. (Civ. 371.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California.
Nov. 15, 1907.)

1. ADVERSE POSSESSION—ELEMENTS.

Adverse possession sufficient to vest title must consist of actual, open, and notorious occupation, hostile to plaintiff's title, held under a claim of title exclusive of any other right as the holder's own property, continuous and uninterrupted for five years prior to the commencement of the action, and payment of taxes.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 1, Adverse Possession, § 65.]

2. SAME—EVIDENCE.

Plaintiff and her husband mortgaged certain land to a bank, she believing that the mortgage contained the land in controversy, which was in the inclosure with the land mortgaged. The bank foreclosed the mortgage, and bought the land and deeded the same to R. in accordance with the description in the mortgage, which plaintiff still believed included all the land. Plaintiff attorned to R. as his tenant, and continued to occupy the land as such for more than 10 years without making any claim of title until after she had surrendered possession to R.'s grantees. Held, that plaintiff's possession of the land in such inclosure not included in R.'s deed was not adverse to him, and that she was not entitled to hold it as against his grantee.

Appeal from the Superior Court, Napa County; H. C. Gesford, Judge.

Action by M. E. Steckter against J. Z. Ewing and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. F. Henning, for appellant. F. E., H. L. & L. E. Johnston, for respondents.

HART, J. The plaintiff brought this suit to quiet title to certain real property situated in Napa county. The pleadings upon which the action was tried were the amended complaint and the amended answer thereto, and were verified. The issues tendered by the pleadings involve the claim by the plaintiff of the right to the possession of and title to the land in dispute, and the alleged ownership of the same in the defendant Ewing. The answer pleads the statute of limitations (section 318, Code Civ. Proc.) in bar of plaintiff's cause of action. The court, from the proofs, found in favor of the claim of the respondents that they held title to the property in controversy by adverse possession, and caused judgment to be entered dismissing plaintiff's complaint. It is from said judgment, accompanied by a bill of exceptions, that this appeal is taken.

The premises in dispute are a part of what is known as the Caymus grant, situated in Napa county, and consists of a tract of land, with appurtenances and improvements, embracing, approximately, 47.42 acres, upon which the appellant and her husband, John Steckter, now deceased, filed a declaration of homestead on the 9th day of March, 1877. This land, so selected as a homestead, adjoins another tract of land, carved out of said grant, consisting of 367 acres, title to which was acquired by appellant and her husband by purchase from one S. C. Hastings on the 29th day of September, 1869, subsequently to the location by appellant and husband upon the land in controversy. The whole property—that acquired from Hastings and the premises in controversy—was enclosed by and within one general fence, sufficient to turn stock, “as early as the year 1864,” and the two tracts thereupon became, to all practical intents and purposes, one body of land. When appellant and husband located on the land in dispute, one Yount was the owner of said Caymus grant, and Hastings later succeeded to the Yount title. There were two surveys of the grant made many years ago, by the first of which the westerly line of said grant was made to correspond substantially with the easterly line of the premises in dispute, and by the second of which the westerly boundary line of the grant corresponded with the westerly line of said premises. Under the last survey it will be seen the contested premises were brought within the exterior boundaries of said grant. Neither the appellant nor the respondents could, however, as to the premises described in the complaint, trace the source of title to or connect it with the Yount title. John Steckter died in the year 1902; but, prior to that event, to secure an indebtedness, he and the appellant executed to the Bank of Napa a mortgage, the date of which does not appear from the record, upon “the lands bounded on the west by the premises described in the complaint, including a portion of the land described in the declaration of homestead,” but not including that portion of the homestead lands lying westerly of said line, and which constitute the subject of this litigation. On the 3d day of April, 1894, after due proceedings, said mortgage was foreclosed, and a sale of the mortgaged premises was decreed by the superior court, and a sale of the same under said decree made on the 5th day of May, 1894, the bank (mortgagee) becoming the purchaser thereof for the sum of $7,847. A deed to the mortgaged land was thereupon executed to the bank, and thereafter and on the 8th day of November, 1894, the bank sold and transferred said land to one Sumner Randall, son-in-law of the appellant, for the sum of $8,000. Randall executed a mortgage on the land to the bank to secure the payment of most of the purchase price of said property. During the period, covered by the existence of the mortgage from appellant and her deceased husband to the bank, the appellant remained in possession of the mortgaged land and resided on the premises described in the complaint. After Randall bought the property he entered into a verbal agreement with appellant by which the latter was to continue in possession of the same in consideration of the payment to Randall of a yearly sum sufficient to meet the interest on his indebtedness to the bank. On the 30th of September, 1903, Randall and wife transferred the property to respondent Ewing, the deed of conveyance describing the land as it was described in the mortgage to the bank and in the deed from the latter to Randall, and within which description the particular premises in controversy were not included. On September 5, 1904, Randall executed to Ewing another deed for the same property, and included therein the premises described in the complaint.

From the evidence it is clear that Randall, as well as the appellant, when he purchased the property from the bank, believed that the premises over which this action arose were a part and included in the description of the property contained in the deed from said bank to said Randall; that the respondent Ewing, when he bought from Randall, believed that the land so purchased included said disputed premises. The appellant admitted that she had always thought the premises described in the complaint were comprehended in the land mortgaged to the bank, and that she did not discover the mistake until after she had given up possession of the whole property to Ewing. At the time Ewing purchased the property the appellant stated to both respondents that her lease from Randall would not expire until the 1st of November, 1903, but, as a matter of fact, she, so far as the record shows, of her own volition, quit the premises and delivered possession thereof to Ewing on the 11th day of October, 1903. She did not at that time, or at any other time, claim to own any of the property. Harria, the executor of the will of appellant's deceased husband, testified that he had always supposed the property mortgaged to the bank and later sold to Randall included the premises in dispute. Both Ewing and Evans testified that when negotiations for the purchase of the property by the first named from Randall were pending they visited the property and that the boundaries of the same as pointed out to them by appellant embraced the land in controversy. Plaintiff admitted that when the mortgage to the bank was executed she supposed the whole property, including the premises described in the complaint, was covered by that instrument, and that she labored under such belief, both as to said mortgage and the deed to Randall, as well as the deed from the latter to Ewing, up to and including the time she quit the premises and surrendered the possession thereof to said Ewing. She admitted paying rent—the sum necessary to pay the annual interest to the bank—to Randall for the occupation and use of the entire tract. The arrangement as to rent was, according to Randall, afterwards changed, and thereby she agreed to return in lieu of cash rent, one-third of the crops raised on the place during the year, and later again she agreed to pay the sum of $500 yearly as rent. Randall made some improvements upon the property during the period of his ownership thereof, said improvements being put upon that part of the land in controversy. In short, all the parties connected with the property from the time of the execution of the mortgage by the appellant and her husband to the bank to the time of the sale to Ewing believed the premises in litigation here were included in the property deeded by the Bank of Napa to Randall, and by the latter to Ewing, and a reasonable inference from such belief by appellant is that the supposition of all parties thereto must have been the same when the mortgage was executed to said bank.

It is to be noted from the foregoing statement of the facts established at the trial that Randall for a period substantially of 10 years had possession, through his tenant, of the premises in question, and openly and notoriously claimed to own the same during all that time, and that the appellant, while holding personal possession and using the premises during said period, admittedly held such possession as tenant of Randall, recognizing by acts and words his ownership, and never during said period of time setting up any claim of ownership in herself or in any manner denying Randall's ownership and right to possession at the termination of the lease under which she held them. It is admitted that Randall paid the taxes upon the entire property from the time the bank conveyed to him until he sold to Ewing.

The appellant contends that the findings of the court upon the important points in the case are either not sustained by sufficient evidence or altogether without support from the proofs. The findings of the court that the plaintiff "has not been the owner or in the possession or entitled to the possession of the premises in dispute," and that defendants "have title and right of, in and to the said premises and to the whole thereof as against plaintiff," are challenged upon the ground that the evidence is insufficient to sustain them; that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding that Randall was, on the 30th day of September, 1903, the owner in fee, in possession and entitled to the possession of said premises, and that he sold the same for a valuable consideration to respondent Ewing; that the evidence is not sufficient to support the finding of adverse possession by Randall, or that plaintiff's cause of action is barred by section 318 of the Code of Civil Procedure; that there is no evidence which supports the finding that the appellant was ever out of actual possession of said premises, etc. The exceptions to the findings are apparently founded mainly upon the theory that there could be no adverse possession of the land in dispute as against the appellant so long as she remained in actual physical possession of the same, notwithstanding the fact that for a period of 10 years she believed that the bank deeded all the land within the inclosure to Randall, and the further fact that she leased the land, including the homestead, from Randall and during all that time treated him as the owner of the whole thereof and as her landlord. In other words, the argument of appellant is that, inasmuch as the disputed land was not included within the description of the land mortgaged by herself and husband to the bank, nor included within the property conveyed by the latter to Randall, and because, furthermore, she never lost actual possession of the homestead, the statute could not run against her title. This contention, under the facts as established, cannot be maintained.

There are five elements essential to the establishment of an adverse possession sufficient to vest a perfect title: (1) The possession must be by actual occupation, open and notorious, not clandestine; (2) it must be hostile to the plaintiff's title; (3) it must be held under a claim of title, exclusive of any other right, as one's own; (4) it must be continuous and uninterrupted for a period of five years prior to the commencement of the action; (5) payment of taxes. Unger v. Mooney, 63 Cal. 595, 49 Am. Rep. 100, and authorities therein cited. The plaintiff herself, as we have seen, admitted that she always believed that the homestead or land in litigation was covered by the mortgage to the bank. She admitted that she believed that the entire tract of land, including the homestead, was conveyed by the bank to Randall. In fact, her belief that Randall bought all the land within the inclosure is best evidenced by the fact that upon the sale to Randall she immediately attorned to him by taking a lease of all the land from him, stipulating to pay, as rent, for the occupation and use thereof, such a sum annually as would pay the interest accruing upon the note from Randall to the bank, given for a large part of the purchase price of the land, and to secure which a mortgage was executed by Randall to the bank. She at all times, up to the day that she surrendered possession to Ewing, treated with Randall, with reference to all the land, as the owner thereof and as her landlord. For a few years she paid the rent as originally agreed upon, and then she and Randall entered into a new arrangement by which she was to return to the latter, by way of rent, one-third of the products raised upon the land. Subsequently the arrangement for cash rent was renewed. Randall himself declares that he supposed all the time that he had purchased the whole tract of land from the bank. In his negotiations with Ewing, he offered to sell the latter the whole body of land within the inclosure, and it was then not only understood by Randall and Ewing, but also by the plaintiff herself, that the land belonged to Randall. When Ewing visited the premises, having in contemplation the purchase of the place, the appellant pointed out to him the fence line as indicating the boundaries of the land purchased by Randall, and, after the sale to Ewing, surrendered possession voluntarily and without a murmur of protest before the expiration of the term of her lease. Randall, as we have shown, paid the taxes on all the land from the time that he received the deed from the bank to the time of the sale to Ewing. Thus it will be seen that Randall at all times not only claimed the land in dispute, but exercised all acts of ownership and dominion over it openly and notoriously. The possession of the land by the plaintiff was his possession, just as much so as if, when he first purchased the land, he had removed the plaintiff from possession, and put some other tenant in possession, or had taken actual physical possession himself. It does not answer the proposition to say that the plaintiff during the whole period of her tenancy under Randall labored under the mistake that the land in controversy was a part of that mortgaged to the bank and conveyed to Randall. In Woodward v. Faris, 109 Cal. 17, 41 Pac. 782, it is said: "Most cases of adverse possession which have ripened into title commenced, I doubt not, in mistake. It must be either by mistake or deliberate wrong. It is through mistake only that one can honestly claim to own that which really belongs to another. But this discussion need not be prolonged, for it is only necessary to set the statute running that the party should be in possession as owner." See, also, Silvarer v. Hansen, 77 Cal. 584, 20 Pac. 136; Grimm v. Curley, 43 Cal. 250.

All the elements of adverse possession are present in the case at bar. Randall, the grantor of Ewing, from the time he purchased from the bank, was, in contemplation of law, in the continuous, open, notorious, and adverse possession, claiming to hold and own the land in dispute adversely to all persons whomsoever. Counsel says that Ewing, before purchasing, should have inspected the records, and by such inquiry have first determined what portion of the land had been conveyed by deed to Randall and what portion not. The same suggestion has equal force applied to the appellant. In truth Ewing relied, no doubt, to some extent upon the representations of appellant herself as to the extent of the land owned by Randall. But for 10 years she remained in possession of the land as the admitted tenant of Randall, knowing that he claimed ownership of the entire tract, never doubting such ownership, but expressly conceding and recognizing it, and yet never taking the trouble to examine the public records for herself to ascertain whether her homestead had been mortgaged and sold. While the rule of equitable estoppel might not be invoked against her under the circumstances of the case (which we do not decide), it may well be suggested that she was guilty of inexcusable negligence in suffering with passive indifference an adverse title to ripen against her before her "very eyes," and that it would hardly be just, after an innocent third party has purchased the land, under the circumstances shown here, to declare that she should be upheld, to the prejudice of such innocent party, in asserting rights lost through her own fault.

The judgment is affirmed.

NOBLES v. HUTTON. (Civ. 376.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 20, 1907. On Rehearing, Dec. 20, 1907; Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 16, 1908.)

1. DEEDS—VALIDITY—INCOMPETENCY OF GRANTOR.

In a suit to set aside a deed on the ground of mental incompetency of the grantor, evidence held to justify a finding of mental incompetency.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 16, Deeds, §§ 638, 639.]

2. SAME—CONFIDENTIAL RELATIONS—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Where a son acted under power of attorney executed by his mother, who was old and infirm, with authority to manage her business, a confidential relation existed between the parties, and the burden rested on the son, obtaining from her practically all her property without valuable consideration, to show that the conveyance was not obtained through fraud or undue influence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 16, Deeds, § 589.]

3. GIFTS—VALIDITY—CONFIDENTIAL RELATIONS—PRESUMPTION.

A gift by one person to another, occupying towards each other confidential relations, is constructively fraudulent, and is only upheld on a showing of special circumstances.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 24, Gifts, § 86.]

4. PARENT AND CHILD—CONVEYANCE BY PARENT TO CHILD—VALIDITY.

Where a son, dealing with his parent with regard to the latter's property, obtains title thereto without adequate consideration, the transaction will, on principles of equity, be scanned with the strictest scrutiny, and such transaction will be examined circumspectly where the parent is aged and mentally infirm, but not altogether incompetent, and where there are other children for the exclusion of whom from the parent's estate no reasonable account is given or apparent.

5. DEEDS—VALIDITY—CONFIDENTIAL RELATIONS—UNDUE INFLUENCE.

Persons standing in a confidential relation toward others cannot entitle themselves to benefits which those others have conferred on them, unless they show that the person by whom the benefits were conferred had independent advice on the subject given in private, by some one of the latter's own selection, and when not surrounded with dominant influences favoring the transfer.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 16, Deeds, §§ 191-194.]

6. SAME—EVIDENCE.

In a suit to set aside a deed executed by a mother to her son, between whom a confidential relation existed, on the ground of undue influence, evidence examined and held to justify a finding of undue influence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 16, Deeds, § 641.]

7. SAME — COMPETENCY OF GRANTOR — EVIDENCE.

While, in a suit to set aside a deed on the ground of incompetency of the grantor, the test is the competency of the grantor at the time of the execution of the deed, testimony of the mental competency of the grantor before and after the execution of the instrument is admissible to show the probable condition of the mind of the grantor at the time of the transaction.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 16, Deeds, §§ 604-606.]

8. APPEAL — REVIEW — FINDINGS — CONCLUSIVENESS.

The weight of the evidence is for the trial judge, who may disregard the uncontradicted testimony of witnesses, and his findings supported by some evidence will not be disturbed on appeal, unless there is such inherent weakness in the proofs as to justify the appellate court in saying that as a matter of law they do not sustain the findings.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 3979-3982.]

9. EVIDENCE—OPINION EVIDENCE—COMPETENCY OF GRANTOR.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 10, rendering the opinion of an intimate acquaintance respecting the mental sanity of a person competent, the objection that the husband of a grantor who had not lived with her for nearly a year, and that another person who had not seen the grantor very often for two years prior to the date of the deed, could not testify as to the mental competency of the grantor, was to the weight of the testimony rather than to its competency.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 20, Evidence, § 2242.]

10. SAME.

On the issue whether a grantor in a deed possessed mental competency, the questions asked witnesses should relate to the grantor's mental competency, and not as to whether he was competent to make a transfer of property.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 20, Evidence, § 2290.]

11. APPEAL—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—ERRONEOUS ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

Where, in a suit to set aside a deed on the ground of mental incompetency and undue influence, the evidence justified a finding of undue influence, error in rulings on evidence as to mental competency was harmless.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 4175, 4177.]

12. DEEDS — VALIDITY — UNDUE INFLUENCE — EVIDENCE.

In a suit to set aside a deed on the ground of undue influence, evidence that no actual consideration passed for the deed at the time of its execution was admissible to show that the deed was void because obtained by undue influence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; J. Q. White, Judge.

Action by Elizabeth Nobles, formerly Elizabeth Hutton, by C. M. Curley, her guardian, against D. D. Hutton. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Weldon & Held, for appellant. W. G. Poage and Thomas, Pemberton & Thomas, for respondent.

HART, J. The purpose of this action is to set aside a certain deed, purporting to convey the lands therein described to defendant, and to quiet title to said lands. The plaintiff, having been prior to the commencement of this action adjudged by the superior court to be an incompetent and a guardian of her estate and person thereupon appointed, brought the suit, and is a party hereto by her general guardian. Judgment was awarded to plaintiff, setting aside the deed, and quieting her title to the lands alleged to have been thereby conveyed. The appeal is from the judgment and the order denying defendant a new trial.

The defendant is a son of the plaintiff, and it is charged in the complaint that the latter, while in a state of mental incompetency, conveyed to the defendant, without a valuable consideration, the lands involved in this controversy. It is alleged that the plaintiff, by reason of the infirmities of old age, was without capacity to transact business, or to realize and understand the effect of her act in executing said deed to defendant; that she was illiterate and unable to read, and at the time of the transaction complained of had no opportunity to secure and receive the counsel and advice of any other relative, friend, or acquaintance; that the plaintiff was taken by the defendant and his wife to Ukiah, a distance of about 50 miles from her home, and, while among strangers, signed and acknowledged the deed; that defendant, taking advantage of the said infirmity of mind and illiteracy of plaintiff, and of his relationship to her, imposed upon said plaintiff, and unduly influenced her to transfer to him said property, which, it is alleged, is of the value of about $6,000. The court found that upon the 17th day of June, 1904, the day upon which the deed mentioned in the complaint was executed as alleged, the plaintiff was "old, infirm, of failing memory, and of unsound mind, and by reason thereof at the time incapacitated from attending to business," and that defendant took advantage of such incapacity, and procured her to sign and acknowledge said deed, conveying to him the property described in the complaint, without any consideration therefor; that the plaintiff in the transaction was without independent advice, and that defendant "by taking advantage of plaintiff's mental weakness and by the use of undue influence arising out of the relationship existing between the parties hereunto, to wit, the relation of mother and son, and of principal and agent, and further taking advantage of the circumstances above recited, procured and persuaded plaintiff to sign and acknowledge" the deed which is the cause of this controversy.

The principal contention of the appellant is that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings. The testimony upon behalf of plaintiff upon the question of her alleged mental incompetency was mostly from witnesses who saw very little of her during several months prior to the date of the execution of the deed. But the witness Avella, who was a lessee of the plaintiff of certain land, testified that he met and talked with her frequently, and that he noticed that her mind was failing, and that she appeared to have a poor memory, etc. Avella said that after he learned of the execution of the deed, by which she conveyed her property to the defendant, he mentioned the circumstance to her, and that she denied having transferred the land to defendant. This witness expressed the opinion that plaintiff was incapable of understandingly attending to business. There was other testimony upon this point by witnesses who, as stated, had not seen much of plaintiff for three or four months before the transfer was made. Neighbors of plaintiff, testifying for the defense, stated that, up to the time of the transaction out of which this suit arises, she appeared to be of sound mind and fully capable of conducting her business affairs. The attorneys who drew the deed, and who were present when plaintiff signed and acknowledged it, testified that she seemed on that occasion to be intelligent and thoroughly appreciative of the nature and effect of the transaction. It would accomplish no useful purpose to go into all the testimony upon the point under consideration. It is sufficient to say that, while it may be admitted that the testimony offered and received in support of the allegation in the complaint of the mental incapacity of the plaintiff, and her inability to understand and know the nature and result of the transaction involving the execution of the deed, is by no means strong, so far as we are able to judge from the bare record, there is, nevertheless, some testimony to sustain the finding upon that point, and we are not prepared to say that the court was not justified in making said finding. Besides, we do not think that the proposition of the alleged mental incompetency of plaintiff to the extent that she was incapacitated for the transaction of business is of paramount importance in view of other considerations presented by the record.

The evidence shows that, besides the defendant, there were living at the time of the execution of the deed and when the trial was had several children of plaintiff, and that between these children and plaintiff the most amicable filial relations existed. It further appears that the defendant had been, for some time prior to and up to the date of the conveyance to him of the property in dispute, the agent of plaintiff, acting as such under a power of attorney. It is also clear that while, as we have suggested, the evidence may not be strong as to her alleged incompetency, there can be no doubt that the plaintiff had to some extent grown mentally feeble and of poor memory, and was certainly in a condition of mind in which she could be easily influenced by one in whom she had confidence. The power of attorney to which we have referred clothed the defendant with authority to "sue for and collect all such sums of money, debts, rents, dues and accounts, and other demands whatsoever, which are or shall be due, owing and payable to me or detained from me in any manner whatsoever," etc. The authority thus conferred upon the defendant does not, it is true, at least by express language, relate to the property in controversy, but if, as appellant contends, said power of attorney does not establish confidential and fiduciary relations between the parties as to the property in dispute, there is still much significance in the circumstance of defendant's agency of plaintiff in the fact of the confidence thereby reposed in the defendant by the plaintiff. The evidence shows that the plaintiff was induced by the defendant, prior to the execution of the deed, to leave her farm and take up her residence with defendant and wife. And there is no reason shown why the plaintiff should have given the bulk, if not all, her estate to the defendant to the exclusion of her other children. The circumstances under which the transfer of the property was made to the defendant were, upon their face, such as to create suspicion as to the good faith of the transaction, so far as defendant's part in it was concerned. Indeed, the mere statement of the circumstances discloses, in our opinion, a strong case of constructive fraud. The judge of the court below, who saw and heard the witnesses, and who was in a position to determine the weight to which the testimony of the witnesses was entitled, upon the evidence through which the circumstances attending the transaction were developed, found that not only undue influence was practiced by defendant, but that the transaction was constructively fraudulent. With this finding we do not feel at liberty to interfere. There is no room for doubt, under the evidence as presented here, that the relations existing between plaintiff and defendant were confidential and therefore of a fiduciary character. The evidence clearly shows that the plaintiff reposed in the defendant especial confidence and trust, and the court found that "defendant was at the time of the execution of said written instrument and for many months prior thereto had been continuously the agent of plaintiff, and was by her intrusted with the management and conduct of all her business," etc. The conclusion of the trial court from this finding was that the conventional fiduciary relations between plaintiff and defendant extended to all transactions between them relating to plaintiff's business affairs, whatever of her property they might involve, so far as any dealings defendant might have with her in his own behalf were concerned. With this conclusion we are, as before indicated, perfectly satisfied.

A relation of trust and confidence being established between these parties through the authority as agent vested in defendant by plaintiff, it was the duty of the former to act in perfect good faith in his dealings in his own behalf with said plaintiff in a transaction relating to her property, independent of any consideration of his duty towards her as her son and in her enfeebled condition of mind. When, therefore, he obtained from her, under the circumstances disclosed by the evidence, valuable property—in fact, practically her entire estate—admittedly without a valuable consideration, the burden rested upon him to show that the fructification of the transaction was not attained through fraud or undue influence. This is only a statement in different form of the well-settled rule that a gift by one person to another occupying towards each other confidential relations is constructively fraudulent, and, as the Supreme Court says in Brison v. Brison, 75 Cal. 529, 17 Pac. 689, 7 Am. St. Rep. 189, "is only to be upheld upon a showing of special circumstances." By this it is not meant that it is impossible that such a gift may be valid, but that such a transaction, under such circumstances as are shown here, is by presumption of law tainted with fraud, and that the burden of showing the good faith of the same is on the donee. See Hays v. Gloster, 88 Cal. 566, 26 Pac. 367, and cases cited. This burden the defendant failed to sustain—that is, he failed to show that the deed was the result of the free agency of the grantor, or not "more the offspring of his own than of her own will."

In Paddock v. Pulsifer, 43 Kan. 718, 23 Pac. 1049, where a daughter obtained a deed from her aged and invalid father to a valuable piece of land without consideration and which conveyance was set aside, the Kansas Supreme Court lays down the rule in cases of the character of the present one as follows: "In such a case as this, the burden of establishing the perfect fairness and equity of the conveyance to Mrs. Paddock was thrown upon her, in view of her father's age, sickness, and feebleness of mind, and the close relation of the parties. Confidence was necessarily reposed in Mrs. Paddock. If that confidence was abused in procuring the deed, the trial court very justly set it aside. Added to the "close" natural relationship of the parties here is, it must always be remembered, the further relation of confidence and trust created by the authority as agent conferred upon the defendant by the plaintiff."

But the relation of parent and child, where business transactions are carried on between them, is the source of the very highest considerations of confidence and trust. Confidence in such a case originates in and proceeds from natural laws, and, generally speaking is innate and an essential part of the nature of both, for in whom could a parent repose a greater degree of confidence than in him to whom has been directly transmitted his own blood, and over whom he has exercised parental dominion and discipline from infancy to matured manhood. So, when a son dealing with his parent with regard to the latter's property, gains an advantage or obtains title to such property without adequate or any consideration, the transaction should, upon principles of equity and fair dealing, be scanned with the strictest scrutiny. And, a fortiori, should such transaction be examined circumspectly when the parent is, as here shown to be, aged and mentally infirm, even though not altogether incompetent, and where there are other children, for the exclusion of whom from the parent's estate no reasonable account is given or apparent. The books are full of cases illustrating the application of the principle as thus stated. In Comstock v. Comstock, 57 Barb. (N. Y.) 453, a case in which an aged parent conveyed property to her son with whom she was living and the deed set aside, it is said: "It is a well-settled rule of equity jurisprudence that all gifts, contracts, or benefits from a principal to one occupying a fiduciary or confidential relation to him are constructively fraudulent and void. The court, in such cases, acts upon the principle that if confidence is reposed it must be faithfully acted upon; if influence is acquired it must be kept free from the taint of selfish interest, and cunning and overreaching bargains. In this class of cases there is often found some intermixture of deceit, imposition, or overreaching advantage or other mark of positive or direct fraud. But the principle upon which courts of equity act in regard thereto stands independent of any such ingredient, upon a motive of general public policy. Among the relations subject to the foregoing rule are those of parent and child, attorney and client, and principal and agent."

We have examined with care all the authorities cited by appellant upon the point under discussion and find nothing therein inconsistent with the views here expressed. The case of Soberanes v. Soberanes, 97 Cal. 140, 31 Pac. 910, was an appeal from the judgment upon the judgment roll alone. The court held that the findings could not be disturbed because, in the absence from the record of the evidence from which the findings were deduced, the evidence was presumptively sufficient to sustain them. It is, however, said in that case: "Transactions like the one under consideration are watched by courts of equity with the most scrutinizing jealousy, and are generally held to be presumptively void. They will be set aside upon the discovery of the least fraud, and every presumption ought to be indulged against them. The person who makes the donation and bestows the confidence is not bound to show that any imposition has been practiced upon him. It is sufficient for him to establish intimate and confidential relations with the donee. Some of the cases hold that undue influence is not to be inferred from the relation of parent and child, where the gift is from the parent to the child (citing Millican v. Millican, 24 Tex. 446); but where the parent is of great age, or is enfeebled by disease, and conveys his entire estate to one child, to the exclusion of other children dependent upon his bounty, the burden is unquestionably upon the donee to show that the gift was made freely and voluntarily, and with full knowledge of all the facts, and with perfect understanding of the effect of the transfer." Citing Todd v. Grove, 33 Md. 194, and Highberger v. Stiffler, 21 Md. 352, 83 Am. Dec. 593. The rule as it is declared in Smith v. Mason, 122 Cal. 426, 55 Pac. 143, while undoubtedly correct as applied to the circumstances under which the deed there was executed, seems to be rather broadly stated, and, as construed by appellant, is opposed to the whole current of authority upon the subject. But in that case it was not alleged or claimed that the grantor was incompetent in any respect to execute the deed to defendant, "nor that he at all mistook its contents, nor that defendant procured it by means of undue influence or fraudulent promises or, indeed, that she made any effort to obtain it."

Here, as seen, it is alleged, and the proven circumstances show, that a confidential relation existed between the parties, and a conveyance made without consideration by one who, if not totally incompetent, was at least enfeebled in mind. The evidence, as already appears, shows that for nearly a year before the deed was executed, the plaintiff resided with the defendant and his wife, and during that time was in constant association with, and the companion of, the latter. She had returned to her farm, but for the purpose of making the deed was brought by the defendant to Ukiah, and when the transaction was consummated she was attended only by the defendant, his wife and the attorneys who were employed by defendant to attend to the business. According to the evidence and findings, she was not given independent advice, nor opportunity to secure it, and was compelled to rely solely for information and advice concerning the transaction upon the defendant and his wife.

It is a well-established principle that persons standing in a confidential relation toward others cannot entitle themselves to hold benefits which those others may have conferred upon them, unless they can show to the satisfaction of the court that the person by whom the benefits have been conferred had independent advice in conferring them. Yordi v. Yordi (Cal. App.) 91 Pac. 348; Rhodes v. Bate, L. R. 1st Ch. 257; section 958, 2 Pom. Eq.; Slack v. Rees (N. J.) 59 Atl. 466, 69 L. R. A. 893; Coffey v. Sullivan, 63 N. J. Eq. 206, 49 Atl. 520; Haydock v. Haydock's Executors, 34 N. J. Eq. 570, 38 Am. Rep. 385; White v. Daly (N. J. Ch.) 58 Atl. 929. And the advice should be given in private by some one of her own selection, and when the grantor is not surrounded with dominant influences favoring the transfer. Slack v. Rees, supra; Yordi v. Yordi, supra; Coffey v. Sullivan, supra; Haydock v. Haydock's Executors, supra; Pironi v. Corrigan (N. J.) 20 Atl. 227. In the last-mentioned case, the language used is peculiarly appropriate here: "It seems to me that the complainant, laboring, as she did, under the continued disadvantages of great age and of dense ignorance and inexperience, and dealing with a person in whom she had the utmost confidence, had especial need of, and was especially entitled to, and should have had the benefit of, a full, free, and private preliminary conference with a competent lawyer or business man, who was employed and paid by her, and in whom she had confidence, and who would be devoted to her interests, and hers only." There are innumerable other cases than those cited upon all the points involved in this case, sustaining the conclusions we have reached; but it would be useless to multiply authorities upon principles so well established and understood in their application to such circumstances as are found here. We may, however, state the sum of the case here in the language of White v. Daly, supra, particularly pertinent to the facts in the case at bar: "The situation is obvious—a relation of trust and confidence on the one side; an improvident deed, the product of that trust and confidence, on the other. That the influence was a constantly operating influence is undeniable; that it was an undue influence is demonstrated by the fact that the transaction was improvident, and that the only gainer by it was the person under whose influence the grantor was."

As stated in the beginning of this opinion, the principal claim of the appellant why a reversal should be ordered is that the evidence does not support the findings. In their elaborate and able brief the learned counsel discuss at length and in detail the evidence to show that the findings are barren of sufficient support. It is declared that the evidence shows that some of the witnesses for plaintiff are interested in the result of the action—a fact which we are asked to consider—and that most of the testimony upon the mental condition of the plaintiff is worthy of but little weight, because it relates to a time anterior and subsequent to the date of the execution of the deed, and that, consequently, she failed to make out a case of incompetency at the very time the deed was signed and acknowledged. It is true that the test in a case of this character, where mental incompetency is relied upon to set aside an instrument transferring property, is the condition of the party whose act is challenged upon that ground at the time said act was performed; but it is also true that testimony as to the mental condition of the party before and after the time of the making of the instrument is admissible for the purpose of disclosing circumstances tending to show her probable condition of mind at the time of the transaction. As before stated, however, the evidence and its weight are matters for the trial judge, trying the facts, to pass upon and determine, and his conclusions thereon, where, as here, there is some evidence to show plaintiff's incompetency when she made the deed, could not be interfered with by a reviewing court, unless there appeared from the record such inherent weakness in the proofs as to justify an appellate court in saying that, as a matter of law, they do not sustain the findings. A trial judge, to whom is submitted the decision of questions of fact, may disbelieve the uncontradicted testimony of certain witnesses and ignore it altogether. This, under our system, is his right and within his province as a trier of the facts. But, as we have attempted to show, even if it may be said that, as a matter of law, the evidence upon mental incompetency is, upon its face, too weak to support the finding upon that point, there are other considerations presented by the record, which, being fully supported by proof, positive and presumptive, justify the judgment.

Certain rulings of the court to which exceptions were reserved at the trial are assigned here as prejudicial errors. The witness Nobles, husband of plaintiff, from whom he had been separated for about a year, and who had not seen her for nearly a year, was permitted, over an objection to give his opinion, as an intimate acquaintance (section 1870, subd. 10, Code Civ. Proc.), of the mental competency of the plaintiff. The objection was upon the ground that the witness had not been shown to have seen the plaintiff on the day of the transaction, etc., and also as to the form of the question. The witness Hayward, asked the same question, was allowed, over objection, to give his opinion as to plaintiff's mental condition. He had not seen her very often for two years prior to the date of the deed, and the objection was that he was not competent to give his opinion within the meaning of the section of the Code admitting such an opinion from an intimate acquaintance. These objections, except as to the form of the questions, were, as we have already suggested, rather to the weight than the competency of the testimony. The form of the questions may not have been strictly within the language of the section, yet the purpose of them was to elicit opinions as to plaintiff's mental sanity. The questions were not as to whether plaintiff was competent to make a transfer of her property (Estate of Taylor, 92 Cal. 564, 28 Pac. 603), but as to her "mental competency." But under the views we have expressed concerning the issue as to mental incompetency the rulings, even if erroneous, are harmless.

It is also contended that the court erred in permitting the witnesses McNab and Hirsch to testify that no actual consideration passed for the deed at the time it was executed. In support of this contention the cases of Hendrick v. Crowley, 31 Cal. 472, and Arnold v.

Arnold, 137 Cal. 296, 70 Pac. 23, are cited. These cases do not sustain the contention. In the last-mentioned case, the court after declaring the very elementary proposition that the terms of a written contract cannot be varied and defeated by parol testimony, says: "No fraud, no undue influence, no mistake was averred or sought to be proved." The testimony here was not offered to vary the terms of a valid written contract, but for the purpose of showing that the instrument was void because obtained by fraud and undue influence.

We find no prejudicial errors in the record. The judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; BURNETT, J.

On Petition for Rehearing.

HART, J. We have carefully examined the petition for a rehearing herein, and observe nothing therein persuading a different conclusion from that arrived at in the main opinion. The petition involves practically only a repetition of an argument based upon the evidence and the facts thereby established. We are unable now, as we were upon the original investigation of the record, to see our way clear to hold that the evidence, as a matter of law, is insufficient to sustain the findings of the trial court.

Our attention has, however, been called to two immaterial inaccuracies in the statement of the facts in the original opinion. We therein stated that prior to the commencement of the action the plaintiff, Mrs. Hutton, had been declared an incompetent, and a guardian of her estate and person thereupon appointed by the superior court. The fact is, as we find upon re-examination of the record, she began the action before she was adjudged an incompetent, and the proceeding in which she was so declared was consequently had after the suit was instituted.

We also stated that Mrs. Hutton, prior to the execution of the deed, was induced to leave her farm and take up her residence with defendant and wife; whereas the record discloses that she was living in town at the time she was separated from her husband, and that thereafter she went to the home of the defendant.

It is too clear to justify the time in making the suggestion that these immaterial inaccuracies cannot, in the remotest degree, affect the conclusion at which we arrived in the original opinion. It must be plainly manifest that whether Mrs. Hutton was declared an incompetent before or after the commencement of the suit could have very slight material bearing upon the question of her competency at the time of the transaction from which the suit arises. And whatever weight the circumstance, happening as it really did, might carry, was for the jury to determine. Still less could the fact of her having been taken from her home in Ukiah to the residence of the defendant, before the deed was signed and acknowledged, influence the determination of the ultimate facts in the case.

The petition for a rehearing is denied.

In re CLAVO'S ESTATE. (Civ. 331.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 16, 1907.)

1. HOMESTEAD—ABANDONMENT.

The removal of a party from premises on which he has declared a homestead after a void execution sale thereof, and his surrender of the possession to the execution purchaser, do not constitute an abandonment of the homestead within Civ. Code, § 1243, providing that a homestead can be abandoned only by a declaration of abandonment, etc., and he cannot declare a second homestead on other land.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 25, Homestead, §§ 320-326.]

2. SAME—DECLARATION OF HOMESTEAD.

Where a wife after executing jointly with her husband a declaration of homestead on his separate property died, the surviving husband held the homestead protected against forced sale, but by the death of the wife the property vested absolutely in him.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 25, Homestead, § 259.]

3. SAME.

Civ. Code, § 1265, provides that on the death of a person whose property has been selected as a homestead it shall go to his heirs, etc. Code Civ. Proc. § 1474, as amended in 1880, provides that, where the homestead selected by the husband and wife was selected from the separate property of the person selecting or joining in the selection, it vests on the death of the husband or wife absolutely in the survivor. A wife, after executing jointly with her husband a declaration of homestead on his separate property, died, leaving her husband surviving, who after his second marriage executed a declaration of homestead. Held, that on the death of the husband the property did not vest in his heirs, but in the second wife surviving; the husband, though incompetent to select a different homestead, having the right to file a second declaration of homestead on the same property.

4. DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION—APPLICABILITY OF STATUTES.

The descent of property is governed by the law in force at the death of the owner.

Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; L. G. Harrier, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Nicholas Charles Clavo, deceased. From an order setting aside certain property for a homestead to Ann Clavo, widow of the deceased, his heirs appeal. Affirmed.

O. B. Gentry and Bell & York, for appellant. Klerce & Gillogley, for petitioner. Sullivan & Sullivan, for petitioner A. Clavo.

BURNETT, J. The appeal is from an order setting aside absolutely to Ann Clavo, widow of the deceased, certain property as and for a homestead.

Two declarations of homestead upon the same property appear in the transcript; one executed jointly by Clavo and a former wife in 1877 upon the property as his separate estate, and the other executed by Clavo alone in 1880 after the death of his said former wife and his marriage to Ann Clavo, respondent herein.

Four propositions are submitted by appellant to which brief consideration will be given.

1. It is clear that we are not concerned about the construction of sections 1243 and 1244 of the Civil Code as the question of abandonment of the homestead is not involved.

2. It is urged that a party cannot have two homesteads, and if he attempts to acquire a second while the first is in force, the second is void. This is announced in Waggle v. Worthy, 74 Cal. 268, 15 Pac. 831, 5 Am. St. Rep. 440, and it is undoubtedly sound as applied to the facts of that case. It was there correctly held that "the removal of a party from premises on which he has declared a homestead after a void execution sale thereof, and his surrender of the possession to the execution purchaser, do not constitute an abandonment of the homestead, within the meaning of section 1243 of the Civil Code, so as to enable him to declare a second homestead on other land." But as will be seen hereafter the proposition has no material bearing upon the determination of the question at issue here.

3. We think appellant is not entirely accurate in the statement that "the death of Petronella Clavo, the first wife, did not in any manner alter the state or character of the homestead declared August 21, 1877," although admittedly after her death the property continued to retain certain characteristics of a homestead. In Tyrrell v. Baldwin, 78 Cal. 470, 21 Pac. 116, it was held that "a homestead selected from community property vests absolutely in the survivor on the death of either spouse, and is not subject to forced sale for the subsequent debts of the survivor." The question involved in the matter of the Estate of Ackerman, 80 Cal. 208, 22 Pac. 141, 13 Am. St. Rep. 116, was whether the surviving husband was entitled to have a homestead set apart to him out of the separate property of the estate of his deceased wife, when at the time of her death they were occupying other and community property which was impressed with the character of a homestead. Although not necessary to the decision it was stated broadly that "the death of one of the spouses did not alter in any way the estate or character of the homestead." The same statement is made in Sanders v. Russell, 86 Cal. 119, 24 Pac. 852, 21 Am. St. Rep. 26. In Dickey v. Gibson, 113 Cal. 30, 45 Pac. 16, 54 Am. St. Rep. 321, the rule seems to be more accurately declared as follows: "In the hands of the survivor the homestead is protected against enforced sale precisely as before it had been protected to the community by its homestead character. * * * By the death of the first wife the homestead property vested absolutely in the surviving husband. As far as the legal title is concerned, it vested in him as fully and perfectly as though no homestead had ever been carved out of it. The limitations and immunities which accompanied the enjoyment of the property under such title modified not the title but its enjoyment, and were only such as the statute imposed. Save as to these limitations and immunities, the homestead ceased to exist." In Payne v. Cummings, 146 Cal. 432, 80 Pac. 622, 106 Am. St. Rep. 47, it is said: "The interest of plaintiff in the property after his wife's death became something different and greater than it was in her lifetime. He had then not only the absolute title, but also the absolute right of exemption in the property from all former debts, as well as the right to dispose of it in any way he saw fit." But the result must be the same, as we shall presently see, whether we regard the first or the second declaration as the decisive factor in determining the status of the property at the time of Clavo's death.

4. The vital question is that presented by the fourth proposition of appellant that "upon the death of Clavo the property vested in his heirs and devisees." This contention is diametrically opposed to the provisions of the statute and the decisions of the Supreme Court. It is based upon the language of section 1265 of the Civil Code, which is as follows: "From and after the time the declaration is filed for record, the premises therein described constitute a homestead. If the selection was made by a married person from the community property, the land, on the death of either of the spouses, vests in the survivor; * * * In other cases upon the death of the person whose property was selected as a homestead, it shall go to his heirs or devisees, subject to the power of the superior court to assign the same for a limited period to the family of the decedent." If the foregoing were the only provision on the subject, we could not escape the conclusion reached by appellant; but section 1474 of the Code of Civil Procedure was amended in 1880 so as to read: "If the homestead selected by the husband and wife or either of them, during their coverture, and recorded while both were living was selected from the community property or from the separate property of the person selecting or joining in the selection of the same, it vests, on the death of the husband or wife absolutely in the survivor." If the sanction of judicial interpretation of said provisions be needed, we find it in the case of In re Croghan, 92 Cal. 371, 28 Pac. 570, wherein it is said: "But the contention of appellants is that it should have been set apart to the widow only for a limited period, after which it should go by operation of law to the appellants as heirs. The facts upon which this contention rests are these: (1) The said homestead was the separate property of the deceased; and (2) "the declaration of homestead was made by the deceased himself. Upon these facts we are clear that the homestead vested absolutely in the widow as survivor." In Weinreich v. Hensley, 121 Cal. 653, 54 Pac. 256, it is said: "The devolution of the title to the homestead premises in case of the death of one of the spouses is provided for in section 1265 of the Civil Code, and also in section 1474 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The latter section was amended 10 days later than the section of the Civil Code, and is to be regarded as the latest expression of the legislative will." It is true that both declarations here were filed prior to the time when said amendment went into effect, but this is of no importance, as "the descent of the property is governed by the law in force at the death of the husband." Tyrrell v. Baldwin, supra; Estate of Math, 132 Cal. 612, 64 Pac. 905.

If appellant is right in his contention that the property remained impressed with the character of a homestead by virtue of the first declaration, and its status in that regard was not altered or affected in any manner by the death of the former wife, then, of course, it is clear that the second declaration was ineffective for any purpose, and the conclusion also follows that said homestead would inure to the benefit of the members of the second community, and on the death of the husband would vest absolutely in the widow. But the correct view seems to be as follows: The declaration of homestead under the circumstances shown here is for the joint benefit of the spouses. The obvious intent, indeed, of the homestead act, is to secure to every householder or head of a family a home where the family may be sheltered and live beyond the result of those financial misfortunes which even the most prudent and sagacious cannot always avoid. Thus the word itself ordinarily indicates that there must be a family. McCanna v. Anderson, 6 N. D. 482, 71 N. W. 769. To constitute a homestead with all its attributes as contemplated by the statute, it must be occupied as a home by the family, except in the single instance provided by the statute for a declaration by one who is not the head of a family.

Upon the death of the first wife the title to the property became vested absolutely in the husband, and he was clothed with complete dominion over it, but by virtue of the statute it still retained some characteristics of a homestead, among them being exemption from execution. While that exemption continued, he could not select another and different homestead. But the title having vested completely in the husband upon the death of his wife, the property could not in the very nature of the case continue as a homestead for the benefit of the second community. The unqualified title of one of the spouses es to the property is inconsistent with the existence of a homestead for the benefit of both. After his second marriage, in order to clothe the property with all the attributes of a community homestead, it was necessary for the husband to file another declaration. This he did, as he had a right to do, and the effect of it was that upon his death the property vested absolutely in his widow as it would have vested in the former wife under the first declaration if she had survived him.

The order is affirmed.

DAVEY v. SCHUERMAN et al. (Civ. 838.)
(Court of Appeal, Third District, California.
Nov. 16, 1907.)

1. APPEAL—TO WHAT COURT TAKEN—NOTICE.

The test determinative of the court to which an appeal is taken is not the title of the court on the printed back of the transcript or of the briefs, but is the language of the notice of appeal itself.

2. SAME—CALENDARS—STRIKING OFF CAUSE.

Where an appeal has been taken to the Supreme Court, but by mistake the cause was placed on the Court of Appeal calendar, the cause may be removed from that calendar either by striking it therefrom, or transferring it to the Supreme Court.

3. SAME—RIGHT OF REVIEW—REPRESENTATIVE COMPETENCY—SPECIAL ADMINISTRATOR.

An order appointing a special administrator to "preserve and protect" the estate of intestate was sufficiently specific within Code Civ. Proc. § 1412, requiring an appointment to be made by entry on the minutes of the court "specifying the powers to be exercised by the administrator," to authorize the special administrator to appeal from a judgment against intestate, in an action wherein affirmative relief was sought on the ground that intestate had been the owner of the property in dispute.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 2, Appeal and Error, § 911.]

4. SAME—TRANSFER OF CAUSE—SERVICE OF NOTICE OF APPEAL.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 940, providing that an appeal is taken by filing with the clerk a notice thereof, and serving a similar notice on the adverse party, the provision as to service is equally as mandatory as that as to filing, and failure to serve a notice within the required time is fatal to an appeal, though such notice may have been filed within the required time.

Appeal from Superior Court, Nevada County; F. T. Nilon, Judge.

Action by Samson Davey against V. J. Schuerman. Subsequent to judgment against him, defendant having died, John Mulroy was appointed special administrator, and from an order denying a new trial, he appeals. Appeal dismissed.

Chas. W. Kitts, for appellant. Thos. S. Ford, for respondent.

HART, J. This is an appeal by the defendant from an order denying his motion for a new trial upon a statement of the case.

The action was brought to quiet title to certain land situated in Nevada county. The plaintiff claims title through a homestead patent issued to him by the government of the United States in the month of August, 1893. The defendant's claim of title is based upon an alleged purchase of the land from the Central Pacific Railroad Company on the 1st day of June, 1891, it being contended that said land was embraced within the grant to said railroad company from the general government by virtue of an act of Congress of the United States, approved July 1, 1862, entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific Ocean and to secure to the government the use of the same for postal, military and other purposes" (Act July 1, 1862, c. 120, 12 Stat. 489), and an act amendatory thereof, approved July 2, 1864, by which the United States granted to said railroad company "each odd-numbered section on each side of the line of its railroad to be located as provided by said acts and which was within twenty miles of said line" (Act July 2, 1864, c. 216, 13 Stat. 356). At the time the homestead patent was issued by the government to the plaintiff the defendant had possession of and was living upon a portion of the disputed land; but subsequently to the issuance of said patent to plaintiff the defendant took a lease of the premises from plaintiff, the same being in writing, at the nominal rental consideration of $1 per year.

The defendant, after answering by denial the averments of the complaint, sets out, by way of cross-complaint, a history of his title to the land, and upon the facts thus alleged asks for affirmative relief, viz.: That the plaintiff be declared the holder of "said patent and title of said premises in trust for this defendant; that he be directed and obliged to reconvey the same to this defendant," etc. The court found from the evidence all the allegations of the complaint to be true, and accordingly entered a decree quieting plaintiff's title to the demanded premises.

Respondent presents a motion to dismiss the appeal upon three grounds: (1) Because the appellant "had not legal capacity to sue or be sued or take this appeal"; (2) because "this court never obtained jurisdiction of the case"; (3) because the appeal was not taken within the time prescribed by law.

We will first dispose of the second ground of the motion to dismiss in the order in which the several grounds are thus presented. The appellant served upon respondent, on the 7th day of February, 1907, a notice that he appealed from the order "to the Supreme Court of the state of California." According to the clerk's certificate, an undertaking on appeal was filed by appellant on the 6th day of February, 1907. The notice was dated on the 6th day of February, but it does not affirmatively appear when the notice was filed. But for the purpose of the present discussion the date of filing may be passed without further consideration at this time. If the appeal was perfected or properly taken, it was undoubtedly to the supreme and not to this court. On the back of the fly leaf of the transcript (and the same is true as to the briefs of the respective counsel) the title of the court is as follows: "In District Court of Appeal, Third Appellate District, State of California." The suit is one in equity, and of that class of causes of which, therefore, by the terms of section 4 of article 6 of the Constitution, this court is not vested with appellate jurisdiction, except where, as here, the Supreme Court orders the transfer of the same to a District Court of Appeal for decision. It is apparent from the record that the appellant sought to take his appeal to the proper tribunal, and did do so, if he filed and served his notice within the time prescribed by law, and took such other timely steps as are essential to the perfection of an appeal. But, through a mistake, due perhaps to a misapprehension of the county clerk, such misapprehension being occasioned, no doubt, by the misleading manner of the printed backing on the transcript and briefs, the cause was placed on the September calendar of this court. Counsel for appellant appeared personally in court, and moved for an order transferring the case to the Supreme Court, on the ground that the appeal had in fact been taken directly to that court. The respondent insisted upon his motion to dismiss upon the ground, among others, already enumerated, that this court had no jurisdiction of the appeal. A statement of the nature of the action at once disclosed that the relief sought by both parties was one solely cognizable in a court of equity, and hence it was quite manifest that this court could not acquire jurisdiction of the case by direct appeal. Upon taking up the record after the submission of the cause we conceived it to be our duty, in view of the status of the cause before us, to order the same transferred to the Supreme Court, and accordingly we made such order, and thereafter the case was transferred to this court for decision. Among the papers we find with the record of the case is a document which was filed on the 1st day of November, 1907, a few days subsequently to the order of the Supreme Court transferring the cause here for decision. This document is signed by the attorneys for the respondent, and appears to bristle with indignation because this court transferred the case to the Supreme Court under the authority of rule 32 of this court (78 Pac. xlii), and with considerable warmth the learned counsel declare that it was our duty to have ordered a dismissal of the appeal, and that rule 32 has no application to the circumstances of the case as it appeared on the calendar of this court. It may be that within the ordinarily untrod range of the recondite learning of the gentlemen representing the respondent, and therefore esoterically hidden from the common view, there is to be found some sound reason for the exercise by this court of the remarkable power of ordering a dismissal of an appeal taken to the Supreme Court; but, from our point of view, it seems to be a proposition readily obvious to the average intelligence that this court has no more right to dismiss an appeal to the Supreme Court, merely because the cause has by mistake or through inadvertence found its way to our calendar, than it would have to dismiss any other appeal to that court upon the motion of counsel. It ought not to be necessary to remark that we have no conceivable authority to interfere with the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. And it ought to be equally as unnecessary to observe that the test determinative of the court to which an appeal is taken is not the title of the court on the printed back of the transcript or of the briefs, but is the language of the notice of appeal itself. The case could have been removed from our calendar by either of two proper methods, viz., by striking it from the calendar, or by the course adopted and pursued by us. By the latter course the cause was certain to go where it properly belonged, without further action. By the former, it is probable that an application to the Supreme Court would have been necessary, in order to get it upon the calendar of that court, for an order, requiring the clerk of this court to transmit the record to the former court, thus causing extra trouble and expense. But in either case it is manifest the cause must have finally gone where it belonged.

We will now proceed to a consideration of the other grounds upon which a dismissal of the appeal is asked. The defendant Schuerman, it seems, died after judgment was had and entered against him by the court below. In order, therefore to prosecute an appeal in this case, Mulroy was, upon petition, appointed special administrator. The order of appointment recited that Schuerman died intestate in Nevada county on December 1, 1906, leaving estate in said county, etc., and that it appears to be necessary that a "special administrator of the estate of said decedent be forthwith appointed to preserve and protect the same." It is contended that neither the order appointing nor the special letters gave Mulroy authority to maintain this appeal, because his powers as such special administrator are not therein specifically pointed out, or, in other words, because he is not so expressly authorized to prosecute the appeal. This contention is based on the language of section 1412 of the Code of Civil Procedure, so much of which as is pertinent to the question here reads as follows: "The appointment may be made at any time, and without notice, and must be made by entry upon the minutes of the court specifying the powers to be exercised by the administrator." We think the language of the order is broad enough and sufficiently specific to bring the matter of maintaining this appeal within the authority and powers conferred upon him as special administrator by the special letters granted to him, construed by the light of said order of appointment. We can conceive of no more appropriate steps which could be taken by an administrator to "protect and preserve" the property of the estate of his intestate than by prosecuting an appeal from a judgment or order involving the property rights of the estate, and which he may be advised has been erroneously entered against the intestate. The authorities cited by counsel upon this point have no application to the question here. Nor do we think that the case of Collins v. O'Laverty, 136 Cal. 35, 68 Pac. 327, and other cases cited to the same point, are open to the interpretation which counsel seem to give them. It is true that the action here is not one for the specific recovery of the possession of the premises; but the issue tendered by the complaint and cross-complaint and consequently to be determined is the title to or ownership of the land, and, if the issue is decided adversely to the claim of the appellant, then at least a potential right of possession would vest so instantly in the respondent, who, when the same ripened into the right of possession, would be entitled to reduce such right to actual possession. If the parties were reversed in the character in which they appear here as litigants, of course the same would be true. In his cross-complaint the defendant, who was in possession at his death, declares that he is the owner of the land, and alleges that the respondent obtained a pretended title from the government by unlawful means, and asks that respondent be decreed to hold his evidence of title (the homestead patent) in trust for him. The special administrator, in prosecuting this appeal in an action, which, upon a cross-complaint, as we have seen, seeks affirmative relief upon behalf of his intestate upon the ground that the latter was the owner of the disputed property, is, we doubt not, clearly acting within the powers as such administrator granted to him by the court—to preserve and protect the estate of the decedent.

But we are of the opinion that the appeal must be dismissed upon the third ground upon which a dismissal is asked. The statute (section 940 of the Code of Civil Procedure), as it existed at the time the appeal herein was sought to be taken, required that the notice of appeal should be filed and served on the adverse party within 60 days after the order was made and entered in the minutes of the court. Here the order was made and entered on the 8th day of December, 1906, and the notice was apparently filed on February, 6, 1907 (although it is not clear from the record that it was so filed), but not served on the "adverse party" until the 7th day of February, 1907. Thus it appears that service was made on the sixty-first day after the order was made and entered. The statute reads: "An appeal is taken by filing with the clerk of the court in which the judgment or order appealed from is entered, a notice stating the appeal from the same, or some specific part thereof, and serving a similar notice on the adverse party or his attorney." It is thus to be observed that two initiatory steps must be taken in order to consummate the appeal—filing of a notice of appeal, and serving a similar notice upon the adverse party or his attorney. A failure to do either of these two things within the time within which a party has the right to appeal is fatal to the taking of the appeal. The statute is the sole source from which the right of appeal flows, and every step which is thereby required to be taken in order to perfect an appeal is jurisdictional, and without observance of which there can be no appeal effected. If the service upon the adverse party or his attorney of the notice one day after the time limited within which an appeal may be taken would be effective, then such service 10 or 20 days thereafter would be equally as effective, and the language of the statute would thus be rendered meaningless. The provision as to the service of the notice is equally as mandatory as that with reference to the filing, and it would not for a moment be contended that a filing of the notice after the time limited by the statute would have any force. To give the section any other construction would amount to an elimination by judicial legislation of the provision as to the time of service of the notice. The Legislature of 1907 (St. 1907, p. 753, c. 410), added a new section to the Code of Civil Procedure, No. 941a, which seems to repeal that part of section 940, supra, requiring the service of the notice upon the adverse party or his attorney. But, as seen, the appeal in the case at bar was attempted to be perfected under said section 940 prior to the approval of section 941a.

The appeal is dismissed.

ROSS v. STATE. (16 Wyo. 286)

(Supreme Court of Wyoming. Jan. 20, 1908.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW—MOTION FOR VERDICT—EXCEPTIONS.

The overruling of a motion for a verdict for accused, made after the state had rested, is not reviewable, where an exception to the ruling is not preserved in the bill of exceptions.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 15, Criminal Law, § 2807.]

2. RAPE—ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO RAPE—INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction, on a trial for assault with intent to rape a female under the age of consent, that an attempt of a man to carnally know a female under the age of six years, whether with or without her consent, is an attempt to do a violent injury to her, states but one of the elements of assault as charged in the information alleging that accused attempted to commit a violent injury on the person of a female under the age of 18 years, with intent to carnally know her, and is not objectionable as defining an attempt to commit a felony, or defining an offense unknown to the law.

3. SAME—ELEMENTS OF OFFENSE.

To have carnal knowledge of a female under the age of consent is unlawful, and constitutes a violent injury within Rev. St. 1899, § 4957, punishing one who having the present ability to do so, attempts to commit a violent injury on the person of another.

4. SAME—INFORMATION.

An information alleging that accused attempted to commit a violent injury on the person of a female child under the age of consent, he having present ability so to do, with intent to ravish and carnally know the child, follows, in charging the assault, Rev. St. 1899, § 4957, defining assault and is coupled with an averment of the felonious intent, and is good.

5. SAME—ELEMENTS OF OFFENSE.

Rape, as defined by Rev. St. 1899, § 4964, punishing one having carnal knowledge of a woman forcibly and against her will, or of a woman under the age of 18 years, either with or without her consent, includes assault as defined by section 4957, and where a woman over the age of 18 years, not under duress, and mentally competent, consents to sexual intercourse, there is no assault, but carnal knowledge of a female under the statutory age is conclusively presumed to have been committed with force and against her consent, and her acts constitute no defense to a charge of rape.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 42, Rape, § 12.]

6. SAME.

Under Rev. St. 1899, § 4964, punishing one having carnal knowledge of a woman forcibly and against her will, or of a female under the age of 18 years, with or without her consent, and sections 4956-4958, punishing an assault with intent to commit a felony, defining assault and assault and battery, an assault with intent to rape a female under the age of consent is committed, though the female did not resist or was willing to perform the sexual act, since the statute changed the common-law definition of assault, and assault and battery, and though under the statute assault implies force, physical resistance is not a necessary element in an assault with intent to rape a female under the age of consent.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 42, Rape, § 17.]

7. CRIMINAL LAW—STATUTES—CONSTRUCTION.

The court in construing a statute defining an offense by adding thereto elements not found in the common-law definition is not bound by the construction which obtained with reference to the common-law offense, and where a statute creates and defines a crime, which is a substitute for a common-law offense, the rules appertaining to the latter, except in so far as they are applicable, must yield to the statutory rules of construction.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 14, Criminal Law, §§ 10, 11.]

8. RAPE—ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO RAPE—INFORMATION—"RAVISH."

The word "ravish" presupposes force, and is indispensable in a common-law indictment for rape, but is surplusage in an information charging assault with intent to rape a child under the age of consent.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 42, Rape, §§ 23, 29.]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 7, p. 5933.]

9. ASSAULT AND BATTERY—ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO COMMIT FELONY.

In an attempt to commit a felony, the question of assault is not necessarily involved, but in an assault with intent to commit a felony, assault is an essential element and must be proven.

10. STATUTES—INSTRUCTION—LEGISLATIVE INTENT.

Every statute must be construed with reference to its intended scope and the purpose of the Legislature, and where the language used is ambiguous, or admits of more than one meaning, it will be taken in such a sense as will conform to the scope of the act to carry out the purpose of the statute.

11. RAPE—FEMALE UNDER AGE OF CONSENT—CONSENT—RESISTANCE.

Rev. St. 1899, § 4964, punishing one having carnal knowledge of a woman forcibly and against her will, or of a child under the age of 18 years, with or without her consent, declares that a female under the age of 18 years is incapable of giving consent to the sexual act, and the incapacity must be construed to extend to and include any attempt to commit the offense.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 42, Rape, § 14.]

12. SAME—INSTRUCTIONS.

On a trial for assault with intent to rape a child under the age of consent, an instruction that in determining whether the state proved the intent beyond a reasonable doubt, the jury must be satisfied that accused intended to gratify his passions on the person of the child, notwithstanding any resistance on her part, was properly refused, since it is the intent to carnally know a female under the age of 18 years with or without her consent, coupled with an assault, which constitutes the offense.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 42, Rape, § 17.]

13. SAME — INFORMATION — EVIDENCE — VARIANCE.

There is no variance between an information alleging that accused committed a violent injury on a female under the age of consent, he having present ability so to do, with intent to carnally know her, and evidence showing an act which, if done with intent to carnally know her, comes within the definition of assault and battery as defined by Rev. St. 1899, § 4958, which includes the offense of assault as charged in the information and as defined by section 4957.

14. CRIMINAL LAW — EVIDENCE — INSTRUCTIONS.

Instructions in a criminal case should be predicated on the evidence, and where the evidence shows that accused is guilty of the offense charged, or not guilty, the court is not required to instruct on lower grades of the offense.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 14, Criminal Law, §§ 1923, 1924.]

15. SAME—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where, on a trial for assault with intent to rape a child under the age of 6 years, the evidence showed that accused took the child to a bench in the rear of a building out of sight of persons in the vicinity, and that later accused was seen kneeling before the child in the act of having sexual intercourse with her, the refusal to charge that accused could be found guilty of assault was proper, since, under the evidence, accused could only be found guilty of an assault with intent to rape, or not guilty.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 14, Criminal Law, §§ 1923, 1924.]

16. RAPE—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

On a trial for assault with intent to rape a child under the age of consent, evidence held to justify a conviction.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 42, Rape, §§ 78-82.]

Error to District Court, Sheridan County; Carroll H. Parmelee, Judge.

Charles Ross was convicted of assault with intent to rape a child under the age of 18 years, and he brings error. Affirmed.

S. P. Cadle, for plaintiff in error. W. E. Mullen, Atty. Gen., for the State.

SCOTT, J. Plaintiff in error (defendant below) was charged, tried, and found guilty of an assault upon the person of a female child under the age of 18 years with the intent to commit rape. His motion for a new trial was overruled, and judgment was pronounced against him sentencing him to a term of years in the penitentiary, and he brings error.

1. When the state rested its case, the defendant moved the court to instruct the jury to return a verdict in his favor on the ground that the evidence was insufficient to convict. The motion was overruled, and such ruling is here assigned as error. An examination of the record fails to show that any exception was taken to such ruling, or if it was, it is not preserved in the bill of exceptions. The question is not therefore properly before us, and need not be discussed.

2. The court, over the objection of the defendant, gave the following instructions to the jury, viz.: "You are instructed that under the law of this state an attempt on the part of a man to carnally know a female child under the age of six years, whether with or without her consent, would be an attempt to do a violent injury to such child as alleged in the information." It will be observed that this instruction does not purport to describe a complete crime as defined by our statute, but simply one of the elements of assault as charged in the information. In this state there is no such crime defined by the statute as an attempt to commit a felony, nor is the instruction open to the objection that it is a definition of an offense unknown to the statute. The information charges that on the 3d day of April, 1907, the defendant did "unlawfully and feloniously attempt to commit a violent injury on the person of * * * a female child under the age of 18 years, he the said Charles Ross, having then and there the present ability so to do, with intent then and there and thereby unlawfully and feloniously to ravish and carnally know the said * * *." To have carnal knowledge of a female under the statutory age of consent is at least rude as well as unlawful, and within the contemplation of the statute constitutes a violent injury. The acts alleged in the information come within the statutory definition of what constitutes an assault as contained in section 4957, Rev. St. 1899, which is as follows: "Whoever having the present ability to do so, unlawfully attempts to commit a violent injury on the person of another, is guilty of an assault and shall be fined," etc. Assault and battery is defined by section 4958, Rev. St. 1899, as follows: "Whoever in a rude, insolent or angry manner unlawfully touches another, is guilty of an assault and battery." The information follows the language of the statute in charging the assault, and that language is coupled with an averment of the felonious intent at the time, and is a good information. Bryant v. State, 5 Wyo., 376, 40 Pac. 518.

As the evidence showed no resistance on the part of the girl or consent to the alleged assault it is claimed on behalf of the defendant that she consented because she did not resist, and it is urged that the instruction is erroneous upon the ground that violence consented to does not constitute an assault, and that the use of the word "ravish" in the information required proof of physical resistance. Rape is defined by section 4964, Rev. St. 1899, as follows: "Whoever unlawfully has carnal knowledge of a woman forcibly and against her will, or of a woman or female child under the age of eighteen years, either with or without her consent, is guilty of rape, and shall be imprisoned in the penitentiary for a term not less than one year, or during life." Section 4956, Rev. St. 1899, is as follows: "Whoever perpetrates an assault or an assault and battery upon any human being with intent to commit a felony, shall be imprisoned in the penitentiary not more than fourteen years." It is clear that a comparison of the above sections shows that rape includes the crime of assault as defined by section 4957, supra, and when a woman over the age of 18 years, who at the time is not under duress or fear, and is mentally competent to do so, consents to sexual intercourse, then there is no assault either in the attempt to have or in the consummation of such intercourse. It is equally true, and all the authorities agree, that carnal knowledge of a female, who at the time is under the statutory age of consent, regardless of the frame and condition of her mind, is conclusively presumed to have been committed with force and against her consent, and her acts and conduct would be no defense to the charge of rape. While this is true as to the crime of rape, there is some conflict in the decisions as to whether a conviction can be had for an assault with intent to commit rape upon a female under the age of consent, where it is shown that she made no resistance, and was willing to perform the sexual act. The above statutory definitions of assault and assault and battery are identical with the corresponding sections of the statutes of Indiana, and differ materially from the common-law definitions. The present ability to inflict an injury is not necessary to an assault at the common law, and any unlawful touching of one against his will with intent to injure constitutes a battery, while under the statute the touching must be unlawful and in a rude, insolent, or angry manner. Bish. Stat. Crimes (3d Ed.) §§ 501, 502. By the common law an assault must be accompanied by physical force creating a reasonable apprehension of immediate physical injury to a human being, and a battery was not committed unless the act alleged to constitute it was committed against the will of the injured party. 2 Bish. New Cr. Law, §§ 23, 28, 70. The English authorities hold that as an assault implies the use of physical force or violence, there can be no such force or violence necessary or used when there is no repulsion or resistance, and that there is no assault when the female, whatever her age, does not resist, but consents to the acts which constitute the alleged assault. The rule is stated in Bishop on Statutory Crimes (3d Ed.) § 496 as follows: "While the common form of attempt to commit the ordinary rape is by assault with such intent, and on an indictment for rape there may be a conviction of assault if no technical rule prevents, in matter of principle, and by the better judicial determinations, there cannot be under the common-law rules an assault with intent to have the criminal carnal knowledge of a girl with her consent; because by the common-law rule violence consented to is not an assault, and the statute which makes her consent immaterial in defense of the carnal knowledge does not extend also to the assault." Of the American cases cited in the footnote as supporting that doctrine Whitcher v. State, 2 Wash. St. 286, 26 Pac. 268, has been overruled in State v. Hunter, 18 Wash. 670, 52 Pac. 249; Hardin v. State, 39 Tex. Cr. R. 426, 46 S. W. 803, has been overruled in Croomes v. State, 40 Tex. Cr. R. 672, 51 S. W. 924, 53 S. W. 882; Stephens v. State, 107 Ind. 185, 8 N. E. 94, was overruled in Murphy v. State, 120 Ind. 115, 22 N. E. 106. This rule does not seem to have found much favor with the American courts, for so far as our research has enabled us to determine it is now followed by but two of those courts. Smith v. State, 12 Ohio St. 466, 80 Am. Dec. 355; State v. Pickett, 11 Nev. 255, 21 Am. Dec. 754. The weight of authority is overwhelmingly the other way, and to the effect that such consent is unlawful and does not waive the assault. People v. McDonald, 9 Mich. 150, 152, 153; People v. Courier, 79 Mich. 366, 44 N. W. 571; Cliver v. State, 45 N. J. Law, 46; Com. v. Roosnell, 143 Mass. 32, 8 N. E. 747; Territory v. Keyes, 5 Dak. 244, 38 N. W. 440; State v. Dancy, 83 N. C. 606; Hays v. People, 1 Hill (N. Y.) 351; Brown v. State, 6 Baxt. (Tenn.) 422; Fizell v. State, 25 Wis. 364; People v. Lourintz, 114 Cal. 628, 46 Pac. 613; People v. Vann, 129 Cal. 118, 61 Pac. 776; State v. Wray, 109 Mo. 594, 19 S. W. 86; State v. Grosshelm, 79 Iowa, 75, 44 N. W. 541; Polson v. State, 137 Ind. 519, 35 N. E. 907; Hanes v. State, 155 Ind. 112, 57 N. E. 704; Leibschner v. State, 69 Neb. 395, 95 N. W. 870; State v. Sargent, 32 Or. 110, 49 Pac. 889; Farrell v. State, 54 N. J. Law, 416, 24 Atl. 723; In re Lloyd, 51 Kan. 501, 33 Pac. 307; Addison v. People, 193 Ill. 405, 62 N. E. 235; 2 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. (2d Ed.) 987, and page 361, vol. 1 of Supp., and cases cited in the footnotes. 1 McClain, Crim. Law, § 464. The difference in the holdings may, however, be accounted for in the fact that the cases in this country have turned upon the construction of the statutory definition of assault rather than upon the common-law definition of that offense. In construing a statute which contains new and different elements the courts are not bound by that construction which obtained with reference to the common-law offense. The statutory changes were evidently meant to remedy some imperfections which were recognized to exist. The statute, by apt words, created and defined a new crime which is a substitute for the common-law offense, and the rules appertaining to the latter, except in so far as they are applicable, have to yield to the statutory rules of construction. In Croomes v. State, supra, there was a conviction for an assault with intent to commit rape on the person of a female under 15 years of age, that being the statutory age of consent in that jurisdiction. The court say: "The Code provides that any unlawful violence upon the person of another, whatever be the manner or degree of violence, is an assault. There is no statute or construction of a statute on the question of assault saying that the consent of the injured party prevents the act from being an assault. If the act is unlawful, it is an assault. The mere fact that the party injured consents to it does not prevent it from being an assault."

It will be observed that the information charges the defendant with having perpetrated an assault with the felonious intent to "ravish and carnally know." The word "ravish" presupposes force, and was indispensable in the common-law indictment for rape, but does not occur in the definition of that crime given in our statute, and for that reason its use is not necessary in describing the offense. Tway v. State, 7 Wyo. 74, 50 Pac. 188. There must be resistance and force used in overcoming such resistance in rape, where the female is over the age of consent, either under the common law or under the statute; and carnal knowledge of a female under the statutory age of consent, and also at the common law when such female is under the age of 10 years, is conclusively presumed to have been accompanied with force and against consent, and in an indictment or information therefor under and following the words of the statute the word "ravish" is unnecessary and may be treated as surplusage. Section 486, Bish. Stat. Cr. (3d Ed.). We are not, however, dealing with the completed offense of rape. The charge is of an assault with intent to commit a felony, and if the intent was to carnally know a female under the statutory age of consent, then such intent was felonious regardless of whether the accused contemplated resistance on her part or not. The word "ravish" as used in the information did not impose any greater burden upon the state than proving the elements of the offense as defined by the statute, and which are charged in the information, and it may therefore be treated as surplusage.

A distinction is made and carried into the decisions between attempts to commit and an assault with intent to commit a felony. In the former the question of assault is not necessarily involved, while in the latter it is an essential element of the crime charged, and as such must be proven. People v. Dowell, 136 Mich. 306, 99 N. W. 23. While the statutory definition of assault implies force, it does not necessarily follow that there must be proof of actual or physical resistance on the part of the person assaulted, for in the absence of such proof the law implies resistance. An assault may be committed under such circumstances that the person assaulted is entirely ignorant of any attempt to commit a violent injury to his or her person, as when the assailant, having the present ability to do so, unlawfully attempts but is interrupted from doing violence to the person of one who is asleep, or of one who is passing along a crowded street. So it may be said that absence of resistance resulting from physical inability or want of opportunity to resist or consent to the act constituting an assault, which proceeds from a disordered or insane condition of the mind, is no consent, and does not strip the act so committed of its criminal character. Putting in fear is not always necessary at common law (section 33, 2 Bish. New Cr. Law), nor is it an element of assault as defined by our statute, though it may be involved in the proof as a part of the res gestæ, and if the acts constituting the attempted injury are unlawful, and the other elements are present to constitute an assault, that crime is complete and none the less a crime because of nonresistance by the injured party. The evidence is undisputed, and shows that the girl was between 4 and 5 years of age at the time of the assault, and by all the authorities by reason of her age she had no legal ability to consent to the sexual act; and if that is so, it seems incredible that she could lawfully consent to the acts and preparations which constituted in themselves an unlawful attempt, coupled with a present ability to do a violent injury to her person, simply because the purpose intended was not consummated. In a well-considered case the Supreme Court of Washington say: "The offense of carnally knowing a female child under the age of 12 years necessarily includes the less offense of assault with intent. The complete offense is merely an aggravation of the felonious assault, and the child's legal inability to consent to the sexual act also extends to and includes any attempt to commit it; in other words, she lacks capacity to consent to the force which, in the absence of consent, would constitute an assault." State v. Hunter, supra. The acts constituting the alleged assault could have been proven upon a trial on the charge of rape as a part of the res gestæ, and evidence that she consented would have been inadmissible as not tending to prove any defense to the charge. The reversal of a conviction of the lesser and included offense of assault with intent to commit rape would scarcely be justified upon the ground that the defendant had not been permitted to show the frame of mind of the one so assaulted when the latter was within the statutory age of consent. In such a case the law implies resistance, for under the law there can be no consent. In People v. Verdegreen, 106 Cal. 211, 39 Pac. 607, 46 Am. St. Rep. 234, there was a conviction for an assault with intent to commit rape upon the person of a female child under the statutory age of consent. The evidence showed that she went voluntarily to the room of the accused, and submitted, without resistance, to his advances. The Code defined rape as "an act of sexual intercourse accomplished with a female not the wife of the perpetrator, under either of the following circumstances: (1) When the female is under the age of fourteen years. (2)" etc. Pen. Code, § 261. It was there urged as here that there can be no such thing as an assault upon a consenting female, regardless of the fact that she may be under the age, when she can legally consent to the sexual act. The court say: "It is true that an assault implies force by the assailant and resistance by the one assaulted, and that one is not in legal contemplation injured by a consensual act. But these principles can have no application to a case where under the law there can be no consent. Here the law implies incapacity to consent, and this implication is conclusive. In such case a female is to be regarded as resisting, no matter what the actual state of her mind may be at the time. The law resists for her." To the same effect is People v. Vann, supra. This rule would not, however, apply when the female was over the age of consent. People v. Fleming, 94 Cal. 308, 29 Pac. 647.

The action was not for the redress of a private wrong. The defendant was answerable to the state for such conduct as the state had declared to be criminal. She was a ward of the state, and his conviction was sought not alone to punish him, but also for the moral and salutary effect it would have in preserving the chastity of those similarly situated, and in carrying out the duty it owed to those to whom in its wisdom it had thrown out the protecting arm of the law. Its policy and the intentment of the law is not to withhold punishment until that has been destroyed which was sought to be protected. In Croomes v. State, supra, the court say: "To say that the Legislature of Texas would hang a man for the consummated act of rape, and yet not desire to punish him at all for assault with intent to rape under any contingencies, is a proposition to which we cannot agree. Then, if the Legislature did not intend such a construction, we feel constrained, if the language of the statutes is susceptible of a rational, sensible, and reasonable construction that will give validity, strength, and force to every phase of the law, that that construction should be adopted." It is said in Black, Interp. Laws, p. 73, that: "It is generally true that, where words in a statute are clear and unambiguous, there is no room left for construction; but when it is plainly perceivable that a particular intention, though not precisely expressed, must have been in the mind of the legislator, that intention will be enforced and carried out, and made to control the strict letter." And again: "Every statute is to be construed with reference to its intended scope and the purpose of the Legislature in enacting it; and where the language used is ambiguous, or admits of more than one meaning, it will be taken in such a sense as will conform to the scope of the act and carry out the purpose of the statute." Id., p. 56. The law having declared that a female under the age of 18 years is legally incapable of giving consent to the sexual act, the intended scope of the law and the purpose of the Legislature in enacting it do not permit of a construction which would limit her incapacity to consent to that act alone, but rather that such incapacity extends to and includes any attempt to commit it. Not having legal capacity to act for herself in such matters, the state, no matter what her frame and condition of mind may be at the time, acts for and in her behalf. In such a case the law regards her as resisting. We do not go so far as to hold under our statute that force is not an element of the crime charged. An assault is an assault whether perpetrated with or without the intent to commit a felony. Our discussion has been limited to the question of the necessity for resistance to an assault, and, as we have seen, physical resistance is not always necessary, and the resistance may be in some cases only such as the law implies. We are of the opinion that physical resistance, as applied in an assault, is not a necessary element in an assault with intent to rape a female under the age of 18 years, as, under the statute she has no legal capacity to consent to the act of carnal knowledge, and every act done in furtherance of a purpose to know her carnally is unlawful and for a felonious purpose, and if such acts were so committed as to constitute an assault without her consent, then no act of hers could waive such assault.

3. The court refused to give the following instruction requested by the defendant, viz.: "In arriving at the conclusion as to whether or not the state has proved the intent beyond a reasonable doubt, the jury must be satisfied, not only that the prisoner intended to gratify his passions on the person of the child, but that he intended to do so at all events, notwithstanding any resistance on her part, and unless you do so find from the evidence, then you are instructed that you must find the defendant not guilty." In considering whether this instruction correctly states the law as applied to the facts, it must be borne in mind that in this case it is the intent to carnally know a female under the age of 18 years, with or without her consent, which is felonious. Such an intent in the absence of any overt act would not be sufficient to convict as lacking the element of assault, yet if attempted to be carried into effect by such an assault the crime is complete whether such assault be resisted or not. There is a marked distinction in this case and where one has an intent to carnally know a female over the age of 18 years, for in the latter any such intent is only felonious when it is attempted to be carried into effect forcibly and against the will of such female. This instruction carries with it the idea that the felonious intent could only exist when resistance was offered, whether the female be over or under the statutory age of consent. As we have seen, this is not the law with reference to an assault committed with intent to rape a female under that age. People v. Roach, 129 Cal. 33, 61 Pac. 574, and other cases, supra. The court properly refused to give this instruction.

4. It is urged that the court erred in refusing to instruct the jury that if they were satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant assaulted the child, but were not so satisfied that the assault was committed with the felonious intent to commit rape, then they should acquit him of the crime of assault with intent to commit rape, and find him guilty of assault. The evidence in this case tended to show that on the 3d day of April, 1907, some little boys were playing by a ditch in the vicinity of the town of Dietz, in Sheridan county. A female child between 4 and 5 years of age was seen to cross a bridge over the ditch going in the direction of where the boys were, and in doing so, she had to pass near where the defendant was sitting on a pile of dirt. When the little girl came along to where he was, the defendant got up, took her by the hand, and led her to a bench in the rear of a building and out of sight of where the other children were. The mother was informed that defendant had her child, and she went and discovered the little girl sitting on a bench, her clothes above her knees, and the defendant kneeling before her, his pants unbuttoned, and his privates in his hands. Upon being spoken to by the mother the defendant arose and fled, and shortly thereafter an officer discovered him in hiding behind some barrels in the rear of a near-by saloon and arrested him. The defendant testified in his own behalf that he had no intention of carnally knowing the child, that he neither touched her nor led her to the bench, that he was not kneeling before the child, that he was standing up, and that his pants were unbuttoned for the purpose of answering a call of nature, and denied that he fled or was in hiding from the officer. He also introduced evidence to show his reputation for morality with little girls, which was met and combated by evidence properly admitted in rebuttal on behalf of the state tending to show that his reputation in that respect was bad, and upon cross-examination by defendant's counsel incidents of indecent exposure to and chasing of little girls by him were drawn out. It will be observed that the line between the evidence for the state and the defendant is clear and distinct. If the defendant's testimony be true, he was not guilty of an assault as charged in the information, while the state's evidence tended to show that the defendant, if guilty at all, was guilty of an assault and battery. This did not constitute a variance. Com. v. Thompson, 116 Mass. 349. The overt act which was relied upon for a conviction was a rude and unlawful touching of the child. The evidence showed the act to be at least rude, and if done with the intent to carnally know her, such touching was certainly unlawful, and comes within the definition of assault and battery, as defined by section 4958, supra, which includes the lesser offense of assault as charged in the information, and as defined by section 4957, supra. While this is true, it is only so from a legal standpoint, and it does not always follow that the question of simple assault must be submitted to the jury upon a trial for the greater crime which includes it. The instructions must and should be predicated upon the evidence in the case, and when the evidence shows the accused to be guilty of the higher grade of the offense, or not guilty, the court is not required to instruct upon the lower grades. In Brantley v. State, 9 Wyo. 102, 109, 61 Pac. 189, 140, Brantley, upon a conviction for an assault with intent to commit murder, complained that the court refused to instruct the jury that he might under the information be found guilty of an assault only. This court held that upon the evidence he was not entitled to the instruction, and after reviewing the evidence, said: "If guilty at all, he was guilty of an assault and battery. There was no evidence of simple assault." This rule has been the established rule in a long line of decisions by the Supreme Court of Iowa. In State v. Sherman, 106 Iowa, 684, 687, 77 N. W. 461, 462, it was assigned as error that the court in a prosecution for rape did not submit to the jury the question of simple assault. The court, after referring to the previous holding by that court to the effect that the right to instruct on a lesser and included offense of the crime must be governed by the evidence, say: "The holding is decisive of the present assignment in this case. If there was not an assault with intent to commit rape, there was no crime committed. No other conclusion could properly be arrived at from the evidence." In the case before us assault and battery was not charged, nor was simple assault proven. Upon the record the defendant could only be found guilty of an assault with intent to commit rape as charged, or not guilty, and the court so instructed.

3. It is urged that the verdict is not supported by the evidence. In support of this contention it is argued that there is no evidence in the case to show that the defendant intended to carnally know the child, or, in other words, that the state failed to prove the felonious intent which is an essential element of the crime charged. In Bryant v. State, 7 Wyo. 311, 51 Pac. 879, 56 Pac. 596, where there was a conviction for an assault with intent to commit murder, the same error was assigned, and this court held that it was unnecessary to prove the specific intent by direct, positive, and independent evidence, and that in such a case the jury should take into consideration all the facts and surrounding circumstances as disclosed by the evidence, and find therefrom whether the acts of the accused constituting the alleged assault were done in pursuance of a felonious intent. It is unnecessary to again repeat the evidence. The jury were fully warranted in finding therefrom that the acts of the defendant were done with the intent to carnally know the child, and this intent being so established together with the other evidence in the case was sufficient to support the verdict. The theory upon which the defendant presented his case to the jury, viz., that his acts amounted only to indecency, did not commend itself to the jury, and, the record being clear of error, the conclusions reached and expressed by their verdict must stand.

It follows that the judgment must be, and it is hereby, affirmed.

HOVEY v. SHEFFNER, Sheriff.

(Supreme Court of Wyoming. Jan. 20, 1908.)

1. HABEAS CORPUS—NATURE OF WRIT—ERRORS.

A writ of habeas corpus is not available to review errors of law not affecting the jurisdiction of the court to make the order under which petitioner is held.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 25, Habeas Corpus, § 25.]

2. SAME—RECORD OF COMMITMENT OF PRISONER.

A writ of habeas corpus, issued out of the Supreme Court, will not invoke the appellate or revisory jurisdiction of the court, but merely brings up the body of the prisoner and the cause of his commitment, and not the record of the judicial proceeding, if any, in which the commitment has occurred.

3. SAME—STATUTES—"MANNER" OF EXERCISING JURISDICTION.

Rev. St. 1899, § 5498, provides that it is not permissible to question the correctness of the action of the grand jury in finding a bill of indictment, or of a petit jury in the trial of a case, or of any court or judge while acting within their legitimate province in a lawful manner, by habeas corpus. Held, that the word "manner" had reference to the method of acting, and not to the degree of perfection or correctness in the results arrived at, unless the judgment pronounced was absolutely void.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 5, pp. 4333-4337.]

4. SAME—JURISDICTION—SCOPE.

Jurisdictional facts cognizable on habeas corpus are not alone those which relate to jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the person, but to jurisdiction to render the particular judgment as well.

5. CRIMINAL LAW—JEOPARDY—DISCHARGE OF JURY.

Rev. St. 1899, § 5386, provides that if a jury disagree accused shall not be deemed to have been in jeopardy, and that whenever a jury shall be discharged after they have been kept together so long that there is no probability of their agreeing the court shall, on directing their discharge, order the reasons therefor to be entered on the journal, which discharge shall be without prejudice to the prosecution. Held that, where it appears that after a reasonable time for deliberation has been allowed a verdict has not been agreed on and there is no probability of agreement, the court may properly discharge the jury without defendant's consent, without prejudice to future prosecution.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 14, Criminal Law, § 344.]

6. SAME — DISCHARGE OF JURY—NONJUDICIAL DAY—LOSS OF JURISDICTION.

A jury, drawn to try petitioner for an offense, being unable to agree, was discharged by the court on Sunday, and thereafter, on a judicial day, the court entered an order holding defendant for trial at a subsequent term, and committed her to the custody of the sheriff until bail should be furnished. Held that, if the discharge of the jury on Sunday over petitioner's objection was unauthorized, it did not deprive the court of further jurisdiction of the case, and hence, though such discharge might be ground for plea of an acquittal or of former jeopardy on an attempt being made to retry petitioner, it was not ground for her discharge on habeas corpus.

Habeas corpus on petition of Fay Hovey to obtain her discharge from the custody of Jesse A. Sheffner, sheriff of Natrona county. Discharge denied.

Fred D. Hammond, for plaintiff. William E. Mullen, Atty. Gen., for defendant.

POTTER, C. J. A writ of habeas corpus was issued in this case, by order of the Chief Justice, and made returnable before the court, upon the petition of Fay Hovey, alleging that she is unlawfully imprisoned and restrained of her liberty at the town of Casper, in Natrona county, in this state, by Jesse A. Sheffner, sheriff of said county, under an order and commitment of the district court sitting in and for said county, made and entered November 21, 1907, which order, by reason of certain facts set out in the petition, presently to be stated, is alleged to be insufficient to justify the imprisonment complained of. The sheriff's answer and return admits the imprisonment and restraint of plaintiff, but denies its alleged illegality, and sets out a certified copy of the order aforesaid as his authority in the premises. It appears from the pleadings: That on the 7th day of November, 1907, one of the regular days of the July term of said district court, the plaintiff was placed on trial, after a plea of not guilty, upon an information filed by the prosecuting attorney of Natrona county charging her with the statutory offense of enticing a female of good repute and chastity into a house of ill fame for the purpose of prostitution. That a jury was impaneled and sworn upon said trial, to whom, after the introduction of evidence, arguments of counsel, and instructions of the court, the cause was submitted on Saturday, November 9, 1907, and they thereupon retired to deliberate upon their verdict. That on the following day (Sunday), November 10, 1907, at the hour of 10 o'clock in the forenoon, the presiding judge of said court convened the same in session, the clerk and sheriff being present, as also the plaintiff here, who was defendant in said cause, and the attorneys for the state; whereupon the jury aforesaid was called into the presence of the court, and upon inquiry by the court reported that they were unable to agree, and that there was no probability of their agreeing or rendering a verdict, and asked to be discharged from a further consideration of the case. Thereupon on said day they were discharged by the court, and an order was then made and entered of that date reciting the report of the jury and that "it thereupon appearing to the court that the jury cannot agree, and that there is no probability of their agreeing, and that they are unable to agree upon a verdict, and for these reasons, it is ordered that the said jury be discharged from a further consideration of the case." It further appears that thereafter at the same term, viz., November 21, 1907, the following order, which constitutes the authority for the imprisonment complained of, was made and entered by said court in the cause aforesaid (omitting the title and caption): "This cause coming on to be heard regularly on the special plea in bar heretofore filed by the defendant, Fay Hovey, and the same having been argued by counsel, and fully considered by the court, it is, this 21st day of November, 1907, by the court, ordered, adjudged and decreed that the special plea in bar of the defendant, Fay Hovey, be and the same is hereby denied and overruled, to which denial and overruling of the court of said plea in bar the defendant here and now excepts, and the court being unable to retry said cause at this present (July term, A. D. 1907) term, it is by the court ordered that the said cause be and the same is hereby continued until the next regular term of this court, the January, A. D. 1908, term, and it is further ordered that the bond in this cause shall be and hereby is fixed at the sum of $300 for the appearance of said defendant, Fay Hovey, before this court on the first day of the regular January, 1908, term thereof at 10 o'clock a. m., and there to remain and not depart without leave of court and to abide the judgment and order of the court, and it is further ordered that the sheriff of Natrona county, Wyo., be and he is hereby commanded to receive and safely keep the said Fay Hovey and her, the said Fay Hovey, to safely keep and imprison in the jail of said Natrona county until she, the said Fay Hovey, be discharged by due process of law, and a certified copy of this order shall be the authority of said sheriff of Natrona county. To each and every part of this order the defendant now and here excepts. Done in open court this 21st day of November, 1907." Upon the ground that the discharge of the jury was unlawful and void, for the reason that it occurred on Sunday, an alleged nonjudicial day, and without the consent of plaintiff, or a waiver by her of any of her rights, it is alleged that it operated as an acquittal, and that as a result of the proceedings the plaintiff has been placed in jeopardy for said offense. The defendant admits, by his answer and return, the discharge of the jury on Sunday, but denies that it was a nonjudicial day, and alleges that the jury was discharged because of disagreement. He further alleges that one of the jurors, named in the answer, was not a citizen of the United States, a fact not known to the prosecuting attorney at the time of the impaneling and swearing of the jury, and which could not then have been ascertained by the exercise of ordinary diligence, for which reason it is alleged that the jury was not competent and was not regularly and legally impaneled to try the cause. Plaintiff filed a reply admitting that the juror named was not a citizen of the United States, but alleging that such disqualification was known to this plaintiff at the time, and that being satisfied with him as a juror she accepted him as such and considers that she thereby waived her right to object to him. The cause has been heard by the court upon the pleadings and certain papers offered by the defendant as evidence for the purpose of establishing his allegation as to the disqualification aforesaid of one of the jurors.

We are not advised by the record in this proceeding as to the ground or substance of the special plea in bar, which appears to have been overruled by the order committing the petitioner, or the time when it was filed. The strong inference, perhaps, may be that it was filed after the discharge of the jury, and that it was based upon the ground that such discharge was illegal and void and the proceedings therefore tantamount to a verdict of acquittal, entitling the accused to set up the defense of former jeopardy or acquittal to a second trial upon the information or for the same offense. At any rate the only ground urged here for the plaintiff's discharge upon habeas corpus is that, by reason of the proceedings upon her trial she has been once placed in jeopardy, and that a second trial would violate the provision of the state Constitution that a person shall not be twice put in jeopardy for the same offense. Const. art. 1, § 11. It is urged that at common law Sunday is dies non juridicus, and though there is no local statute expressly prohibiting the sitting of the court or the transaction of judicial business on that day, that the common law in that respect is in force in this state, since, by statute, the common law of England has been adopted so far as the same is of a general nature, and not inapplicable nor inconsistent with the laws of the state. Rev. St. 1899, § 2695. It is conceded that even at common law it is competent to receive a verdict on Sunday, but it is said to have been so declared for the sole reason that such a proceeding is merely ministerial; and it is contended that the discharge of a jury for disagreement requires a judicial determination that they have deliberated a reasonable time so as to authorize a discharge, and that there is no probability of an agreement, and therefore as a judicial act is illegal when performed on a nonjudicial day. With that proposition as a basis it is contended that the illegal discharge of the jury without a verdict operated as an acquittal of the plaintiff, and that since she cannot legally be again placed in jeopardy she is entitled to be discharged. On the other hand, while it is conceded that at common law Sunday is a nonjudicial day, it is argued that the purpose of the day is far better subserved by discharging a jury unable to agree instead of keeping them together throughout the day and until Monday morning, and that the act may well be regarded as a necessity, and upheld on that ground. It is further contended that the district courts are authorized to sit on Sunday, and to discharge a jury on that day for disagreement, by virtue of the statute of 1895 (Rev. St. 1899, § 3612), which provides that, in addition to the regular terms fixed by law, "each district court shall be open at all times for the transaction of business in the entry of judgments, decrees, orders of course, and such other orders as have been made or granted by the district court, or any judge thereof, and for the hearing and determination of all matters brought before the court or judge, except the trial of issues of fact." Counsel for plaintiff insists that the expression "at all times" in said statute has reference only to days in vacation or recess upon which a court may lawfully sit and transact judicial business, and does not necessarily include Sunday or other nonjudicial days. It is argued that a clear and unequivocal statute to the contrary is required to overthrow the common-law principle prohibiting the transaction of judicial business on Sunday, and that the statute aforesaid is reasonably capable of a construction not interfering with that principle.

The question thus sought to be presented is an important one. If the propositions relied on by plaintiff are sound, and should be disregarded by the district court, and the plaintiff compelled against her objection to undergo another trial, notwithstanding that she has been once in jeopardy for the same offense, or that in legal effect the result of the former trial was equivalent to an acquittal, an error will be committed. And if, as we suppose, the overruled plea in bar set up the facts here alleged, the order denying it and committing the plaintiff may have been erroneous. The question here upon habeas corpus, however, is not whether error has been or may be committed by the district court, but whether, in committing the plaintiff to the custody of the sheriff to await another trial, the court has exceeded its jurisdiction. In this proceeding we are not concerned with mere errors of law not affecting the jurisdiction of the court to make the order under which the plaintiff is held, nor is it material here whether the discharge of the jury was a void act or not, unless, if held to have been illegal, it divested the court of jurisdiction to proceed further in the cause. And upon this point it is contended on behalf of defendant that the court retained jurisdiction, and that habeas corpus is not the appropriate remedy for the determination of the question of former jeopardy. That the writ of habeas corpus is not endowed with the functions of a writ of error or other proceeding for the review and correction of errors is an elementary rule, and has many times been asserted by this court. Kingen v. Kelley, 3 Wyo. 566, 28 Pac. 36, 15 L. R. A. 177; In re McDonald, 4 Wyo. 150, 33 Pac. 18; Miskimmins v. Shaver, 8 Wyo. 408, 58 Pac. 411, 49 L. R. A. 831; Fisher v. McDaniel, 9 Wyo. 457, 64 Pac. 1056, 87 Am. St. Rep. 971; Younger v. Hehn, 12 Wyo. 289, 75 Pac. 443, 109 Am. St. Rep. 986; Hollibaugh & Buntin v. Hehn, 13 Wyo. 269, 79 Pac. 1044. Hence, authority to issue the writ and determine the legality of a particular imprisonment thereon is frequently if not usually conferred equally upon courts of different grades and the judges thereof, without regard to the appellate jurisdiction of such courts. In this state the power is vested concurrently in the district and supreme courts and the judges thereof, and the right to entertain an application for the writ is not made to depend upon appellate or revisory authority over the judgment, order, or process by which the applicant may be restrained. The writ brings up the body of the prisoner, and the cause of his commitment, but not the record of the judicial proceeding, if any, wherein the commitment has occurred. The strictly appellate or revisory jurisdiction of this court is not invoked, therefore, through the institution of an original proceeding by a petition for habeas corpus, whether the writ be ordered issued by the court or by a justice thereof and made returnable before the court. Neither is the writ of habeas corpus designed to interrupt the orderly administration of the criminal laws by a competent court while acting within its jurisdiction. The occurrence of mere errors or irregularities in a criminal case not affecting the jurisdiction of the trial court will not authorize a discharge of the accused upon habeas corpus. Jurisdictional facts only are to be considered upon this writ whenever the restraint complained of appears to be under legal process or judicial order. A void process or a void judgment or order of a committing court is ground for the discharge of one held upon it in this summary and collateral proceeding, not because of error merely, but for the reason that the court has acted without jurisdiction, or, having had jurisdiction, has either lost or exceeded it.

Our statute proceeds upon this principle in the provision that "it is not permissible to question the correctness of the action of a grand jury in finding a bill of indictment, or a petit jury in the trial of a cause, nor of a court or judge when acting within their legitimate province, and in a lawful manner." Rev. St. 1890, § 5498. In the case of In re McDonald, supra, Chief Justice Groesbeck, speaking for this court, said, in referring to that statute in connection with the facts of the case, that "the court had acted within its legitimate province, for it had jurisdiction of the offense and of the person of the offender," and a decision of the Iowa Supreme Court construing the words "in a lawful manner" in a similar statute was quoted from with approval. In effect, the decision thus approved held that "manner" had reference to the method of acting more than to the degree of perfection or correctness in the results arrived at, so that if a court observes proper methods or means it may be said to be acting in a lawful manner, although it may err in the application of legal principles to such an extent as to involve reversible error. But it was explained that a court would not be regarded as having acted in a lawful manner when the judgment pronounced is absolutely void, since such a judgment would have no support in law. Elsner v. Shrigley, 80 Iowa, 30, 45 N. W. 393. This court has adopted the liberal view sustained by the later authorities that the jurisdictional facts cognizable on habeas corpus are not alone those which relate to jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and of the person, but as well to jurisdiction to render the particular judgment. Kingen v. Kelley, supra; Miskimmins v. Shaver, supra; Younger v. Hehn, supra. In Kingen v. Kelley it was said: "Lack of jurisdiction of the subject-matter, jurisdiction of the person, or jurisdiction to render the particular judgment assailed, seems to include all cases which render a judgment void or subject to collateral attack in habeas corpus." In the Miskimmins Case the applicant was discharged on the ground that the act for which he had been committed as for a contempt by a magistrate holding a preliminary examination did not constitute a contempt in law, and that therefore the magistrate had been without jurisdiction to render the particular judgment. The applicant had been committed for a refusal to answer certain questions propounded to him as a witness, the expressed ground of his refusal having been that his answers would tend to criminate him. In Bandy's Case a sentence to the penitentiary as for grand larceny upon an accepted plea of guilty of petit larceny to an information charging grand larceny was held to have been in excess of jurisdiction, and the applicant was discharged. The sentence appeared to have been based upon the fact that the records of the trial court disclosed a previous conviction of the accused of petit larceny, and, without a charge having been preferred of a second offense, or a plea of guilty thereto or a regular conviction thereof, the court, upon the bare record of such previous conviction, attempted to apply the statute authorizing the punishment prescribed for grand larceny upon a second conviction of petit larceny. There jurisdiction was found wanting to render the particular judgment. In the other cases above cited, previously decided by this court, questions were considered connected with the procedure of courts, and the acts complained of held, if objectionable at all, to have been mere errors or irregularities, and not void as without jurisdiction, though some of the acts were objected to on constitutional grounds. Those cases serve to illustrate the principle now under discussion, but none of them involved a state of facts similar to that presented in this case.

We are therefore to inquire into the legal consequences of the wrongful or illegal discharge without verdict of a trial jury impeached and sworn in a criminal case to ascertain whether or not the act presents a jurisdictional question, such as would entitle the accused to discharge from further imprisonment upon habeas corpus, in the event that the proceeding in relation to the jury should be held to have been erroneous, either because improper under the circumstances, or void as beyond the lawful powers of the court upon the day of its occurrence. At this day it is unnecessary to cite authority to sustain the right of a trial court, without prejudicing a future prosecution, to discharge a jury in a criminal case, where it appears that after a reasonable time for deliberation has been allowed a verdict has not been agreed upon, and there is no probability of an agreement. In accordance with the general rule upon that subject, now well established on the ground of necessity, the Constitution of this state, in the section containing the provision against a second jeopardy, provides that, "If the jury disagree, * * * the accused shall not be deemed to have been in jeopardy." The statute moreover provides that whenever a jury shall be discharged after they have been kept so long together that there is no probability of agreeing, the court shall, upon directing the discharge, order the reasons therefor to be entered on the journal, and such discharge shall be without prejudice to the prosecution. Rev. St. 1899, § 5386. It may be conceded that the improper discharge of a jury in a criminal trial after the commencement of jeopardy will render the proceedings equivalent to a verdict of acquittal, so far as such a verdict will constitute a good defense in bar of a subsequent trial for the same offense, either upon the same or another indictment or information, and perhaps also entitle the accused to a judgment of acquittal and discharge upon the same information upon motion in the trial court. When a criminal trial has reached the stage where jeopardy has commenced, and the jury is discharged without the consent of the defendant on trial, without some recognized necessity, or reason authorized by law, it may well be held, as it generally is, since the right of the accused to a verdict at the hands of the jury has been rendered impossible without fault on his part, through the erroneous act of the court, that he may demand that the result be regarded as an acquittal, and he will be protected by the rule forbidding a second jeopardy. And manifestly the same situation arises upon a discharge of the jury, though for a lawful cause, at a time or on a day when the court is without power to sit or make an order discharging them. It does not follow, however, that the erroneous or void discharge of the jury, and the advantage thereby afforded to the accused, will deprive the court of further jurisdiction in the case, or upon another information or indictment for the same offense. It is true that the facts may furnish the accused with a good defense on the ground of former jeopardy; but whether they amount to a sufficient defense or not, either as a matter of law or of fact, is to be determined in the manner provided by law, the same as any other defense. The fact that the defense is based upon an immunity granted by the Constitution offers no valid objection to the court's jurisdiction to hear it and determine upon its sufficiency; nor is the opportunity offered to pass upon the matter incorrectly a ground for denying jurisdiction. The Constitution gives an accused the right to demand the nature and cause of the accusation against him, to have a copy thereof, to be confronted with the witnesses against him, to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses; yet it is apparent that neither the chance that the court wherein the prosecution is pending may commit error in respect to any of those matters, or an actual erroneous ruling thereon, will usually affect the jurisdiction of the court. One of the most frequent objections in a criminal prosecution is the alleged insufficiency of the indictment or information to apprise the accused of the nature and cause of the accusation. It is not, however, generally supposed that an adverse decision upon such an objection, though erroneous, takes away further jurisdiction, unless indeed the act sought to be punished constitutes no crime or offense under the law. In Ex parte Harding, 120 U. S. 782, 7 Sup. Ct. 780, 30 L. Ed. 824, it was held that a denial of the right to have compulsory process for witnesses was not a jurisdictional objection, and this is in harmony with the general run of decisions on that question. See, also, In re McKnight (C. C.) 52 Fed. 799.

The statute clearly contemplates that the trial court has jurisdiction to entertain and determine the plea of former jeopardy. It prescribes that upon arraignment the accused may offer a plea in bar that he has before had judgment of acquittal, or been convicted or been pardoned for the same offense, to which plea the prosecutor may reply that there is no record of such acquittal or conviction, or that there has been no pardon; and a trial of such issue to a jury if necessary is provided for. Rev. St. 1899, § 5331. In this case there has been no judgment of acquittal, and in such case, where the further proceedings are had upon the same information that was before the discharged jury, as well generally where the accused is held to answer upon a second trial to the same information, a formal plea in bar may, perhaps, be unnecessary, though the usual practice we think is even then for the accused to ask and be granted a right to withdraw his previous plea of not guilty and substitute the plea in bar, setting up the facts deemed to constitute former jeopardy. There is, however, authority denying the necessity of the formal plea after a disposition of one trial upon the same information or indictment under circumstances that place the accused once in jeopardy. People v. Taylor, 117 Mich. 583, 76 N. W. 158; State v. White, 71 Kan. 356, 80 Pac. 589. It is so held in the cases cited upon the ground that the proceedings relied on as constituting the former jeopardy are before the court upon its own record in the case, and that upon the question being raised the court will take cognizance of the facts so disclosed and determine their proper legal effect. The legal effect of an erroneous discharge of the jury without a verdict is neither greater nor less where the act is erroneous because void than where it is erroneous for any other reason, as, for example, where it occurs in the enforced absence of the defendant, or without allowing sufficient time for deliberation, or to accommodate the prosecution in obtaining absent testimony, if that be not permitted, or upon any ground not authorized by law. Whatever the particular imperfection in the proceeding, the only result is a condition protecting the accused against further prosecution upon the ground of former jeopardy. The most that can be said in any case as to the effect of an improper discharge of a duly sworn jury in a criminal case is that it is equivalent to a verdict of acquittal, thereby placing the accused within the protecting clause of the Constitution when confronted with a further prosecution.

The order committing the plaintiff into the custody of the sheriff was made on a lawful day of the court, subsequent to the discharge of the jury. Was it made in excess of jurisdiction? The authorities are numerous upon the subject of the effect upon the jurisdiction of the court of an erroneous discharge of a jury in criminal cases, and, with very few exceptions, the loss of jurisdiction is denied, as well as the right to have the resulting question of jeopardy determined upon habeas corpus. If the court has jurisdiction, it is evident that it is not confined in its exercise to the rendering of a correct decision. As said in Ex parte Bigelow, 113 U. S. 328, 5 Sup. Ct. 542, 28 L. Ed. 1005, in discussing the court's jurisdiction upon a claim of former jeopardy, after an alleged improper discharge of the jury pending a previous trial: "It had jurisdiction to hear the charge and the evidence against the prisoner. It had jurisdiction to hear and decide upon the defenses offered by him. The matter now presented was one of those defenses. Whether it was a sufficient defense was a matter of law on which the court must pass so far as it was purely a question of law, and on which the jury under the instruction of the court must pass if we can suppose any of the facts were such as required submission to the jury." In that case several indictments against the defendant for embezzlement had been ordered by the trial court to be consolidated for the purpose of trial. A jury was thereupon impaneled and sworn, the district attorney made a statement of his case to the jury, and the court then took a recess. Upon reconvening the court decided that the indictments could not be well tried together, and discharged the jury from further consideration of them. The prisoner was thereafter tried against his protest before the same jury upon one of the indictments, and convicted. He asked leave to file a petition for habeas corpus to obtain his discharge, upon the ground that he had been once in jeopardy with regard to all the offenses charged in the several indictments. The Supreme Court refused the writ, basing its decision upon the proposition that the trial court had not lost its jurisdiction by the discharge of the jury, and, though error may have been committed, because of the circumstances in permitting the prisoner to be convicted upon a second trial, it did not go to jurisdiction. It was further said in the opinion in that case: "If the question had been one of former acquittal (a much stronger case than this) the court would have had jurisdiction to decide upon the record whether there had been a former acquittal for the same offense, and, if the identity of the offense were in dispute, it might be necessary on such a plea to submit that question to the jury on the issue raised by the plea. The same principle would apply to a plea of former conviction. Clearly in these cases the court not only has jurisdiction to try and decide the question raised, but it is its imperative duty to do so. If the court makes a mistake on such trial, it is error which may be corrected by the usual modes of correcting such errors." In Ex parte Ulrich (C. C.) 43 Fed. 661, it was alleged that the petitioner had been placed on trial before a state court upon an indictment charging bigamy, and that, pending the trial, after the impaneling and swearing of a jury and partial examination of witnesses, the jury was discharged against the prisoner's protest, and another trial was ordered. Thereupon a writ of habeas corpus was sued out by the prisoner in the United States District Court and the same was granted. Upon appeal to the Circuit Court, the order discharging the petitioner was reversed. Circuit Judge Caldwell, in the opinion, said: "Whether the first jury was discharged without sufficient legal excuse was a mixed question of law and fact to be determined by the court, or by the court and a jury, if the facts were disputed. It is undeniable that the court had jurisdiction to determine that issue. It was the only court that had jurisdiction to determine it in the first instance; and, if it be conceded that the court decided the question erroneously, its jurisdiction over the cause was not thereby lost or in any degree impaired, and its judgment was not void, and is not open to collateral attack."

So we find it laid down as a general rule that the defense of former jeopardy or of former acquittal or conviction does not entitle the prisoner to be discharged on habeas corpus. 21 Cyc. 305, and cases cited; 9 Ency. P. & Pr. 632; Church on Hab. Corp. (2d Ed.) § 253 and note; 1 Bish. New Cr. Proc. § 821. In the section cited Mr. Bishop states that a discharge of the jury after jeopardy begun, without verdict or the prisoner's consent, operates in law as an acquittal; and on motion, without plea, he is entitled to be set at liberty, but that should the court refuse, habeas corpus will not lie.

One of the early cases on this subject frequently cited and approved is Wright v. State, 5 Ind. 290, 61 Am. Dec. 90. There it appeared that the petitioner had been put on trial upon an indictment for murder. The trial progressed until a day deemed by the court to be the expiration of the term, and, as the court was satisfied the trial would not be completed on that day, it discharged the jury over the prisoner's objections, and remanded the latter to jail to await trial at the next term. His discharge from custody under the order so committing him was denied on habeas corpus, although it was held that there was former jeopardy. The court conceded the privilege of every one conceiving himself illegally detained in custody to demand the writ of habeas corpus as a matter of right, but said that it did not follow that the court or judge before whom the cause may be brought can in all cases investigate the merits of the detention. A statute existed in Indiana to the effect that on habeas corpus the legality could not be inquired into of any judgment or process whereby the party is in custody upon a warrant issued upon an indictment or information. The court held that, as the case had not been finally disposed of, and there had not been a release of the prisoner by any judgment of the trial court, he was to be regarded as in custody under the indictment, and habeas corpus could not be employed to discharge him. The case of Wright v. State has been followed upon this point in an unbroken line of decisions in Indiana, with the single exception of the case of Maden v. Emmons, 83 Ind. 331, and that case was expressly overruled in Gillespie v. Rump, 163 Ind. 457, 72 N. E. 138. The case of Maden v. Emmons was where the jury had dispersed without rendering a verdict, upon discovering after they had retired that one of their number was not a resident of the county. The case of Gillespie v. Rump, which was an appeal from a judgment refusing discharge on habeas corpus, disclosed the following facts: After a jury had been impaneled and sworn upon the trial of the petitioner under an indictment charging the crime of murder, the submission was set aside over the objection of the accused to permit the challenge by the prosecution of one of the jurors on the ground of relationship to one of the defendants. The challenge was made and allowed, and a new juror called and sworn, all over the protests of the defendants on trial. The latter thereupon moved their discharge on the ground of jeopardy, and, it being overruled, filed a special plea in bar, which was also overruled. The trial proceeded, and resulted in a disagreement of the jury and the remanding of the prisoner for another trial. In that state of the case the writ of habeas corpus was sued out. The judgment refusing to discharge was affirmed, for the reason that the question sought to be raised could not be heard and determined on habeas corpus. The various Indiana cases are reviewed in an instructive opinion. It is true that the Indiana cases rest largely upon the provision of their statute above referred to, which, perhaps, may be regarded as more strongly prohibitive of questioning the judgment of a competent court than our own statute. It is evident, nevertheless, that the theory of the Indiana cases is opposed to the loss of jurisdiction in the trial court after an irregular or wrongful discharge of the jury. Indeed, in Gillespie v. Rump, it is stated in the opinion that the discharge of a juror and the impaneling of another in his place, even if erroneous, did not deprive the court of jurisdiction, and render the subsequent proceedings void. And it seems clear from a reading of that case that a void judgment, apparent on the record, would even under the Indiana statute be deemed ground for discharge upon habeas corpus. Ex parte Maxwell, 11 Nev. 428, was a habeas corpus case before the Supreme Court of Nevada. The petitioner claimed to be entitled to his discharge because of the discharge of the jury upon his trial after they had been out but three hours, upon the mere statement of the foreman that they were unable to agree, whereby the proceedings became equivalent to an acquittal. The court upheld the contention as to the unwarranted and illegal discharge of the jury and the effect thereof, but remanded the prisoner on the ground that the order holding him for another trial was not void, but voidable only. It was held that the right to claim former jeopardy might be waived. A statute like that in Indiana did not exist in Nevada, but the statute of the latter state was said to extend the power of the court in habeas corpus beyond that at common law. Yet it was remarked that the writ was not intended to operate or to have the force of an appellate proceeding, and that the process or authority holding the prisoner must be absolutely void, and not merely voidable, to justify a discharge upon the writ, where the detention is by virtue of legal process. That a claim of former jeopardy based upon an alleged improper discharge of the jury without verdict will not be determined on habeas corpus is also maintained in Missouri. The principle was announced in an early case where the discharge occurred in the prisoner's absence, and without his consent, after the jury had been out but a few hours (Ex parte Ruthven, 17 Mo. 541), and in another case where a verdict of guilty and fixing a punishment unsatisfactory to the court was set aside by the court on its own motion, and the prisoner held for another trial (Ex parte Snyder, 29 Mo. App. 256). Though there was a statute in Missouri somewhat like the one in Indiana, it is apparent that it was not deemed to take away the right to habeas corpus where want of jurisdiction appeared, and hence the decisions above cited may be regarded as authority, we think, upon the point that the improper discharge of a trial jury does not divest the court of jurisdiction, although it may have resulted in placing the accused in jeopardy. Indeed in State ex rel. v. Williams, 117 Mo. App. 564, 92 S. W. 151, it was held that notwithstanding a party had been in jeopardy and was entitled to be discharged on motion in the trial court, after an improper discharge of the jury pending a previous trial had occurred, yet the court retained jurisdiction, so that prohibition would not lie to restrain further proceedings. See, also, Ex parte Bedard, 106 Mo. 616, 17 S. W. 693. In Texas habeas corpus is held not the proper remedy to try the issue of former acquittal, but that the appropriate remedy is by special plea entered in the court wherein the indictment is pending, under which the party is imprisoned. Pitner v. State, 44 Tex. 578; Ex parte Crofford, 39 Tex. Cr. App. 547, 47 S. W. 533. In the Crofford case the defense was raised upon an alleged discharge of the jury in the enforced absence of the accused on trial. The court said: "This is not a novel question in Texas. Since the case of Perry v. State, 41 Tex. 488, the decisions have been uniform that the writ of habeas corpus cannot be resorted to for the purpose of discharging an applicant on a plea of former jeopardy." However, in Ex parte Davis, 89 S. W. 978, the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals had under consideration a case where it was contended that a verdict of not guilty, rendered upon a trial of the accused in one county, constituted a constitutional objection to a trial for the same offense in another county, there having been a serious question in the case as to venue. The Constitution provided that, "No person for the same offense shall be twice put in jeopardy of life or liberty; nor shall a person be again put upon trial for the same offense after a verdict of not guilty in a court of competent jurisdiction." The court regarded this provision as distinguishing between jeopardy and a verdict of not guilty in a court of competent jurisdiction, and concluded that after a verdict of not guilty the only way to avoid a second trial, if the same is being proceeded with, is to interpose the writ of habeas corpus; and it was said that the statutes and their decisions gave the court great latitude in the issuance of such writ. The other Texas cases above cited were not referred to, and the doctrine of the case last cited evidently applies only to cases where there may have been an actual verdict of acquittal. That no inquiry can be had on habeas corpus as to whether the prisoner was present or absent when the jury impaneled and sworn to try him upon an indictment had been discharged from further consideration of the case, or whether such discharge was proper or not, was held in State v. Sheriff, 24 Minn. 87. The court said: "The fact, therefore, if it be one, that the court improperly discharged the jury in the enforced absence of the prisoner, did not dispossess the court of its jurisdiction over the cause." To the same effect, where the jury was discharged for disagreement over the objection of the accused, is the case of Ex parte McLaughlin, 41 Cal. 211, 10 Am. Rep. 272. In Ex parte Hartman, 44 Cal. 32, whether an arrest of judgment upon a verdict of a less offense under an indictment charging assault with intent to murder constituted jeopardy was held to be a question not competent for consideration in an application for habeas corpus, where the accused, after the arrest of judgment, had been remanded to await the action of the next grand jury upon the charge originally preferred. In Steiner v. Nerton, 6 Wash. 23, 32 Pac. 1063, a trial jury had been discharged, the indictment quashed, and later an information filed upon which the accused was being held for trial. Claiming former jeopardy he applied for discharge on habeas corpus, but the same was denied, the court saying: "If the petitioner has been before in jeopardy for the same offense, that is a proper plea in bar to be tried by the court, and from the decision of which an appeal would lie to this court." A like conclusion was reached in the case of In re Allison, 13 Colo. 525, 22 Pac. 820, 10 L. R. A. 790, 16 Am. St. Rep. 224.

The principle under discussion is further illustrated by cases where the claim of former jeopardy has arisen out of circumstances other than the discharge of a trial jury. In a Colorado case the petitioner for habeas corpus was in jail awaiting trial on a charge of murder. He had been once tried and found guilty of manslaughter, and announced himself ready to receive sentence upon the verdict. The court declined to pass sentence, but, over the objection of the petitioner, ordered the sentence set aside, and a new trial had. A motion for the prisoner's discharge was then made on the ground of former jeopardy, and denied, and he was remanded to await trial. On petition for habeas corpus before the Supreme Court, it was held that the defense of former jeopardy could not be raised in that proceeding. It was contended by counsel that as all the facts appeared upon the record in respect to the plea it entitled the party to be heard and to be discharged in the summary proceeding. The court recited a part of the argument, and stated its conclusion as follows: "In support of this proposition they urge that in such circumstances, where the petitioner has already moved the trial court for a discharge upon the ground now urged in support of his application, he should not be subjected to another trial, or the formality of submitting to a jury undisputed questions of fact, the force and effect of which are entirely a question of law. These matters do not change the rule with respect to questions which can be inquired into on applications of this character. It has uniformly been held by this court that in habeas corpus proceedings only jurisdictional questions can be reviewed." The court, in further discussing the question, stated in substance that the trial court had not lost jurisdiction, but was authorized to hear and determine the claim of once in jeopardy, and the question whether there should be another trial, and that, though the court might decide the question erroneously, it would not be divested of jurisdiction, nor would the question be available on habeas corpus. In re Mahany, 29 Colo. 442, 68 Pac. 235. In re Terrill, 58 Kan. 815, 49 Pac. 158, was a case where a party claimed to have been in jeopardy through a former conviction which had been held void because the trial had occurred when the court was without power to sit. Being held to await another trial, he sought release on habeas corpus. It was held that the question of former jeopardy could not be determined on habeas corpus. To the same effect are the following additional cases, where the claim was made after an alleged previous conviction or acquittal: State v.

Sheriff, 45 La. Ann. 316, 12 South. 307; Com. ex rel. Norton v. Deacon, 8 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 72; People v. Ruloff, 3 Parker, Cr. R. 126; Ex parte Barnett, 51 Ark. 215, 10 S. W. 492; State v. Slatrunk, 138 Ala. 68, 35 South. 39; In re Bogart, 2 Savvy. 393, Fed. Cas. No. 1596; State v. White (Kan.) 80 Pac. 589; Miller v. Case (Kan.) 51 Pac. 922. The case of State v. White, supra, was not decided on habeas corpus, but the question of jurisdiction on a second trial was before the Supreme Court, on error, the jury having been discharged, as claimed, irregularly upon a previous trial. It was contended that, though no plea of former jeopardy had been presented, and no objection made to the second trial on that ground, the facts were in the record and showed the second trial to have been without jurisdiction. The court, however, held otherwise, expressly stating that the district court did not lose jurisdiction, and that by not having objected to the second trial on the ground of jeopardy because of the alleged improper discharge of the jury the objection had been waived. In the Pennsylvania case of Commonwealth ex rel. Norton v. Deacon, supra, the petitioners had been found not guilty on 9 counts of an indictment containing 16 counts, the verdict not referring to the remaining counts. Having been afterwards committed for trial upon the other 7 counts, the prisoners sought their discharge on habeas corpus on the ground that the verdict was in effect an acquittal on the whole indictment. The court refused to discharge for the reason that the court where the indictment was pending had jurisdiction, and if an erroneous judgment should be given the remedy would be by writ of error.

Our investigation of this question has resulted in the discovery of but three cases which appear to be flatly opposed to the principle supported by the array of authorities above cited. One of them, Ex parte Ulrich (D. C.) 42 Fed. 587, was afterwards reversed by the Circuit Court in the case of In re Ulrich (C. C.) 43 Fed. 661, above referred to. Another case, In re Bennett (D. C.) 84 Fed. 324, decided by United States District Judge De Haven, in California, holds that after the reversal of a conviction of a less offense than the one charged a sentence upon conviction of the greater offense upon the same indictment on a second trial in the same court is void in the extreme sense, as in violation of the constitutional exemption of the accused from a second jeopardy. A discharge was, however, refused in that case, for the reason that there had not been an acquittal of the less offense. Ex parte Glenn (C. C.) 111 Fed. 257, decided by District Judge Jackson, in West Virginia, holds that an accused is entitled to be discharged on habeas corpus when committed for a second trial upon an indictment after such an improper discharge of the jury at the first trial as to render the trial equivalent to an acquittal. The opinion in the Bennett Case refers to the case of In re Bigelow, 113

U. S. 328, 5 Sup. Ct. 542, 28 L. Ed. 1006, above cited, but evidently regarded it as inapplicable. The opinion in the Glenn Case does not notice the Bigelow Case, nor indeed any of the authorities laying down the same doctrine. The fact is that in the Bigelow Case the second trial had occurred in the same court upon one of the same indictments involved in the former trial; so that if the proceedings of the former trial amounted to an acquittal upon all the indictments as claimed, the fact appeared upon the record of the court in relation to the indictment under which the second trial was had. It is therefore difficult to distinguish the Bigelow Case from the Bennett and Glenn Cases. That the Bigelow Case continues to be regarded as authority by the Supreme Court upon the question thereby decided is evident from its citation and approval in two subsequent cases. In re Belt, 159 U. S. 95, 15 Sup. Ct. 987, 40 L. Ed. 88; Whitten v. Tomlinson, 160 U. S. 231, 16 Sup. Ct. 297, 40 L. Ed. 406. In the case last cited it was said with reference to a contention that there had been a previous disposition of the offense charged in another court, "whatever effect it [the other proceeding] might have, if pleaded to a subsequent indictment, affords no ground for his discharge on habeas corpus." The Supreme Court of the United States, however, has had occasion to distinguish between the case of In re Bigelow and one where, after one conviction, the accused has been again convicted upon the same indivisible act for the same offense and sentenced upon both convictions. In re Snow, 120 U. S. 274, 7 Sup. Ct. 556, 30 L. Ed. 658. In that case Snow had been charged, convicted, and sentenced upon three indictments in Utah charging the offense of unlawful cohabitation. The alleged unlawful cohabitation appeared to have been continuous, but it was divided by the prosecution and grand jury arbitrarily into three periods, and an indictment presented covering each period. After serving the sentence upon the first conviction habeas corpus was applied for. The court held that the act throughout the entire period constituted but one offense, and that one conviction and sentence for any part of the period exhausted the power of the court to punish for the offense. Hence, although the constitutional immunity relied upon was the exemption from second jeopardy, the precise ground of the decision was that the court had no jurisdiction to inflict a punishment in respect of more than one of the convictions. This case was followed by In re Hans Nielsen, 131 U. S. 176, 9 Sup. Ct. 672, 33 L. Ed. 118. The petitioner there had pleaded guilty to unlawful cohabitation, and was sentenced to pay a fine and be imprisoned in the penitentiary. After he had suffered the penalty he was put on trial for the crime of adultery with the same woman during the same period covered by the indictment for unlawful cohabitation upon which he had been punished. He was convicted over a plea of former conviction, and again sentenced to the penitentiary. It was held that there had been a double conviction and sentence for one and the same criminal act, and that the last sentence was void as beyond the jurisdiction of the court, the first sentence having exhausted the court's power in the premises. Those cases were deemed to be in line with the leading case of Ex parte Lange, 18 Wall. (U. S.) 163, 21 L. Ed. 872.

There may be cases where a prisoner has been discharged on habeas corpus on the ground of former jeopardy, where the question of the right to the writ under the circumstances was not raised. They might be persuasive, but hardly controlling authority where the objection to the use of the writ in such cases is presented. Such a case apparently is State v. Blevins, 134 Ala. 213, 32 South. 637, 92 Am. St. Rep. 22. In that case, however, upon a trial for assault and battery, the court, instead of pronouncing judgment on the charge which was tried, found that the accused was guilty of another crime, viz., assault with intent to ravish the complaining witness, and thereupon bound the accused over for his appearance to answer to the latter charge. It might well be held that the court exceeded its jurisdiction in the premises, although the opinion in the case seems to put the discharge upon the ground of former jeopardy. In view of the facts in the case it appears to be distinguishable from the case at bar and other like cases.

The main reliance of the plaintiff is upon the Oregon case of In re Tice, 32 Or. 179, 49 Pac. 1038, which, upon the facts, more nearly resembles the case before us than any other coming to our notice. In that case the jury was discharged for disagreement on Sunday, and on the same day the defendant was ordered committed pending a retrial. The fact that the committing order was made on Sunday may distinguish that case from the one here. But the court in that case, while apparently not questioning the general rule that an improper discharge of a jury would not ordinarily deprive the court of further jurisdiction, held that the order of discharge on Sunday being a void act, habeas corpus became a proper remedy for the prisoner's discharge. One of the cases cited by the court in support of its conclusion is Maden v. Emons, 83 Ind. 331, which has since been overruled in Indiana, as above noted. The case of State v. McGimsey, 80 N. C. 377, 30 Am. Rep. 90, also cited, was not a habeas corpus case, but was before the appellate court on certiorari, and that was held a proper remedy for the review of the error complained of in the exercise by the court below of its jurisdiction. The case of Ex parte White, 15 Nev. 146, 37 Am. Rep. 406, which is also cited, depended upon the application of a different principle. There a magistrate had on Sunday received a plea of guilty and entered a sentence of imprisonment. Under such a condition the accused was clearly held under a void judgment, assuming that the court was not authorized to sit or render judgment on Sunday. Notwithstanding that the Oregon court, for whose opinions we entertain great respect, seems to distinguish the discharge of a jury upon a nonjudicial day from a discharge upon a lawful day for an improper or unauthorized reason in its effect upon the jurisdiction of the court, we think that the case cited is out of harmony with the general line of decisions respecting the jurisdictional consequences of an unnecessary or irregular discharge of a jury on a criminal trial.

We are unable to agree with the reasoning and conclusion of the Oregon case that a void act discharging the jury operates to divest the court of further jurisdiction in the case. As previously suggested, whether the discharge be a void act, because occurring on a nonjudicial day, or improper or unauthorized for any other reason, the trial, through the irregular or unauthorized act, will have come to a close without a verdict, so that, if the act of discharging the jury be held to have been unauthorized and not to have been waived by any act or conduct of the defendant, if a waivable matter, the latter will have been in jeopardy. By such erroneous procedure, however, the court does not divest itself of jurisdiction to hear and determine any further motions, pleas, or other applications that may be presented in the case, and even to hold another trial of the case if a plea of former jeopardy should be heard and overruled, although in doing so grave error may be committed. Suppose it to be conceded that the act of the court in discharging the jury was absolutely void; the prisoner is not held under that order, any more than if he should be held under a warrant of arrest or commitment upon a new information. The old information is still pending and undisposed of, and the plaintiff's commitment is for trial thereon. She has already submitted a plea of some kind in bar of another trial, and that plea has been overruled. Let it be assumed that she interposed in defense of the pending charge the former proceedings, or that she will do so; if it be true that those proceedings amounted to an acquittal, then her plea ought to be sustained, and the court has erred or may err in otherwise disposing of it. But the jurisdiction of the court to hear and determine the plea is clear, it seems to us; and the error, if any, in such determination, may be reviewed and corrected before the proper court in the mode pointed out by law. It ought not to be considered on habeas corpus, in which proceeding this court has no greater authority than a single justice or a district judge would have upon a similar application. We are of the opinion that, though it is possible that the court may have erred, its act in committing the plaintiff was within the legitimate province of the court while acting in a lawful manner, and, by express command of the statute, it is not permissible in this proceeding to question the correctness of the committing order.

For the above reasons, we think it not only unnecessary, but improper, to consider the other questions presented, and we are constrained to refuse to discharge the plaintiff from the custody of the sheriff.

CARLSON et ux. v. CURREN et al.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Jan. 15, 1908.)

1. APPEAL—NOTICE—SUFFICIENCY.

Notice of appeal, given in open court at the time the court signs a judgment of dismissal, and regularly entered by the clerk on the court journal under the judge's direction, is sufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 2, Appeal and Error, § 2101.]

2. QUIETING TITLE—EQUITABLE OWNER OUT OF POSSESSION.

Where one out of possession of land claims it by an equitable title against one in possession, he need not bring ejectment, but may sue to quiet title.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 41, Quieting Title, § 55.]

3. EJECTMENT—PARTIES—JOINER OF DEFENDANTS.

In ejectment at common law, a plaintiff was not bound to bring separate suits against separate trespassers on his single separate estate, but might sue them in a single action.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 17, Ejectment, § 140.]

4. QUIETING TITLE—PROCEEDINGS—JOINING ADVERSE CLAIMANTS AS DEFENDANTS.

In an action to quiet title, or to determine the rights of adverse claimants, plaintiff may make all the adverse claimants defendants, even though there be no privity or connection between them.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 41, Quieting Title, § 65.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Pierce County; W. O. Chapman, Judge.

Action by Levin Carlson and wife against J. C. Curren and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

See 85 Pac. 627.

Boyle & Warburton, for appellants. T. W. Hammond, for respondents.

FULLERTON, J. The appellants purchased certain lots situated in the city of Tacoma which were sold by the county of Pierce under a judgment entered in a tax foreclosure proceeding, receiving a deed for the property in due course. At the time of the sale the respondents J. C. and Mary Curren were in possession of a part of one of the lots, claiming to hold as tenants of some third person. After the delivery of the tax deed the appellants entered into possession of all that portion of the lots not in possession of Curren and wife, whereupon Curren laid claim to the whole of the premises adverse to the appellants. The other respondents also laid claim to interests in the property adverse to the appellants. The appellants thereupon brought this action to quiet their title against the claims of all of the appellants and to recover that portion of the lots in possession of the respondents Curren. In their complaint the appellants set up the nature of their estate, alleging that they were owners in fee simple of the premises by virtue of the tax foreclosure proceedings and the sale thereunder and the deed executed in pursuance thereof; that the respondents Curren were in possession of a part of the premises, and claimed the whole of the same adversely to the appellants; that the other respondents also claimed some interests in the premises adverse to the appellants, but that the claim of each and all of the respondents were without right, as neither of them had any right, title, or interest therein whatsoever. The prayer of the complaint was that the appellants be adjudged to be the owners in fee simple of the premises, and their title quieted against the claims of each and all of the defendants, and that they recover possession of the whole of the premises, and the respondents Curren be ejected therefrom. A demurrer was interposed to the complaint upon the statutory grounds: (1) That several causes of action had been improperly united; and (2) that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The demurrer came on for hearing before the superior court on March 2, 1907, and was, after argument, sustained. On April 15th thereafter the appellants gave notice that they elected to stand on their complaint, and declined to amend, whereupon the court entered judgment dismissing the action. From the judgment so entered, this appeal is taken.

The appellants move to dismiss the appeal for the reason that no sufficient notice of appeal was given. The notice of appeal was given in open court at the time the court signed the judgment of dismissal, and was regularly entered by the clerk on the journal of the court under the direction of the judge. This was in strict compliance with the statute, and sufficient notice to perfect the appeal. We have not overlooked the contention of the respondents, made in their briefs, to the effect that the judgment was entered in their absence and without their knowledge, but this fact does not appear on the face of the record. On the contrary, the judgment on its face is regular, and if it fails to recite the facts truly, the remedy must be found in some other proceeding than a motion to dismiss the appeal. The motion is denied.

The trial judge sustained the demurrer to the complaint on the ground that several causes of action had been improperly united. He seems to have taken the view that, since the respondents Curren were in possession of a part of the land, a different form of action was required to determine their rights than was required to determine the rights of the other adverse claimants, all of whom were out of possession; that the remedy against the first was ejectment to recover the possession, while an equitable action to quiet title was the remedy against those out of possession. This view of the remedies afforded a claimant in the situation that these plaintiffs found themselves unquestionably finds support in the decisions of this court as they stood at the time the judgment appealed from in this action was rendered. In the early case of Spithill v. Jones, 3 Wash. 290, 28 Pac. 531, and many subsequent cases, notably Reichenback v. Washington, etc., Ry. Co., 10 Wash. 357, 38 Pac. 1126, Krutz v. Isaacs, 25 Wash. 566, 66 Pac. 141, and Povah v. Lee, 29 Wash. 108, 69 Pac. 639, we held that the remedy against one in possession of land was ejectment, since any other remedy would deprive the party in possession of his right of trial by jury. But these cases were overruled on that point in the recent case of Brown v. Baldwin (Wash.) 89 Pac. 483. In the last-cited case we held that one out of possession, claiming land by an equitable title, could maintain an action to quiet title against one in possession, and that in such an action full and adequate relief will be granted even to the extent of awarding possession, if such an award be necessary. It was not, of course, there decided that all actions to recover real property were actions of equitable cognizance and triable as such (on the contrary, actions to recover real property, which present purely legal controversies, are still triable as actions at law); but it was decided that, where the claimant's rights were of an equitable nature, he need not resort to the fiction of ejectment and have his case presented to a jury merely because the defendant was in possession of the property. There is therefore no objection to the form of the remedy sought by the appellants.

Nor is the complaint demurrable on the ground of misjoinder of defendants. In actions of ejectment at common law the plaintiff was not bound to bring separate actions against separate trespassers who had intruded upon his single, separate estate. As to him they were all wrongdoers, and he could not know how they claimed, whether jointly or severally, and if severally, how much each one claimed. Each defendant, of course, had the right to defend for his several portion, and by doing so necessarily disclaimed as to the residue, but this fact did not entitle such defendant to a separate trial, nor did it make the action multifarious. Greer et al. v. Mezes et al., 24 How. (U. S.) 268, 16 L. Ed. 661. The same rule applies to actions brought to determine the rights of adverse claimants, or actions to quiet title. The plaintiff may make all of the adverse claimants defendants, even though there should be no privity or connection between them. As was said in Kincaid, etc.,

v. McGowan, etc., 88 Ky. 91, 4 S. W. 806, 13 L. R. A. 289: " * * * It seems clear that in an equitable action to quiet the title to land, independently of the statutory authority, all of the adverse claimants, whether by independent titles or not, may be joined as defendants. Indeed, as the object to be accomplished is the putting of all litigation about the title to rest, it is not only desirable, but proper, to make all adverse claimants defendants." See, also, Stemmler v. McNeill (C. C.) 102 Fed. 660; Pomeroy's Remedies, § 869 et seq.; 15 Cyc. 83; 17 Ency. Pl. & Pr. 323.

We conclude, therefore, that the trial court erred in sustaining the demurrer. The judgment appealed from is reversed and remanded, with instructions to reinstate the case and overrule the demurrer.

BROWN et al. v. TRIMBLE et al.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Jan. 15, 1908.)

MECHANIC'S LIEN—AMENDMENT OF NOTICE—STATUTORY PROVISIONS — "BY ORDER OF COURT"—SUFFICIENCY OF ORDER.

Where a mechanic's lien does not sufficiently describe the property, and leave to amend a complaint to foreclose the lien is granted upon sustaining a demurrer thereto, the filing of a new notice or amendment of the old one is not "by order of the court," within Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. § 5904, providing that a claim of lien may be amended in an action to foreclose same by order of court, as pleadings may be, etc., so that the filing of a new lien notice after the time for filing had expired would be of no force.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kitsap County; John B. Yakey, Judge.

Action by G. H. Brown and others against W. B. Trimble and others to foreclose a mechanic's lien. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Frank B. Sayre, for appellants. John G. Barnes, for respondents.

MOUNT, J. The appellants brought this action to foreclose a lien for a balance alleged to be due for plumbing and materials used in the construction of a certain building. The lien notice described the premises as follows: "That certain building or structure situate upon the following described property, to wit: Blake Island in the county of Kitsap, state of Washington." The defendants filed a general demurrer to the complaint. This demurrer was sustained upon the ground that the description of the premises upon which the lien was sought to be foreclosed was not sufficiently definite; it being conceded that Blake Island was composed of some 400 or 500 acres of land, all of which was not owned by the defendants. Leave was thereupon granted to the plaintiffs to amend the complaint. Subsequently, on February 5, 1906, plaintiffs filed with the county auditor of Kitsap county another lien notice. Thereupon the plaintiffs filed what was termed an "amended complaint," setting up this last-mentioned lien notice, and praying foreclosure thereof for a balance alleged to be due. The respondents filed an answer, denying generally all the allegations of the complaint. The cause then came on for trial. The plaintiffs offered in evidence the last-named lien notice, which showed upon its face that the last services and materials were furnished on May 13, 1905, and that the lien notice was not filed until February 5, 1906, more than eight months intervening between the date of the last labor and materials furnished and the date of the filing of the lien notice. On objection the court excluded this evidence. The statute requires the lien notice to be filed within 90 days from the date of the cessation of labor or the furnishing of materials. Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. § 5904.

Appellants contend that the notice in this case was an amended notice, and that the court should have received the same in evidence under the provisions of the same section, as follows: "And such claim of lien may be amended in case of action brought to foreclose the same by order of the court, as pleadings may be in so far as third parties shall not be affected by such amendment." Conceding, without deciding, that an amendment to a lien notice may be made after the expiration of the 90-day period, the amendment of the lien notice in this case, if the notice last filed may be said to be an amendment, was not filed or amended by order of the court. Permission to amend the complaint did not authorize the appellants to file a new lien notice, or even to amend the original lien notice. If the appellants desired to amend the lien notice, as well as the complaint, the application and order therefor should have so stated. Not having done so, we think the trial court was right in treating the subsequent lien notice as an original notice which was filed out of time, and therefore of no force.

It is not necessary to discuss other points in the case. The judgment must therefore be affirmed.

HADLEY, C. J., and CROW, RUDKIN, and FULLERTON, JJ., concur. DUNBAR and ROOT, JJ., took no part.

STATE v. CONSTANTINE

(Supreme Court of Washington. Jan. 9, 1908.)

1. WITNESSES — CREDIBILITY — INTEREST OR BIAS—EVIDENCE.

In a prosecution for assault with intent to murder, the fact that a civil action had been begun by the complaining witness against defendant for injuries on account of the assault was material on the question of the credibility of such witness, as it tended to show that he had more than usual interest in the result of the prosecution; but, that fact being shown, the complaint in such action was properly excluded, since its introduction could add nothing to the proofs.

2. CRIMINAL LAW—EVIDENCE—PRESUMPTIONS—SUPPRESSION OR SPOILIATION OF EVIDENCE.

In both civil and criminal causes a party's fraud in the preparation or presentation of his case, such as the suppression or attempt to suppress evidence by the bribery of witnesses, or the spoliation of documents, can be shown against him as a circumstance tending to prove that his cause lacks honesty and truth.

3. WITNESSES—CONTRADICTION—TESTIMONY TO MATERIAL FACT.

In a prosecution for assault with intent to murder, where the complaining witness testified that after he had begun a civil action against defendant for injuries on account of the assault, and after the commencement of the prosecution, a doctor representing defendant approached him, and offered to pay his hospital and medical fees, and for a trip to California, and give him "a bunch of money," if he would abandon the civil action and not appear against defendant in the prosecution, it was erroneous to reject defendant's offer to prove by the doctor that he had never at any time made any such proposition to the complaining witness; since, the latter's evidence being material, it was competent to contradict it.

4. SAME—LAYING FOUNDATION FOR CONTRADICTION.

In such a case it is not necessary, before contradicting the evidence of the complaining witness, to lay a foundation for impeachment, since, where a witness testifies to a material matter as a fact, he can be impeached by merely showing that the matter testified to is untrue.

5. CRIMINAL LAW—EVIDENCE—INSANITY.

In a criminal prosecution, the defense being insanity, a witness for defendant was asked by the state as to certain remarks defendant made to his daughter at the jail. Held that, on redirect examination, it was competent for such witness to state what the daughter said to defendant just preceding such remarks, since such evidence would show at least whether defendant's remarks were responsive or otherwise to the daughter's statements; thus indicating in some degree rationality or irrationality.

6. SAME—OPINION EVIDENCE—MENTAL CONDITION.

In a criminal prosecution, the defense being insanity, a witness, in response to the court's inquiry, "Was he sane or insane?" replied: "I am not an expert. I cannot say whether a man is sane or insane. His mind was disordered, I should say." Held, that it was erroneous to strike out such answer, since a nonexpert witness may give his opinion as to the mental condition of the defendant in his own language.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 14, Criminal Law, § 1045.]

7. SAME—INSANITY.

In a prosecution for an assault by defendant on his son-in-law, the defense being insanity, caused by defendant's daughter's recital to him of the acts of cruelty she suffered at the hands of her husband, it was erroneous, after the daughter had testified as to what she told her father two days before the assault, and his appearance during the recital, to exclude a question whether this was the first time she complained to defendant about the trouble existing between herself and husband, since such testimony would have aided the jury somewhat in determining whether defendant's mind was unbalanced at the time when he committed the assault.

8. SAME.

In a prosecution for an assault by defendant on his son-in-law, the defense was insanity, caused by defendant's daughter's recital to him of the acts of cruelty she suffered at the hands of her husband. Defendant, preceding the assault, went to an attorney's office for advice as to a divorce for his daughter. He was allowed to state what he did and said while consulting the attorney. Held, that what the attorney said to defendant should also have been admitted, since the purpose of this evidence, to show defendant's mental condition at the time, would have been better accomplished by submitting the entire conversation.

9. WITNESSES—CONTRADICTION—CORROBORATION OF IMPEACHED OR CONTRADICTED WITNESS.

In a prosecution for assault with intent to murder, defendant, on cross-examination, was asked if he had not ordered his servant to buy him a pistol, saying he intended to kill the assaulted party, to which he replied in the negative. A witness for the state then testified that such occurrences took place. Held, that it was erroneous to reject defendant's offer to show by other witnesses that such occurrences never happened, since defendant had the right to offer evidence in support of his answer after the state had impeached it, and, such evidence being a part of the state's case in chief, he had the right to contradict it.

Appeal from Superior Court, King County; Geo. E. Morris, Judge.

William Constantine was convicted of a crime, and he appeals. Reversed, and new trial granted.

Morris, Southard & Shipley, for appellant. Kenneth Mackintosh and John F. Miller, for the State.

FULLERTON, J. William Constantine was informed against by the prosecuting attorney of King county for the crime of assault with intent to murder, committed with a revolver on the person of one Jesse M. Hall. To the information he pleaded not guilty, and on the issue thus made was tried by a jury, which returned a verdict finding him "guilty of assault with a deadly weapon with intent to do bodily harm." On this verdict he was adjudged guilty by the court of the crime defined by section 7058 of the Code (Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St.), and sentenced to a term of one year in the state penitentiary and to pay a fine of $5,000. From the judgment and sentence, he appeals.

The errors assigned are based wholly upon rulings of the court made in passing upon objections to the admission of evidence. These we will proceed to notice in their order.

When the complaining witness, Jesse M. Hall, was on the witness stand, he was questioned on cross-examination concerning a civil action he had commenced against the appellant to recover damages for injuries suffered on account of the shooting. In the course of the inquiry the complaint itself was offered in evidence, and, on an objection made on the part of the state, was excluded by the court. This ruling constitutes the first error assigned. But we think the ruling correct. The fact that such a civil action had been begun was material on the question of the credibility of the witness, as it tended to show that he had more than the usual interest in the result of the criminal prosecution against the appellant, but all that was material was proven when the fact itself was admitted by the witness. It could add nothing to the proofs to introduce the complaint.

The witness Hall further testified in answer to questions propounded to him by the state that, after the institution of the civil action and the commencement of the criminal prosecution, certain persons (referred to as the appellant's "emissaries" by the state's counsel) purporting to represent the appellant had approached him, and offered to pay the hospital and medical fees he had incurred on account of his injuries, pay for a trip to California or some other place that he might designate, and give him "a bunch of money besides," if he would abandon further prosecution of the civil action, and not appear as a witness against the appellant in the criminal proceeding. On cross-examination he was questioned further concerning these proposals, and stated that one of the persons who approached him was a certain doctor, whom he named. As a part of his defense the appellant produced this doctor, and sought to question him concerning the transaction, asking him, among other things, if he had ever made such a proposition to Hall as had been testified to by Hall while on the witness stand. To this inquiry an objection was interposed and sustained. The appellant thereupon offered to prove by the witness that he had never at any time, either as the representative of the appellant or otherwise, made any such proposition to the witness Hall as had been testified to by Hall. This offer, also, the court rejected. The rulings of the court rejecting this evidence is the second error assigned. The state in its brief seeks to justify the exclusion of this evidence on two grounds: First, that the fact testified to by Hall was a collateral and immaterial matter in itself, and could not be made the basis of contradictory evidence, since the rule is that a witness cannot be contradicted on testimony he may give that is foreign to the issues, even though he testified untruthfully in regard thereto; and, second, that the questions put to the doctor called for evidence tending to impeach Hall, and no proper ground was laid in the examination of Hall for impeaching him. The first ground stated clearly mistakes the law. It is a rule of evidence, as old as the law itself, applicable alike to both civil and criminal causes, that a party's fraud in the preparation or presentation of his case, such as the suppression or attempt to suppress evidence by the bribery of witnesses or the spoliation of documents, can be shown against him as a circumstance tending to prove that his cause lacks honesty and truth. Carpenter v. Willey, 65 Vt. 168, 26 Atl. 488; Chicago City Ry. Co. v. McMahon, 103 Ill. 485, 42 Am. Rep. 29; Houser v. Austin, 2 Idaho, 204, 10 Pac. 37; Cruikshank v. Gordon, 118 N. Y.

178, 23 N. E. 457; Waterhouse v. Rock Island Alaska Min. Co., 97 Fed. 466, 38 C. C. A. 281; Graves v. United States, 150 U. S. 118, 14 Sup. Ct. 40, 37 L. Ed. 1021; Rice v. Commonwealth, 102 Pa. 408; People v. Chin Hane, 108 Cal. 597, 41 Pac. 697; State v. Hogan, 67 Conn. 581, 35 Atl. 508; Keesler v. State, 154 Ind. 242, 56 N. E. 232; State v. Rozum, 8 N. D. 548, 80 N. W. 477; State v. Roller, 30 Wash. 692, 71 Pac. 718. In the last cited case this court held that a letter of the defendant, who was under arrest for incest, addressed to his son, requesting the son to persuade the prosecuting witness not to testify against him, was evidence corroborative of other evidence tending to show guilt. The rule that permits acts of this character to be shown in evidence has its foundation in human experience. This experience has demonstrated that men who have meritorious causes do not generally resort to bribery and spoliation to maintain them, but that such conduct is the resort of those who are conscious that the truth, if all is told, will not aid them. In this case this evidence was particularly persuasive. The defense attempted to be maintained was temporary insanity. Manifestly, if the defense was entered upon in good faith, nothing the prosecuting witness could truthfully testify to would be more effective as evidence than the statements of other persons who had an opportunity to observe the defendant's conduct and his condition of mind. The inference is strong, therefore, that the desire to suppress his testimony, if such desire existed, arose from other feelings than consciousness of merit in the defense attempted. The testimony being material, it was, of course, competent to contradict it. It was proper, also, to contradict it in the manner the defense attempted to contradict it. The witness testified to a fact which tended to establish the substance of the issue. It was competent, therefore, for the opposing party to dispute the fact by evidence to the contrary. While the evidence did tend to impeach the prosecuting witness in a sense—that is, it tended to show that he had testified untruthfully—yet it was not that form of impeachment that requires any particular question to be put to him before the impeaching evidence can be introduced. That condition arises only where it is sought to impeach the witness by showing that he has made contradictory statements at some other time and place. In the latter case, it is necessary, before the impeaching evidence can be introduced, to call the witness' attention to the contradictory statements, the time when and place where they were made, the circumstances surrounding their making, and give him an opportunity to deny, admit, or explain them. But, where the witness testifies to a material matter as a fact, he can be impeached by merely showing that the matter testified to is untrue. It was prejudicial error, therefore, for the court to exclude this evidence.

Mr. Vince H. Fabin, called as a witness on behalf of the appellant, after testifying to the appellant's mental condition immediately following the shooting as he observed it, said that he accompanied the appellant's wife and daughter to the jail shortly after the appellant was arrested and placed therein. On cross-examination he was asked concerning the appellant's conduct when his wife and daughter came to him at the jail, and as to certain remarks the appellant made to his daughter at that time. On redirect examination he was asked to state what the daughter said to her father just preceding the statement which the father made, and which he had repeated to the jury. To this question an objection was interposed, and sustained by the court. This was a proper question, and the witness should have been permitted to answer it. The matter under investigation was the condition of mind of the appellant at that time. The state sought to show that his mind was then rational by showing a particular statement made by him to the daughter which tended to indicate rationality. The appellant was entitled, therefore, to place before the jury such part of the entire occurrence as would in any way tend to aid the jury in arriving at the true condition of mind of the appellant. The fact called for would have been of some aid. It would have shown at least whether it was responsive or otherwise to the daughter's statement, and thus indicated in some degree either rationality or irrationality. Since the appellant did not indicate in the record what he expected this evidence to show, this error would not require reversal if standing alone. It is discussed and determined because a new trial must be awarded, and the same question will probably again recur.

In the examination of Mr. W. W. Wilshire the following appears: "The Court: Was he sane or insane [meaning the defendant]? The Witness: I am not an expert. I cannot say whether a man is sane or insane. His mind was disordered, I should say. Counsel for the State: Objected to, and move that it be stricken. The Court: The objection will be sustained." The answer should have been allowed to stand as part of the evidence for the consideration of the jury. A nonexpert witness may give his opinion as to the mental condition of a defendant whose mental condition is the subject of inquiry in his own language. He need not use the words "sane" or "insane" in describing that condition if he thinks some other form of words will more nearly express his ideas.

The prosecuting witness was the son-in-law of the appellant. He had married the appellant's daughter some six months before the shooting occurred. Immediately after their marriage the young couple took up their residence at Butte, Mont. The prosecuting witness did not succeed financially, and the appellant brought the couple to his own home in Seattle, and started his son-in-law in business in that city. On Saturday evening preceding the Tuesday on which the shooting occurred the daughter came to the father's place of business in a very agitated condition of mind, and in answer to her father's inquiries as to the cause of her agitation made some complaint against her husband, declaring that she could no longer live with him. The father soothed her as best he could, and later on accompanied her home. On the next day, two days preceding the shooting, he went riding with her, and while so riding undertook to reconcile her to her husband. The daughter, apparently in justification of her conduct, related to him some of the acts of cruelty her husband had been guilty of towards her while they were residing in Butte, telling him, also, when he expressed the belief that the difficulties she had recited could be overcome, that there were other things, which shame forbade her telling him, which made it impossible for her to live longer with her husband. It was this recital of his daughter, with some additional particulars which were related to him the next morning, that it is asserted unsettled his reason, and caused him to make the assault complained of. The appellant undertook to prove these facts by the daughter herself. While on the witness stand, she testified to the occurrences, and to the appellant's appearance and conduct during the time she related them to him. She was then asked by counsel if this was the first time she had ever made complaint to her father about the trouble existing between herself and her husband. To this question an objection was interposed and sustained. The court should have permitted the witness to answer. It would have aided the jury somewhat, we think, in determining whether the appellant's mind was unbalanced at the time he committed the act for which he was being tried to know when he was first made acquainted with the fact that the prosecuting witness had been guilty of wrongs towards his daughter. The appellant on the morning of the shooting and preceding that event when to the office of a Mr. Fabin an attorney to consult with the attorney concerning the procurement of a divorce for his daughter. While on the witness stand as a witness in his own behalf, he was allowed to state what he did and said while consulting with the attorney, but was not permitted to relate what the attorney said to him. There would seem to be no valid reason for this distinction. The evidence was admissible, if it was admissible at all, on the principle that it tended to show the then physical and mental condition of the appellant. Surely this purpose would have been accomplished much better by showing this entire transaction as it occurred than by the halting effort made by the witness in his endeavor to segregate his part of the conversation from that of the person with whom he was conversing. On cross-examination the appellant was asked the following question: "Now Mr. Constantine, I will ask you this question, if on Tuesday morning, the 2d day of October, at about from 8 to 20 minutes after 8 in the morning, you did not come into your meat market and go to your bookkeeper, and say to him, substantially, 'Can you run this business for a day or two, if I am not here?' and he says, 'Yes, I think so' and you said, 'I don't want you to think, I want to know if you can,' and he says, 'Yes.' You then gave your bookkeeper, Ira Williams, $20 in gold coin, and you told him, 'Go and get me an automatic pistol, and I will kill that son of a bitch,' and that took place in the presence of Henry Weber and you and Mr. Williams there in your place on that occasion?" To the question he answered, "No, sir." In rebuttal the state put a witness on the stand who testified that the occurrences recited in the question took place substantially as therein related. The appellant thereupon sought to show by the witnesses Hardy and Williams that nothing occurred at the time in question such as the question implied and the state's witness related. An objection was interposed and sustained to this offer of proof, to which the appellant excepted. The court seems to have sustained the objection on the theory that the question asked was an impeaching question, on which the appellant could offer no other evidence than his own statement, and that he could only admit or deny the accusation. But such is not the rule. Conceding that the question was an impeaching question and proper as such, the appellant had the right to offer evidence in support of his answer after the state had impeached it, and the court improperly sustained objections to the evidence offered even on that theory. But the question was not properly an impeaching question. The question called for substantive evidence tending directly to support the issue between the state and the appellant, and should have introduced as a part of the state's case in chief, so that the defendant could have met it when presenting his side of the case. The evidence being, therefore, a part of the state's case in chief, it was error not to permit the appellant to contradict it.

For the errors noted, the judgment appealed from is reversed, and a new trial granted.

(48 Wash. 272)

FOLEY v. McDONNELL.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Jan. 15, 1908.)

1. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—ACTIONS ON CLAIMS—PRIOR PRESENTMENT FOR ALLOWANCE.

Under the express provisions of Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. § 6235, no action shall be brought against an estate, unless the claim shall have first been presented to the executor or administrator.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 22, Executors and Administrators, §§ 764-766.]

2. SAME—ALLOWANCE OF CLAIMS—PRESENTATION.

Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. § 6196, provides that in cases of nonintervention wills the claims against the estate shall be paid within one year from the date of the first publication of notice to creditors to present their claims, etc. Section 6199a provides that upon publication of notice to creditors to present their claims to the executor of a nonintervention will, for a period of time and in the manner required of executors and administrators holding letters testamentary and of administration, the creditors must present their claims to the executor within one year from the date of the first publication of notice, or they will be barred. Held that, in the case of a nonintervention will, creditors must present their claims within one year of the publication of notice, or their claims are barred, as in other classes of wills.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 22, Executors and Administrators, §§ 780-805.]

3. WILLS—CONSTRUCTION—TRUST FOR BENEFIT OF CREDITORS.

Where a nonintervention will makes the executrix trustee of the estate for the purpose of paying creditors, only such creditors are meant as qualify by proving their claims within time, as in other estates, and thereby make themselves beneficiaries of the trust.

4. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—ACTIONS AGAINST EXECUTORS—FAILURE TO PRESENT CLAIM—PRESUMPTION.

In an action brought by a creditor against an estate more than five years after testator's death, where the complaint shows no cause for the delay, and does not allege that notice to creditors to present their claims was not published, it will be presumed that the executrix performed her duty by seasonably publishing the notice, thereby barring the action one year thereafter.

Appeal from Superior Court, Clarke County; W. W. McCredie, Judge.

Action by James Foley against Margaret McDonnell. From an order dismissing the complaint on demurrer, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Thos. O'Day and G. R. Percival, for appellant. Milton W. Smith, for respondent.

MOUNT, J. The lower court sustained a demurrer to the complaint in this case. Plaintiff refused to amend, and an order of dismissal was entered. Plaintiff appeals from that order.

The complaint, in substance, alleges: That on April 21, 1896, plaintiff obtained a judgment against Columbus McDonnell for the sum of $958.62, besides attorney's fees and costs, upon a promissory note. That said judgment was obtained in the state of Oregon after personal service upon said Columbus McDonnell. That subsequently execution was issued in Oregon and returned nulla bona. That at the time said judgment was rendered the said Columbus McDonnell was alive, and that the defendant in this action was his wife. That afterwards, on the 12th day of March, 1901, said Columbus McDonnell, being then the owner of a large amount of property situate in Clarke county in this state, made his will, which, omitting formal parts, is as follows:

"(1) I direct that my just debts and funeral expenses be first paid out of my estate.

"(2) I give and bequeath unto my executrix hereinafter named all my property, both real and personal, wherever situated, in trust for the purposes herein set forth.

"(3) I give, devise, and bequeath unto my beloved wife, Margaret McDonnell, all my property of every kind and nature, real, personal, and mixed, wherever situated.

"(4) I do not give, devise or bequeath anything to my children * * * knowing that my wife will make such provisions for them as will be right and just.

"(5) I hereby nominate, constitute and appoint my wife, Margaret McDonnell the executrix of this my last will and testament, and I direct that no bonds will be required of her, and she is hereby authorized and empowered to sell and dispose of at private sale or otherwise and in any way she shall deem best any or all of my property, both real and personal, without the intervention of any court, and I hereby revoke all former wills and codicils to wills by me made.

"In witness whereof," etc.

That thereafter, on April 29, 1901, said Columbus McDonnell died in Clarke county, Wash., seised of and owning certain property described. That on May 25, 1901, said will was duly probated in Clarke county, Wash., and the defendant herein, Margaret McDonnell, was appointed executrix and accepted the trust, took possession of all of said property, and now holds and claims the same as executrix, legatee, and trustee under such will. That said property is of the value of $30,000, and passed to defendant by the terms of the will, in trust for the benefit of creditors of said Columbus McDonnell, deceased. That plaintiff is one of such creditors, and that the said estate is solvent, and that there is now more than sufficient to pay all the creditors thereof. That defendant has been requested to pay the plaintiff the amount due upon the said judgment, but has failed and refused to do so. That Columbus McDonnell, deceased, left no property in the state of Oregon, and plaintiff has no plain, speedy, and adequate remedy at law for the recovery of the amount due on said judgment, and applies to the court to compel the defendant to execute the trust, which she is required to do under said will.

It is contended by the respondent that the action is barred under the statute. It will be noticed that there is no allegation that any claim was ever presented to the executrix and allowed as a claim against the estate, or that no notice to creditors was published as required by law. If the action was brought against the defendant as administratrix or executrix of the estate of Columbus McDonnell, deceased, the complaint must show that the claim was first presented to the executor or administrator in order to state a cause of action. Section 6235, Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St.; McFarland v. Fairlamb, 18 Wash. 601, 52 Pac. 239.

The appellant argues that the will above set out makes the defendant a trustee of an express trust, and that, inasmuch as the will is a nonintervention will, it was not necessary for the plaintiff to present a claim to the executrix or trustee within one year or at all, because the statute of limitations has no application as between the cestui que trust and the trustee of an express trust. The statute relating to nonintervention wills provides: "In all cases where it is provided in the last will and testament of the deceased that the estate shall be settled in a manner provided in such last will and testament, and that letters testamentary or of administration shall not be required, and where it also duly appears to the court, by the inventory filed, and other proof, that the estate is fully solvent, * * * it shall not be necessary to take out letters testamentary or of administration, except to admit to probate such will. * * * And after the probate of such will and the filing of such inventory all such estates may be managed and settled without the intervention of the court." Section 6196, Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. It will be noticed that the will in this case does not provide that letters testamentary or of administration shall not be required. It does, however, provide that the executrix shall sell and dispose of all the property as she may deem best without the intervention of any court. Conceding, however, that this will was intended to be, and is, a nonintervention will, still the statute in the same section provides: "That in all such cases the claims against such estates shall be paid within one year from the date of the first publication of notice to creditors to present their claims, unless such time be extended by the court for good cause shown, for a reasonable time." And section 6199a, Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St., provides: "Upon a publication of notice to creditors to present their claims to such executor, for a period of time and in the manner required of executors and of administrators holding letters testamentary and of administration under the laws of this state, said creditors shall be required to present their claims to the said executor within one year from the date of the first publication of said notice, and if they fail to do so their claim shall be barred." These two provisions last above quoted seem to make it clear that in cases of nonintervention wills creditors shall present their claims within one year of the publication of notice, and failure so to do bars such claim the same as in other classes of wills. It is true this court held otherwise in Moore v. Kirkman, 19 Wash. 605, 54 Pac. 24, and possibly in other cases. But these cases arose under the statute before 1897, when the amendments above quoted were made to the statute in force at that time. Under the present statute we are of the opinion that it is the duty of the executor, under wills like the one in question, to publish a notice to creditors, and failure of the creditors to file a claim within the year bars such claim. It is true the will in this case makes the executrix trustee of the estate for the purpose of paying creditors, but this means such creditors only as qualify by proving their claims within time, as in other estates, and thereby making themselves beneficiaries of the trust. When this is done, the rule contended for by the appellant would no doubt apply.

The complaint does not allege that no notice was published, and we must therefore assume that the executrix did her duty, and seasonably published such notice. Columbus McDonnell died in April, 1901. This action was not begun until September, 1906, and no cause is shown for the delay. We are of the opinion, therefore, that the action is barred, and the judgment must be affirmed.

KERSHNER v. HENDERSON.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Jan. 9, 1908.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT—RELATION—DETERMINATION—INDEFINITE TERM.

Plaintiff was employed to attend defendant, an invalid, and did so for a few days, when defendant moved to a distant state, leaving plaintiff in possession of his house. Plaintiff remained on the place several months, and then through defendant's attorney, sent him a bill for services rendered as nurse and caretaker. Defendant replied through his attorney with notification to plaintiff to leave the place, which reply was shown plaintiff by the attorney. Held to be sufficient notice to terminate the contract of employment, and that there could be no recovery for services rendered after such notice.

2. SAME—ACTIONS FOR WAGES.

In an action for services rendered as nurse and caretaker of property, where the evidence was conflicting as to plaintiff's right to possession of the property as such caretaker, it was a question for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, § 121.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Kitsap County; John B. Yakey, Judge.

Action by John W. Kershner against Fitzhugh Henderson. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

William C. Keith, for appellant. W. A. McLeod and C. D. Sutton, for respondent.

FULLERTON, J. In this action the respondent sought to recover of the appellant the sum of $1,250, alleged to be the reasonable value of certain services which he claims to have performed for the appellant at the appellant's special instance and request. The services consisted of waiting upon the appellant for a few days, and acting as caretaker for some two years of certain real estate which the appellant owned situated in Kitsap county. The answer put in issue the allegations of the complaint, and a trial was had thereon resulting in a verdict and judgment in favor of the respondent for the sum of $1,000.

The evidence tended to show that the appellant had a stroke of paralysis in the early part of August, 1903, while residing upon the real estate mentioned, and employed the respondent to attend upon him, evidently expecting to recover within a short time. A few days later he suffered from another stroke, which left him in a practically helpless condition, whereupon a nephew came from some place in Virginia and took him to an asylum in that state for treatment, leaving the respondent in possession of his home upon the real estate. The respondent continued to reside on the property until some time the next spring, when he presented to a Mr. Keith, the appellant's counsel, certain demands or bills for services rendered in caring for the real property. These demands were forwarded to the appellant, who replied thereto by saying that the respondent was not in his employ, and directing him to quit and surrender up possession of the place. There was testimony to the effect, although disputed by the respondent, that this notification and this letter was shown the respondent by Keith. The respondent, however, still continued to reside on the place, and later on brought this action as before stated. On the trial of the cause the appellant requested the court to charge the jury to the effect that if they found that appellant did notify the respondent to quit and surrender the premises on receipt of his demand of payment as caretaker for the same, and that this notification was brought to the respondent's attention, the respondent could not recover for any services performed as caretaker of the premises after that time. This instruction was refused, and constitutes one of the principal errors assigned. The instruction should have been given. The contract of employment, if any existed at all, was a contract for an indefinite time, and could be terminated by either party whenever that party so desired by giving notice to the other. The repudiation by the appellant of the respondent's claim of employment, and the notification given by him to the respondent to quit the premises, was a sufficient notice to terminate the contract, conceding that one existed, whenever it was brought to the respondent's attention. No formal service of the notice was required. By presenting his demand for payment to the appellant through Keith, the respondent authorized the appellant to reply through the same source, and, if he did reply to the effect that the contract was at an end, and this reply was shown the respondent, it was sufficient notice to terminate the contract relation. The respondent's possession of the premises was wrongful from that time on, and he cannot recover for any services performed thereafter as caretaker.

The appellant stoutly maintains that the respondent's possession was wrongful from the beginning, and that he cannot recover for any services as caretaker of the premises. But on this question we think there is a substantial dispute in the evidence, and that the question was one for the jury.

The other errors assigned merit no special consideration.

For the error noted, the judgment is reversed, and a new trial is awarded.

1. ACKNOWLEDGMENT—DEEDS—VALIDITY BETWEEN PARTIES.

An unacknowledged deed is good as between the parties, and conveys at least an equitable title.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 1, Acknowledgment, §§ 26, 27.]

2. DEEDS — DELIVERY — SUFFICIENCY — INTENT.

Actual manual delivery and change of possession of a deed are not necessary to constitute an effectual delivery; but whether there has been a valid delivery depends on the intention of the grantor.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 16, Deeds, § 118.]

3. SAME—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Evidence held to show that the grantor in a deed intended to consummate the transaction so as to fully vest title in the grantees, notwithstanding the signature was not acknowledged nor the deed delivered even to the grantor's executor until after the grantor's death.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 16, Deeds, § 625.]

4. EXECUTORS—SALES UNDER COURT'S ORDER—RULE OF CAVEAT EMPTOR—BONA FIDE PURCHASERS.

The rule of caveat emptor applies with full force to sales by administrators or by executors, and the purchaser acquires only the interest of the estate; hence, where a testator had executed a deed of land to certain minors, though it was not acknowledged nor filed for record in the auditor's office, but had been filed in the office of the clerk of the superior court with the decedent's will, a grantee under an executor's deed of the land made by order of court was not a bona fide purchaser.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kitsap County; John B. Yakey, Judge.

Action by Theodore Matson and others, by their guardian ad litem, against Andrew J. Johnson and wife and Edward Johnson, executor of the estate of F. Lanston, deceased, to set aside an executor's deed. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

S. S. Langland, for appellants. Willett & Willett, for respondents.

RUDKIN, J. F. Lanston died testate in Kitsap county, in this state on the 15th day of June, 1902. During his last illness, and a few days before his death, he called in one of his neighbors and directed him to prepare a deed and will in order that he might execute them. A deed was accordingly prepared, purporting to convey the property now in controversy to the three minors, who are plaintiffs in this action. The instrument was signed by the grantor in the presence of two witnesses, but was not acknowledged, because there was no officer present authorized by law to take the acknowledgment of deeds. The grantor stated to those present that he would appoint Mr. Johnson as his executor, and would instruct him to have the deed acknowledged and properly executed. The property described in the deed was of the value of about $100, and was the only real property owned by the grantor. At the time of the execution of this deed, and as part of the same transaction, Lanston executed a will making various small bequests, which are not material here. The following indorsement was made at the foot of the will by direction of the testator: "Ed Johnson are hereby empowered to appear for the notary public to have inlaid deed executed." What disposition was made of the will and deed after their execution does not appear, but both instruments were delivered to the executor some time after Lanston's death, and were by him filed in the office of the clerk of the superior court, the will under date of June 18, and the deed on June 23, 1902. The deed was not filed for record in the auditor's office until February 1, 1903. At the time of the execution of the deed and will Lanston was the owner of the real property described in the deed and about $500 cash in bank. The will was admitted to probate, and Johnson appointed executor thereof. On the 25th day of November, 1905, the real property now in controversy was conveyed to the defendants in this action by the executor of the will pursuant to an order of the superior court made and entered in the estate matter. The present action was instituted by the grantees named in the above deed, through their guardian ad litem, to quiet their title as against the purchasers at the executor's sale, and from a judgment in favor of the defendants the present appeal is prosecuted.

Three questions have been presented for the consideration of this court: (1) Was the Lanston deed ineffective for lack of an acknowledgment on the part of the grantor? (2) Was there a delivery of the deed? (3) Are the defendants bona fide purchasers?

First. An unacknowledged deed is good as between the parties in this state. Such an instrument conveyed at least an equitable title. Devlin on Deeds (2d Ed.) § 465; Edson v. Knox, 8 Wash. 642, 36 Pac. 698; Carson v. Thompson, 10 Wash. 295, 38 Pac. 1116; Bloomingdale v. Well, 29 Wash. 634, 70 Pac. 94.

Second. Was there a delivery of the deed? "Actual manual delivery and change of possession are not required in order to constitute an effectual delivery. But whether there has been a valid delivery or not must be decided by determining what was the intention of the grantor, and by regarding the particular circumstances of the case. Where a father had indicated in various ways that certain property should be bestowed at his death upon his infant son, and for that purpose had executed a deed, of which he, however, retained the possession, effect was given to his intention, despite the fact that there had been no manual delivery of the deed." Devlin on Deeds (2d Ed.) § 269. In Atwood v. Atwood, 15 Wash. 235, 46 Pac. 240, this court said: "In coming to these conclusions, we have not lost sight of the able argument and large array of authorities contained in the brief of appellant, to the effect that the delivery of a deed does not necessarily require any formal act on the part of the grantor; that it is often a question of intention; that a deed may become operative while the manual possession is retained by the grantor. But in such cases, before the court can find a delivery, the intention to consummate the transaction so as to fully vest the title in the grantee must be clearly shown, and neither the findings of fact by the referee nor by the superior court, nor the evidence in the case, satisfies us that the grantor in the deed under consideration ever did anything with the intention that by doing it he had so delivered the deed as to make it presently operative." What was lacking in the Atwood Case, viz., the intention to consummate the transaction so as to fully vest the title in the grantee, was in our opinion clearly and unequivocally shown in this case. The will and deed were executed at the same time and as a part of the same transaction. The real property was omitted from the will no doubt advisedly, and all the surrounding circumstances show conclusively that the grantor intended to convey his real property to these minors, that the deed was executed for that purpose, and in our opinion the mere absence of an acknowledgment is not sufficient to defeat his expressed intentions.

Third. The respondents were not bona fide purchasers, as that term is understood in the law. The rule of caveat emptor applies in all its vigor to sales by administrators or executors in this state, and the purchaser acquires only the interest of the estate. Towner v. Rodegeb, 33 Wash. 153, 74 Pac. 50, 99 Am. St. Rep. 936, and cases cited.

We are therefore of opinion that the appellants have shown a clear title to the lands in controversy, as against the respondents, and the judgment of the court below is accordingly reversed, with directions to enter judgment as prayed in the complaint.

STATE ex rel. OREGON & W. R. CO. v.
ABRAHAM et al., County Com'rs.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Jan. 9, 1908.)

PUBLIC LANDS — TIDE LANDS — VACATING PLAT.

Under the rule that an act covering the subject-matter of a former act without express words of reservation supersedes the former act in so far as it conflicts with it, Act March 14, 1903, p. 139, c. 92, relating to the vacation of plats, if construed as authorizing the board of county commissioners to vacate plats of tide lands made by the board of state land commissioners, is superseded in that respect by Act March 16, 1903, p. 238, c. 127, authorizing the board of state land commissioners to vacate tide land plats, and the jurisdiction to vacate such plats is vested exclusively in the board of state land commissioners.

Appeal from Superior Court, King County;
R. B. Albertson, Judge.

Mandamus by the state, on the relation of the Oregon & Washington Railroad Company, against D. R. Abraham and others, as board of county commissioners of King county, to compel respondents to proceed with the hearing of a petition for the vacation of a plat. From a judgment of dismissal, the relator appeals. Affirmed.

W. W. Cotton, H. F. Conner, and John P. Hartman, for appellant. Kenneth Mackintosh, E. B. Herald, and A. J. Tennant, for respondent.

FULLERTON, J. On August 28, 1906, the appellant, being then the owner of certain uplands situated in King county (lying outside of the limits of any incorporated city or town), which had been platted into lots, blocks, streets, and alleys, and recorded under the name of "Ladd's Factory Sites," and being the owner, also, of certain tide lands which had been theretofore platted into lots, blocks, and streets by the board of state land commissioners, petitioned the county commissioners of King county to vacate the plats, assigning as a reason therefor that it had become the owner of all the property the plat of which it sought to vacate, and that its interests alone would be affected by the vacation, and that it desired the vacation in order that it might use the property for terminal grounds of its railroad then in the course of construction. The county commissioners assumed jurisdiction, and granted the petition in so far as it related to the uplands, but declined to act upon that portion of the petition relating to the tide lands, on the ground that it had no jurisdiction to vacate, modify, or otherwise change plats of tide lands made by the board of state land commissioners. The appellant thereupon sued out of the superior court of King county a writ of mandamus commanding the county commissioners to reinstate the proceedings and proceed with the hearing of the petition, or show cause at a date fixed by the court why they had not done so. The commissioners appeared at the hearing and demurred to the application for the writ, which demurred the trial court sustained and dismissed the proceedings. From the judgment of dismissal the railroad company appealed to this court.

The appellant contends that power to vacate plats of tide lands is vested in the board of county commissioners by Act March 14, 1903, p. 139, c. 92; the part of the act relied upon being the first section thereof, which reads as follows: "That whenever three-fourths in number and area of the owners of any townsite, city plat or plats, addition or additions, or part thereof, shall be desirous of altering the plat or plats, replatting or vacating the same or any part thereof, they may prepare a plat or plats, showing such alterations or replat, drafted upon a copy of the existing plat or plats, or that portion desired to be altered, replatted or vacated, and file the same with the clerk of the board of county commissioners, or city council having jurisdiction of the establishment or vacation and control of the streets to be affected, accompanied with a petition for the change desired." The county commissioners contend that jurisdiction to vacate tide land plats is vested in the board of state land commissioners by the third section of the act of March 16, 1903 (Laws 1903, p. 239, c. 127). That section is as follows: "Whenever all the owners and other persons who have a vested interest in the lands abutting on any street, alley, or other public place, or any portion thereof, in any of the state granted, tide or shore lands lying outside of the limits of any incorporated city or town which have been platted, or which hereafter shall be platted, shall petition the board of state land commissioners, by filing a petition therefor with the Commissioner of Public Lands, the board of state land commissioners is authorized and empowered to vacate any such street, alley or public place, or part thereof, and all such streets, alleys and other public places and portions thereof which shall be so vacated shall be platted and appraised in the manner provided for the platting and appraising of similar lands: provided, that where the area of such streets, alleys or other public places so vacated may be determined from the plat already filed as provided by law it shall not be necessary to survey said street, alley or other public place so vacated, but the area thereof may be determined from such plat already filed." We are of the opinion that the contention of the board of county commissioners must prevail. While the act relied upon by the appellant if it stood alone might be construed as broad enough to vest in the board of county commissioners power to vacate plats of tide lands made by the board of state land commissioners, yet it is evident that the Legislature did not so intend, for the reason that two days later they vested this very power in another board. Nor can the jurisdiction be held to be concurrent. If the first act did grant the power contended for to the board of county commissioners, it was superseded in that respect by the subsequent act, under the familiar rule that an act covering the subject-matter of a former act without express words of reservation supersedes the former act in so far as it conflicts with it.

The judgment of the lower court is right, and must be affirmed. It is so ordered.

In re OREGON & W. R. CO.

OREGON & W. R. CO. v. ABRAHAM et al.
(Supreme Court of Washington. Jan. 9, 1908.)

Appeal from Superior Court, King County; Geo. E. Morris, Judge.

Petition by the Oregon & Washington Railroad Company for the vacation by D. R. Abraham and others, as board of county commissioners, and another, of a plat. From a judgment granting insufficient relief, the petitioner appeals. Dismissed.

W. W. Cotton, H. F. Conner, and John P. Hartman, for appellant. Kenneth Mackintosh, E. B. Herald, and A. J. Tennant, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The controversy forming the subject-matter of this appeal ceased to exist by the judgment of this court in the case of State ex rel. Oregon & Washington Railroad Company v. Abraham, 93 Pac. 325.

The appeal will therefore be dismissed.

STATE ex rel. ESPY ESTATE CO. v.
BOARD OF COM'RS OF PACIFIC COUNTY.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Jan. 15, 1908.)

1. DRAINS—ASSESSMENTS—AMOUNT.

County commissioners are without power to assess for ditch purposes a greater sum than the amount of the benefits conferred by the improvement.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 17, Drains, § 75.]

2. SAME—LEVY OF ASSESSMENT—POWERS.

Where a county created a drainage district, and partially completed a ditch under the act of March 19, 1890 (Laws 1889-90, p. 652, c. 21), and the statute was subsequently held unconstitutional and the curative act of March 19, 1895 (Laws 1895, p. 142, c. 79), provided for new proceedings whereby the obligations incurred under the unconstitutional act might be made a lien on the property benefited to the amount of the benefits, the question of the amount of benefits conferred was one for the board acting under the curative statute, and they were not bound by the acts of the former board under the void statute.

Appeal from Superior Court, Pacific County; A. E. Rice, Judge.

Application by the state of Washington, on the relation of the Espy Real Estate Company, a corporation, for the punishment of the board of county commissioners of Pacific county for contempt, consisting of an alleged failure to obey a writ of mandamus issued to the board in proceedings for mandamus by relator against the board. From a judgment sustaining a demurrer to the affidavit and dismissing the application, relator appeals. Affirmed.

Sol Smith, for appellant. J. J. Brumbach and H. W. B. Hewen, for respondent.

FULLERTON, J. This is a continuation of the controversy a statement of which is found in the case of Espy Estate Co. v. Pacific County, 40 Wash. 67, 82 Pac. 129. After the remittitur went down in that case, the trial court issued a writ of mandamus to the board of county commissioners of Pacific county requiring them to create a fund, pursuant to the provisions of the statute of 1895, for the payment of the indebtedness incurred as set forth in the application for the writ. The board proceeded as directed, and on the hearing found that the lots and parcels of lands subject to assessment were not benefited in an amount equal to the sum now outstanding in principal and interest incurred in the construction of the ditch; but found that the utmost such lands were benefited was an amount equal to the principal of such indebtedness, and for this sum they caused an assessment to be made. The appellant conceived this to be in disobedience of the mandatory order, and instituted this proceeding to punish the commissioners for contempt. A demurrer was interposed and sustained to the affidavit asking for a writ to show cause, and, on the appellant's electing to stand thereon, a judgment of dismissal was entered. This appeal was taken therefrom.

The appellant in its affidavit asking for the writ does not in any wise impugn the motives of the commissioners. It is not charged that they fraudulently or corruptly made the finding that the lands subject to assessment were not benefited to an amount equal to the outstanding obligations, or that the lands were, in fact, benefited in a greater sum than the commissioners levied thereon. The affidavit is silent on these questions. It must be presumed, therefore, that the commissioners performed their full duty, and assessed the lands to the full amount of the benefits conferred upon them by the improvement. These considerations conclude the case against the appellant. Both by the statute under which the commissioners acted and by the fundamental law the commissioners were without power to assess against the lands a greater sum than the amount of the benefits the improvement conferred upon them. This was so held by this court in State ex rel. Latimer v. Henry, 28 Wash. 38, 68 Pac. 368. In that case we said: "Costs to be assessed for local improvements cannot exceed the benefits conferred. Section 3 of the act of 1895 (Laws 1895, p. 142, c. 79), in effect, so provides. It requires the county commissioners to ascertain the aggregate cost of the ditch and apportion the same to each lot, tract of land, etc., according to benefits resulting from the improvements, not exceeding the amount of said benefits. Under this provision the cost may be less or equal to the benefits. For all portions of the cost exceeding the benefits no assessment can be made on the property benefited." See, also, McNamee v. Tacoma, 24 Wash. 591, 64 Pac. 791; Town of Elma v. Carney, 9 Wash. 463, 37 Pac. 707; New Whatcom v. Improvement Co., 9 Wash. 639, 38 Pac. 163; Village of Norwood v. Baker, 172 U. S. 269, 19 Sup. Ct. 187, 43 L. Ed. 443. Since, therefore, they levied to the full extent of their powers, they cannot be punished for a failure to levy more.

The contention to the effect that the present board of county commissioners in making the assessment are bound by the acts of the former board had under the void statute of 1890 (Laws 1889-90, p. 652, c. 21) is not well taken. Inasmuch as the work performed in pursuance of that statute benefited certain real property affected by it, it was proper for the Legislature to recognize the moral obligation to pay the costs of the improvement, and provide a method by which that moral obligation could be turned into a legal one and made a lien on the property benefited up to the amount of the benefits. But the Legislature was without power to make, and it did not attempt to make, the original assessment a lien on the property without further proceedings. As the act of 1890 was void the proceedings had under it were void, and new notices to the owners of the property and an opportunity to be heard were necessary before the costs of the improvement could be made a fixed lien. The question of the amount of the benefits conferred, therefore, was for the present board to determine, and they did not exceed their powers when they undertook to and did determine it.

The judgment is affirmed.

JENNINGS et al. v. LENTZ.

(Supreme Court of Oregon. Jan. 21, 1908.)

1. ATTACHMENT—ATTACHING CREDITOR—BONA FIDE PURCHASER.

B. & C. Comp. § 302, provides that from the date of an attachment until it is discharged, or the writ is executed, plaintiff, as against third persons, shall be deemed a purchaser in good faith and for a valuable consideration, provided the sheriff's certificate required by section 301 is filed as required by section 303. Held, that an attaching creditor, in order to obtain the rights of a bona fide purchaser, is bound to prove that he in fact acquired his lien in good faith and without notice of outstanding equities.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 5, Attachment, § 553.]

2. WORDS AND PHRASES—"GOOD FAITH."

Good faith is an honest intention to abstain from taking any unconscientious advantage of another, even through the forms or technicalities of law, together with an absence of all belief of facts which would render the transaction unconscientious. A want of that caution and diligence which an honest man of ordinary prudence is accustomed to exercise in making purchases is in judgment of law a want of good faith, quoting Words and Phrases, vol. 4, p. 3117. See, also, Words and Phrases, vol. 8, p. 7672.

3. VENDOR AND PURCHASER—NOTICE.

Whatever is sufficient to put a subsequent purchaser on inquiry must be considered legal notice to him of the facts inquiry would have disclosed by the exercise of reasonable diligence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 48, Vendor and Purchaser, §§ 477-494.]

4. ATTACHMENT—ATTACHING CREDITORS—NOTICE—RECORDS.

B. & C. Comp. §§ 300-303, 5359, provide that nonexempt real estate shall be liable to attachment by the sheriff making a certificate and filing the same with the clerk of the county in which the property is situated, and that from the date thereof the plaintiff, as against third persons, shall be a purchaser in good faith, and that every conveyance of real property within the state which shall not be recorded within five days after its execution shall be void as against a subsequent bona fide purchaser whose conveyance shall be first recorded. L. having sold certain land to D. for a consideration, half of which was secured by a mortgage thereon, D. within an hour conveyed the property to G., who conveyed it to complainants' grantors. The mortgage to L. was recorded, but the deed to D. was not, and defendant, relying on a statement by L. that he had conveyed the land to D., attached it for D.'s debt, after which the deeds to D. and complainants were recorded. Held, that L.'s statement that he had conveyed the land to D. was rebutted by the record which showed that the title still remained in L., which record only gave notice of the facts therein stated and warned defendant to make further inquiries as to D.'s title to the premises, so that he was not a bona fide purchaser under his attachment, entitled to priority against complainants.

Eakin, J., and Slater, C., dissenting.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Baker County; William Smith, Judge.

Suit by Martha J. Jennings and others against William Lentz. From a decree for complainants, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. L. Patterson, for appellant. C. P. Murphy, for respondents.

KING, C. This is a suit to remove a cloud upon the title to 160 acres of land in Baker county, and is brought here on an appeal from a decree of the circuit court in favor of plaintiffs. On and prior to April 23, 1902, the land was owned and in the actual possession of Frank Lentz. On the date named, in consideration of $500, one half of which was paid in cash and the balance by a note due one year after date, secured by a mortgage on the property, he executed a warranty deed to the premises to Robert Duvall, who, within an hour after receipt of the conveyance, and without entering into possession, executed a like deed therefor to Mary E. Gardner, who had furnished the money for the purchase, and for whom, without the grantor's knowledge, Duvall was acting as agent in the purchase from Lentz. On the same day that the deed to Duvall was executed Lentz recorded his mortgage in the proper records of that county, and soon thereafter removed from the land, leaving no one in possession, and, so far as manifested by the evidence, no one was in actual possession of the land when this suit was filed. The deed to Gardner was given subject to the Lentz mortgage, which with the deed from Lentz to Duvall was left by Mrs. Gardner with M. S. Hughes, who was to take them to the clerk's office for record; but for some unexplained reason they were not recorded until 30 days later. On October 3, 1903, Mrs. Gardner, by warranty deed and for a valuable consideration, transferred the property to plaintiffs' grantors, who, by like deed, conveyed it to plaintiffs. Shortly after Frank Lentz had deeded the property to Duvall he informed the defendant of the transfer, to whom it appears Duvall was indebted in the sum of $145, which indebtedness was incurred some time prior to the transfer of the property by Lentz. Defendant then had his attorneys examine the records of the county for the purpose of ascertaining if the debtor still owned the property, which resulted in their finding a record of the mortgage on the property from him to Frank Lentz, but the record title to the land in the mortgagee. Without further information than the statement by Frank Lentz to the effect that on April 23d he had conveyed the land to Duvall, and the record of the mortgage named, the defendant, on May 7, 1902, caused the land to be attached in an action filed against Duvall on the $145 claim, in which proceeding judgment was obtained, execution issued thereon, and the property sold to satisfy the judgment, which property was purchased by defendant, he receiving a sheriff's deed therefor, through which he here claims title.

There is no controversy as to the facts, leaving for adjudication the question as to which has the better title under the facts as stated. Our statute provides that any real property of the debtor not exempt from execution shall be liable to attachment, which shall be attached by the sheriff making a certificate containing the title of the cause, names of the parties, and description of the realty, with a statement showing the property to have been attached, and filing the same with the clerk of the county in which the property is situated; that from the date thereof until discharged, or writ executed, the plaintiff, as against third persons, shall be deemed a purchaser in good faith for a valuable consideration; that his rights as such shall attach immediately upon the filing of such certificate; and that every conveyance of real property within this state which shall not be recorded within five days after the execution thereof shall be void as against any subsequent purchaser in good faith for a valuable consideration, whose conveyance thereof shall be first duly recorded. B. & C. Comp. §§ 300-303, 5359.

In order, therefore, to determine whether defendant's title is superior to that of plaintiffs, it is necessary to ascertain only whether, in lieu of the course pursued, he would have been a purchaser in good faith, if with the limited knowledge of the status of Duvall's title at the time of the levy defendant had purchased the property from him and paid a valuable consideration therefor. If answered in the affirmative, he has the better title and must prevail; otherwise plaintiffs have the superior title, and are entitled to the relief demanded. Under the law as it existed prior to the adoption of the statute mentioned, to the effect that after the filing of the attachment proceedings the creditor shall be deemed a purchaser in good faith, the creditor, by virtue of his attachment, acquired a lien only on the actual interest which the debtor had in the property. Riddle v. Miller, 19 Or. 468, 23 Pac. 807. It is obvious that the statute on this point was intended to modify this rule, and to give the attaching creditor, regardless of the actual condition of the debtor's title, additional protection by placing him in the same position as a bona fide purchaser for value, in case of failure on the part of the real owner to observe the requirements of the recording acts. But, in construing these acts, it has been repeatedly held, and has become a settled rule in this state, that an attaching creditor, although placed on an equality with a purchaser by this statute, cannot insist on any greater protection than would be granted to such purchaser; and, in suits in equity, the claim of a bona fide purchaser for value is an affirmative defense, which must be pleaded, thereby placing the burden of proof in such cases upon the party relying thereon. Weber v. Rothchild, 15 Or. 385, 15 Pac. 650, 3 Am. St. Rep. 162; Wood v. Rayburn, 18 Or. 3, 22 Pac. 521; Rhodes v. McGarry et al., 19 Or. 222, 23 Pac. 971; Marks et al. v. Miller, 21 Or. 317, 28 Pac. 14, 14 L. R. A. 190; Simpkins v. Windsor, 21 Or. 382, 28 Pac. 72; Dimmick v. Rosenfeld, 34 Or. 101, 55 Pac. 100; Flegel v. Koss, 47 Or. 366, 83 Pac. 847; Haines v. Connell, 48 Or. 469, 87 Pac. 265; 88 Pac. 872. In discussing this feature, Mr. Chief Justice Thayer, in Rhodes v. McGarry, supra, observes: "It seems to me that, notwithstanding the language of the Code above set out, an attaching creditor, in order to be deemed a purchaser in good faith of the property as against one having an outstanding equity, must allege and prove all the facts necessary to establish that character of ownership in favor of a purchaser of such property as against such an equity. It can hardly be supposed that the Legislature intended, by the provision of the Code referred to, to place an attaching creditor upon any more favorable grounds, with reference to his rights in the property attached, than those occupied by a purchaser of the property: nor to deem the former a purchaser in good faith, except under the same circumstances in which the latter would be deemed such a purchaser. Any other view would lead to absurd consequences, and occasion injustice. It would enable a party to cut off an outstanding equity by 'resorting' to an attachment when he would not be able to accomplish it by a direct purchase of the property. Such a result was obviously not contemplated by the adoption of the said provision of the Code." As the answer is sufficient to bring the defendant's position within the rule announced, it becomes necessary to determine whether this plea is sufficiently supported by the evidence to entitle defendant to be deemed a purchaser in good faith. Words & Phrases (vol. 4, p. 3117) defines "good faith" as being "an honest intention to abstain from taking any unconscientious advantage of another, even through the forms or technicalities of law, together with an absence of all information or belief of facts which would render the transaction unconscientious." And the rule is that "a want of that caution and diligence which an honest man of ordinary prudence is accustomed to exercise in making purchases is, in judgment of law, a want of good faith" (Id., vol. 4, p. 3117); and whatever is sufficient to put a subsequent purchaser on inquiry must be considered legal notice to him of those rights, and when the purchaser omits to observe that ordinary precaution he must be charged with a knowledge of all facts he might have learned by the exercise of reasonable diligence in making inquiry as to matters to which his attention had been directed. Dembitz, Land Titles, §§ 132, 133; Bent v. Coleman et al., 89 Ill. 364; Citizens' Nat. Bank v. Dayton, 116 Ill. 257, 4 N. E. 492; Pringle v. Phillips, 5 Sandf. (N. Y. Sup. Ct.) 165.

The precise question, as here presented, is before this court for the first time, and we are referred to no case in which the point under a similar state of facts as here disclosed has been distinctly passed upon, nor have we found one, but an application of the principles stated are decisive of the issues presented. The result hinges upon the sufficiency of the inquiry made in reference to the debtor's rights in the premises. In this connection it is urged that the mortgage from the debtor to his grantor, being of record, when considered with the grantor's statement to the creditor to the effect that he had conveyed the property to the debtor on a prior date, without further inquiry, constituted sufficient evidence of the debtor's ownership therein to justify the attachment. It will be remembered, however, that the record at the same time disclosed the title to the property to be in Frank Lentz. When, therefore, it is made to appear from the record that the title is in a person other than the debtor, the record of a mortgage on the land, given by such debtor, is not notice, or satisfactory evidence, that he is the owner of the premises mortgaged. A public record does not give notice of any facts not stated in it, or of facts that a person would not expect in the ordinary course of business to be found there. A person in the ordinary course of business affairs would not have expected to find a mortgage of record given by Duvall, unless he also appeared by the records to be the owner of the property mortgaged. From this it follows that, when the record disclosed the title to be in Lentz, the record of a mortgage given to him by Duvall did not constitute notice or evidence that the latter was the owner of the mortgaged premises. Webb, Record Title, §§ 158, 160; Security Trust Co. v. Loewenberg, 38 Or. 159, 62 Pac. 647; Roberts v. Bourne, 23 Me. 165, 39 Am. Dec. 614; Pierce v. Odlin, 27 Me. 341; Losey v. Simpson et al., 11 N. J. Eq. 246; Bingham v. Kirkland et al., 34 N. J. Eq. 229; Calder v. Chapman, 52 Pa. 359, 91 Am. Dec. 163; Doswell v. Buchanan, 3 Leigh, 365, 23 Am. Dec. 280.

The statement by Frank Lentz that he had conveyed the land to Duvall was rebutted by the record itself showing the title still to be in the person making the statement. The record of the mortgage was not only inadequate for the purpose claimed, but even if considered in connection with defendant's inquiry from Duvall's grantor, it cannot be held sufficient, in the absence of further investigation, to impart such notice as "an honest man of ordinary prudence is accustomed to act upon," when making a purchase of real property; and if not such as would be deemed sufficient for an actual purchaser, it must be conceded under the adjudications of this state, that it is insufficient to protect the defendant as an attaching creditor. As stated in Bent v. Coleman, 89 Ill. 364, 368: "A person about to purchase this tract of land would naturally inquire into the title of the vendor. He would ascertain his source of title. This is the ordinary, and usually the first, inquiry." It appears that Duvall was known to be in the vicinity of the land when the attachment was made, and had defendant intended to purchase the land outright, it would have been his duty to ascertain, and he would probably have endeavored to learn, whether he had any title to convey. Had this been done, it is presumed he would have been told the truth, resulting in no purchase having been made; and, if made, defendant, under such circumstances, would have taken nothing under his deed as against Duvall's successors in interest. He could not, under such circumstances, have been a purchaser in good faith; and, as stated, he can be in no better position as an attaching creditor. When defendant was informed of the sale to Duvall, and that he became the owner, it had reference only to his ownership on April 23d, which was prior to the attachment, and it did not necessarily follow that the title was in him at the time of the levy; nor does it appear that defendant was in any manner informed that his debtor either was, or claimed to be, the owner at that time, and, finding the record evidence of title in the debtor's supposed grantor, this was sufficient to put him on inquiry, and made it imperative that he should make further investigation before acting, or else assume the risk of Duvall having no title. "It was not incumbent on him to exhaust every possible source of information." (Johnson v. Erlandson, 14 N. D. 518, 105 N. W. 722), but it was his duty to use at least reasonable diligence in that respect, or, in the event of his failure to do so, to abide the consequences. When he examined the records, and, in place of finding the title in the debtor, found it in a third party, he was in a far different position than that of a person attaching property on a claim against one, who, under the records, holds the apparent title; for Duvall, when the levy was made, had neither the apparent nor the actual title. In the case of Davis v. Lutkiewicz, 72 Iowa, 254, 33 N. W. 670, to which our attention is directed, the grantor had the deed in his possession, which the court held was better evidence of title than a record thereof, as the record would have imparted no notice not disclosed by the original deed, and when the person holding and exhibiting such instrument represented himself to be the owner of the property, the purchaser had such evidence of title as to justify him in acting accordingly. In this respect the case mentioned is very different from the one under consideration, in which the debtor had neither the actual title, nor any evidence thereof; nor does it appear that he claimed to be the owner of the land, nor that, after discovering the status of the title of record, any effort was made to ascertain from any one likely to be in possession of the desired information whether at the time of the levy the debtor either was, in fact, or claimed to be, such owner.

After a careful consideration of the facts disclosed by the record, and of what we deem the principles of law applicable thereto, as announced and recognized by previous decisions of this court, we are impelled to hold that plaintiffs have the better title, on the ground that, when the records of the clerk's office of the county in which the land may be situated fail to show any title in the debtor, but disclose it to be in another, and the title in fact is not in such debtor, and the extrinsic evidence at hand is insufficient to warrant the creditor in acting on the theory of the debtor being the owner thereof, such attaching creditor must abide the risk incurred by his levy, and take only "what accident throws into his net as he finds it, and he cannot claim the benefit of a fiction to get more than his debtor really owned." Cowley v. McLaughlin, 141 Mass.

181, 182, 4 N. E. 821. See, also, Haynes v. Jones, 5 Metc. (Mass.) 292; Hamilton-Brown Shoe Co. v. Lewis, 7 Tex. Civ. App. 509, 23 S. W. 101.

The decree of the court below should accordingly be affirmed.

EAKIN, J. (dissenting). I am unable to concur in the foregoing opinion. The real point upon which the decision turns is that the purchaser from a grantee whose deed is not recorded is, by reason of that fact alone, put upon inquiry, and consequently charged with notice of the prior unrecorded conveyance from such grantee; and I refer to the rights of the attaching creditor as those of a bona fide purchaser for value without notice, as that is what the statute says he shall be deemed. It is conceded that if the grantee's deed is on record, a purchaser from him is not put upon inquiry or notice of a prior unrecorded deed. He takes a good title, if in fact ignorant of it. There are many cases where there can be no record of one's title, such as title by descent or by adverse possession, but that fact cannot prejudice one's right to purchase or attach. I dare say that it is an everyday occurrence that purchases are made from grantees who have not yet had their deeds recorded. In such a case the purchaser is bound to search the record for a conveyance from the apparent owner, as disclosed by the record, as well as from his own vendor, but the fact that his vendor's deed is not recorded cannot put him upon any other inquiry, or charge him with notice of any other facts. B. & C. Comp. § 5359, provides that: "Every conveyance of real property within this state hereafter made, which shall not be recorded as provided in this title, within five days thereafter, shall be void against any subsequent purchaser in good faith and for a valuable consideration of the same real property, or any portion thereof, whose conveyance shall be first duly recorded." From this it seems clear that the recording statute has no reference to the title acquired by the purchaser from one whose deed is not recorded, but affects the title only of him who fails to record his deed until a prior deed from his grantor, of which he had no notice, is recorded. The statute contains no suggestion or imputation that one can purchase only from him who appears, from the record, to be the owner, or if he does so, it is at his peril. The effect of the opinion in the case is that, if one purchases from a person who is not disclosed by the record to be the owner, he gets only such title as his grantor actually has at the time of the purchase, regardless of the provisions of the recording statute. This is the holding in Flynt v. Arnold, 2 Metc. (Mass.) 619. The effect of our statute (B. & C. Comp. §§ 802, 5359) is that the attachment can reach the actual interest had in the property by the debtor at the time of the attachment, and as to this remedy the registration laws have no application whatever, and the attachment can reach only such interest, except that in case of a prior conveyance by the debtor such conveyance will be deemed void if it is unrecorded and the creditor is without notice of its existence, and in that case the attachment will be effectual as though said deed had not been made, and the recording statute, by its terms or intentment, applies only to such unrecorded instrument. In the case of Davis v. Lutkiewicz, 72 Iowa, 254, 33 N. W. 670, it is said: "An unrecorded deed is valid as to the whole world, except a subsequent purchaser for a valuable consideration without notice. Surely the deed itself is better evidence of title in the grantee than the record of the deed. This deed the mortgagor had and held when Davis & Sons took their mortgage. A record of it would have imparted no notice not imparted by the original instrument." The court, further speaking of the case of Flynt v. Arnold, supra, which holds that "one who purchases land from a person holding an unrecorded deed purchases at his peril," says: "But this proposition cannot be sustained, because, under our registry laws, the holder of an unrecorded deed has a complete title except as against a subsequent good-faith purchaser without notice." Johnson v. Erlandson, 14 N. D. 518, 105 N. W. 722, was a case where Hogenson, the original owner, conveyed to Erlandson, which conveyance was never recorded. Erlandson executed a deed to Baker, but it was never delivered, and was fraudulently put on record by Baker, and plaintiff claims through Baker. The question was whether the fact that the deed to Erlandson was unrecorded put plaintiff on inquiry or charged her with notice of Erlandson's rights. The court say, in substance, it is urged that the failure to record the deed from Hogenson to Erlandson was sufficient to put plaintiff upon inquiry and charge her with notice of the facts which inquiry of Erlandson would have disclosed. The court further say: "We cannot agree with this argument. The fact that the record failed to show that Hogenson had ever parted with his title was constructive notice of Hogenson's rights and nothing more. The only subject of inquiry suggested by that fact was the question as to whether or not Erlandson had unconditionally acquired Hogenson's title. It is admitted that such is the fact." The Massachusetts cases hold that the attaching creditor is not protected in his levy unless the attachment debtor had at the time of the levy a record title, on the theory that that is his means of information (Cowley v. McLaughlin, 141 Mass. 181, 4 N. E. 821; Haynes v. Jones, 5 Metc. [Mass.] 292); but in the former case the court suggest that if he knew at the time of the attachment that the title had passed to the attaching debtor it might be sufficient. In Davis v. Lutkiewicz, supra, it may be inferred that the mortgagees had knowledge of the conveyance to their mortgagor, and in Johnson v. Erlandson, supra, the plaintiff, in taking her title under an unrecorded deed, had the same character of information of its execution as the attaching creditor had in this case, viz., the statement of the grantor in the unrecorded deed. In this case the attaching creditor had information from Lentz, Duvall's grantor, that a conveyance had been made to Duvall; and I am convinced that in such a case a purchaser for value without notice is not, by reason of the absence of the vendor's title from the record, put upon inquiry or charged with notice that the grantee in the unrecorded deed had previously conveyed the property.

SLATER, C., concurs in this dissent.

MILLER v. ACHURCH et al.

(Supreme Court of Oregon. Jan. 21, 1908.)

1. EXECUTION—SALE—SETTING ASIDE—ACQUESCENCE.

Parties acquiescing in the action of the court in setting aside an execution sale and ordering a resale are bound thereby.

2. SAME—PERSONS WHO MAY QUESTION VALIDITY OF SALE.

At common law the confirmation of a sale on execution might be objected to and the same set aside by plaintiff, defendant, or the purchaser.

3. SAME.

B. & C. Comp. § 242, subd. 1, providing that plaintiff in execution shall be entitled to an order confirming a sale thereunder, unless the judgment debtor or his representatives shall file objections, does not deprive any other interested person than the debtor of the right to object who by common law possessed that right; and hence plaintiff may object.

4. SAME—RESALE—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

The mere fact that plaintiff in execution refused to receipt to the sheriff for the amount of his bid, or to credit his judgment, would not of itself be evidence of an abandonment or withdrawal of his bid, so that there would be in law no sale to him within B. & C. Comp. § 242, subd. 4, providing that on a resale the purchaser's bid at the former sale shall be deemed renewed and to continue in force, and no bid shall be taken except for a greater amount.

5. SAME—RIGHT TO WITHDRAW BID.

Property having been struck off to plaintiff in execution, he had no right to withdraw his bid, and could be excused only by an order of the court, and, if the sale was considered by the court regular, it had the power to enforce the same, and cancel the judgment pro tanto, notwithstanding plaintiff's refusal to receipt to the sheriff.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 21, Execution, § 652.]

6. SAME.

Under B. & C. Comp. § 242, subd. 4, providing that on a resale on execution the purchaser's bid at the former sale shall be deemed renewed, and no bid shall be taken except for a greater amount, and subdivision 3, providing for a repayment to the former purchaser if the property sell for a greater amount to another, where the court in ordering a resale did not include therein any release of plaintiff in execution from his bid, he continued to be bound by it, and the sheriff was bound to consider it as renewed.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Willowa County; William Smith, Judge.

S. E. Miller obtained a judgment against H. Achurch and James L. Hammack, partners, and a decree of foreclosure. The First Bank of Joseph also obtained a judgment in the same suit against Hammack and wife, which was adjudged to be a second lien on the property. The First Bank of Joseph moved for confirmation of a resale under execution, to which motion Miller filed objections, and moved to set aside the resale, and, from an order overruling his objections and denying his motion and confirming the sale, Miller appeals. Reversed and remanded.

On July 23, 1906, plaintiff obtained a judgment against Achurch & Hammack for the aggregate sum of $2,933.40, besides costs and disbursements, and a decree for the foreclosure of a mortgage lien upon some town lots to pay the judgment. Defendant First Bank of Joseph also obtained judgment in the same suit against Hammack and wife for the aggregate amount of $265, which was adjudged to be a second lien and to be paid out of the proceeds of the sale of the property, which was ordered to be made. Execution issued, and on September 25, 1906, a sale took place at which the plaintiff bid $2,500 for the property, and the same was struck off to him. A return to that effect was made and filed October 6, 1906, from which it appears, after reciting the fact of the sale, that "Miller after bidding said above named sum refused to pay over the money so bidden for said real property and refused to credit the above named sum so bidden on the judgment and execution herein, and has since continued to refuse and neglect to pay over said sum or credit said judgment therewith." Afterwards, on the 27th of October, the sale was set aside on plaintiff's motion, a new execution ordered issued, and the property resold, and the costs thereof charged to plaintiff. At the second sale, plaintiff not appearing, the property was struck off to George Mack for the sum of $1,500, and a return to that effect was made and filed December 12, 1906. Defendant, First Bank of Joseph, moved for confirmation of the sale, but on May 14, 1907, plaintiff filed his objections to confirmation of the sale, and moved that it be set aside, on the ground that the property had been sold for $1,000 less than his bid at the former sale, contrary to the provisions of section 242, subd. 4, B. & C. Comp. An order was made overruling the objections and denying plaintiff's motion, and confirming the sale, from which he appeals.

C. E. Cochran, for appellant. C. H. Finn, for respondents.

SLATER, C. (after stating the facts as above). The reason which moved the court to set aside the first sale does not appear in the record, nor is it material that it should, for the action of the court in setting aside the sale was not questioned by any person interested, and it became legally binding on all parties who acquiesced. If plaintiff has a right to be heard on his motion at all, it seems to us that this second sale must be set aside as a result of the positive declaration of the statute that "upon a resale, the bid of the purchaser at the former sale shall be deemed to be renewed and continue in force, and no bid shall be taken except for a greater amount." Section 242, subd. 4, B. & C. Comp. The question presented by the record is not inadequacy of price alone, but the legal effect of the act of the sheriff in refusing to recognize plaintiff's former bid as renewed and continuing in force, and accepting another bid of a smaller amount. If one is the highest bidder, and the officer fraudulently refuses to recognize his bid and reports the property sold on a different bid, he is entitled to have the sale vacated. Freeman on Ex. p. 1787. It is argued by defendants' counsel that plaintiff cannot be heard to object to the confirmation of the sale for two reasons, namely: (1) That by the terms of section 242, subd. 1, B. & C. Comp., no one but the judgment debtor, or, in case of his death, his representative, may object to the confirmation; and (2) that there was in law no sale to plaintiff under the first execution, but that by refusing either to receipt to the sheriff for the amount of his bid or credit his judgment plaintiff abandoned his bid and thereby withdrew it.

The first of these questions involves the proper construction of the statute. Where the procedure to secure the confirmation of a sale on execution has not been regulated by statute, it has been uniformly held that plaintiff, defendant, or the purchaser is entitled to prosecute a motion or action to set aside a sale, because each of them may be aggrieved thereby, unless from some cause he has ceased to be prejudiced or affected by it, or by his own misconduct he has brought about the wrong of which he complains. Thus a purchaser may move to vacate a sale because the proceedings are not sufficient to give him title, or for any other reason rendering it unconscionable to enforce his bid, and the plaintiff may likewise do the same because some irregularity, misconduct, mistake, or misapprehension has resulted in a sale for an inadequate price, leaving his judgment wholly or partially unsatisfied. 2 Freeman on Ex. § 306; Beckwith v. Mining Co., 87 N. C. 155. And in Flint v. Phipps, 20 Or. 340, 25 Pac. 725, 23 Am. St. Rep. 124, Mr. Chief Justice Strahan delivering the opinion, this court announced the general rule that "courts always exercise full control over their process, so that suitors shall not be prejudiced either in the form of the writ or the manner of its execution"—citing McKee v. Logan, 82 Mo. 524. Has the statute in question then taken from plaintiff the right, which he would otherwise possess, to object to the confirmation of a sale, and has the salutary power, which courts have been accustomed to exercise over their process so that suitors shall not be prejudiced either by the form of the writ or by the manner of its execution been so limited by this statute that it cannot be exercised except upon objections by the judgment debtor or in case of his death by his legal representative? The statute referred to is as follows: "Whenever real property is sold on execution the provisions of this section shall apply to the subsequent proceedings: (1) The plaintiff in the writ of execution shall be entitled, on motion therefor, to have an order confirming the sale, at the term next following the return of the execution, or if it be returned in term time, then at such term, unless the judgment debtor or in case of his death, his representative, shall file with the clerk ten days before such term, or if the writ be returned in term time then five days after the return thereof, his objections thereto." The purpose of this statute, as we read it, is not to prescribe how and under what circumstances a sale may be confirmed, excluding all others, but the plain intendment of it is to fix a time before which confirmation may not be taken by the plaintiff, and to preserve to the judgment debtor or to his legal representative a reasonable time in which he may object, and, in case he does not object within the time therein specified, he shall be deemed foreclosed of that right. The statute expressly recognizes the right of plaintiff to move for confirmation and of the judgment debtor to object, but there is no language therein which by reasonable intendment can be construed to deprive any other interested person than the plaintiff of the right to move for confirmation, who by common law possessed that right, nor to deprive any other interested person than the judgment debtor of the right to object at any time before confirmation. Upon this view of the law plaintiff had the right to present his objections and have the facts determined.

The second point urged by defendants is also insufficient, we think, to deprive plaintiff of the relief he seeks. The mere fact that he refused to receipt to the sheriff for the amount of his bid or to credit his judgment would not of itself be evidence of an abandonment or a withdrawal of his bid. That would be determined by the reason for his refusal. If the proceedings had been so irregular as not to give him a title, or if by an excusable mistake he had inadvertently bid a sum less than the amount of his execution (Ontario Bank v. Lansing, 2 Wend. [N. Y.] 260), he then had sufficient reason to cause the sale to be set aside, and, having knowledge of such facts, he could not receipt or credit his judgment without waiving the right to object to confirmation. Moreover, the property having been struck off to him, he had no right to withdraw his bid, and could be excused only by an order of the court. 2 Freeman on Ex. § 300. If the sale had been considered by the court fair and regular, it had the power to enforce the sale and cancel the judgment pro tanto, notwithstanding plaintiff's refusal to receipt. These matters were heard and passed upon by the court, and it ordered a resale. The parties acquiesced, and its decision cannot now be questioned by this court. At common law an order for a resale released the purchaser from his bid and entitled him to a return of his deposit (Freeman on Ex. § 304), but section 242, subd. 4, B. & C. Comp., provides that, "Upon a resale, the bid of the purchaser at the former sale shall be deemed to be renewed and continue in force and no bid shall be taken except for a greater amount," and subdivision 3 of the same section provides for a repayment to the former purchaser the amount of his bid if the property sell for a greater amount to any other person. The court in ordering a resale did not include therein any release of the plaintiff from his bid, and he continued, therefore, to be bound by it. Hence the sheriff could not ignore it, but he was bound to consider it as renewed.

From these considerations, the order of the court appealed from should be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to set aside the sale and order a resale.

(Supreme Court of Oregon. Jan. 21, 1908.)

EMINENT DOMAIN — PAYMENT OF AWARD — WAIVER OF APPEAL.

B. & C. Comp. § 5102, provides that on payment into court of the damages assessed in condemnation proceedings the court shall give judgment appropriating the lands in question. Section 5103 authorizes either party to appeal, but that the appeal shall not stay the proceedings so as to prevent the corporation from taking possession of the lands. Section 5105 declares that if the judgment is reversed and a new trial had, and at the second trial the jury assesses more damages than before, judgment shall be given in favor of defendant for the excess, and section 5106 provides that, if defendant accept the damages paid to the clerk, he waives his right of appeal, and, if he does not, such sum shall remain to abide the event of the appeal, and shall be invested for the benefit of whom it may concern. Held, that where after judgment plaintiff paid the damages awarded into court, and took possession of the land, its right to appeal from the judgment on the award and from the court's order directing the payment of such deposit to the owner of the land was waived.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 18, Eminent Domain, § 605.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Multnomah County; A. L. Frazer, Judge.

Proceeding by the Oregon Electric Railway Company against the Terwilliger Land Company and others to condemn land for a railroad right of way. A judgment was rendered on a verdict assessing defendant's damages, from which plaintiff appealed after paying the amount specified into court, and also appealed from an order on defendant's motion directing the clerk forthwith to pay the money so deposited to the South Portland Improvement Company, the then owner of the land. On motion to dismiss both appeals. Granted.

Wirt Minor, for appellant. A. E. Clark, for respondents.

MOORE, J. This is a motion to dismiss two appeals. A statutory proceeding, analogous to an action at law, was commenced by the Oregon Electric Company, a corporation, against the Terwilliger Land Company, a corporation, to condemn a strip of land 60 feet in width over and across certain lots in the city of Portland. A supplemental complaint was filed in which it was stated that, after the proceedings were instituted, the defendant conveyed the land described in the complaint to the South Portland Improvement Company, a corporation, which latter artificial being was, by order of court, made a party defendant. The answers admitted most of the allegations of the complaint, but averred, inter alia, that the true value of the land and the damage which would result from the taking thereof was $65,000. The replies put in issue the allegations of new matter in the answers, and the cause having been tried, a verdict was returned June 15, 1907, to the effect that the plaintiff was entitled to appropriate the land specified upon the payment to the South Portland Improvement Company of $27,745, which sum was found by the jury to be the measure of the damages sustained. Five days thereafter the money so awarded was paid into court, upon the deposit of which a judgment was rendered on the verdict, and the plaintiff immediately appealed. The court on July 24, 1907, on the defendants' motion, ordered the clerk forthwith to pay to the party adjudged to be entitled thereto the money so deposited, from which determination the plaintiff took another appeal.

It appears from the undisputed affidavits filed in this court on the part of the defendants that, after the judgment of condemnation was given, the plaintiff took and retained possession of the land, and built thereon a railroad which it is using for its own purposes, and that, pursuant to the order of the court, the South Portland Improvement Company received from the clerk the money so deposited. The defendants' counsel, in support of the motion interposed, invoke a clause of the organic law of this state which declares: "Private property shall not be taken for public use, nor the particular services of any man be demanded, without just compensation; nor except in case of the state, without such compensation first assessed and tendered" (Const. Or. art. 1, § 18); and insist that, when the plaintiff left with the clerk the sum of mon-
